It was nearly nine o'clock when our coach started with its three passengers—to the other two gentlemen, a very matter-of-fact and every day affair—to me something more, for I had not been looking forward to this day's adventures for nine long years? In 1851 I had come from the lakes hither on foot, sad and disappointed; and from that day the vision of this day's ride had never left me. During all this time too it had been my settled determination to read the closing chapters of Hyperion amid the scene described. Odd enough, I had parted with my copy a few weeks before supposing that it might be replaced without difficulty, and now was travelling without it, for though in the various book stores in Vienna, Linz and Salzburg, where I had sought it, the other volumes of Dürr's sadly misprinted Collection of American Authors were to be had, Hyperion was not—a proof that I am not the only reader of the book in this part of the world.

We drove through the town, over the bridge, and up the long Linzer street and through the city gate; thence along the smooth road, shaded with tall trees, the cliffs of the Capuzinerberg on the right, the beautiful plain spreading away on the other hand to the hills, on whose tops a few evenings before I had seen the bright fires, lighted by the peasants in honor of St. John, flashing in the darkness, and reminding me of the tongues of cloven flame, which rested on the heads of the Apostles.

The road now winds round the Capuziner Mount, and rises up the long ascent, in the rear of the Gaisberg, which I made on foot, the tall, pointed Kropfstein looming up before me, like the Israelites' pillar of cloud. A half hour's walk, during which I had found brilliant orchises and other flowers cousins German to similar species at home, brought me to a slight turn to the left in the road, where I sat down by the wayside and looked back between the heights, far a-down over the plain to the giant mass of the triple peaked Staufen, the central one rising a perfect pyramid six thousand feet from the sunny fields and meadows at its base. As I said, it was a glorious morning, and the mountain stood out in the crystalline atmosphere, so clear in outline, so ethereal in hue, rose so lightly from earth—as to give one the feeling that soon it would rise and float away, like the silvery clouds, which were sailing far, far above it.

Then I went onward, but not far, for the cool shades of fruit trees around a farm house invited me, and I went to the peasant woman, washing in a large trough at the rude fountain, with a request for a glass of milk. While waiting, I went into the kitchen, neat and white as soap and sand can make it, earthen, tin and wooden dishes neatly arranged in racks; thence crossed the dark passage which runs the length of the house, and separates the rooms of the family from the large apartment in which the noble kine are stalled, and which I found with clean, glossy coats, and bright lively eyes, devouring with infinite relish freshly cut clover out of huge stone troughs. The cool mountain air had here full circulation, and was but sweetened by the fragrant breath of the cows and the perfume of new hay. Oh for a lazy bed on the hay mow and a volume of Hoffmann or Jean Paul, and nothing in the world to do but read for the next three days! Was it in a book, or did some one recently speak of the power of our sense of smell to awaken long dormant memories? How many ages ago was it, that we boys lay on the mow in the old barn, three thousand miles away, and Aleck B., read me passages in Robinson Crusoe—that book, as marvellous to me now as a work of art, as it was wonderful then, as a history of real adventures?

But—the omnibus! I drank my milk and under the idyllic influence of the moment, added fifty per cent to its price, which was two kreuzers, equal to one cent.

The road then for a time passed mostly through woods, and reminded me of travelling at home, though the illusion was often broken by glimpses into the valley, which without hedge, fence or wall, is completely covered with fields of hay and grain, and nowhere left in the wildness of nature.

It was about eleven o'clock when we too "stopped to change horses at Hof, a handful of houses on the brow of a breezy hill." One could not perhaps draw a plan of Hof from this description, but was there ever a finer and more comprehensive one in so few words? Is it not Shakesperean? Does it not make you feel exactly what the hamlet is—some fifteen or twenty buildings, with church and school house, scattered along the road which here crosses a broad swell of rising ground? But the Hof of Paul Flemming is no more. On the 6th of July, 1859, the church was struck by lightning, and it, with the Post and the other neighboring houses, was destroyed. But a new and finer church is rising on the site of the old one, at whose doors, Flemming on that Sunday saw the peasants lounging, jauntily dressed, and near which they risked their kreuzers for cakes at the roulette board.

But to-day was not Sunday, and the scenes which Flemming saw at Hof have no place in my experience. While the horses were changing I went into the wide-spread, still unfinished Post-house; for they are building it to stand for a hundred centuries—no fear of Father Muller or his disciples being before their eyes. In the large guest room, peasants, men, women and children, assembled from the hay fields, sat round large tables eating boiled beef and dumplings, like cannon balls in size, if not in color and consistency. This at eleven o'clock A.M., this needed explanation, which the gentleman, who rode with me in the coupé gave. Eleven is the dining hour in all this country. The working hours are from six to eleven in the morning, from twelve to six in the afternoon.

But this, objected I, is a bad division in the hot days of summer.

It is the custom, said he.

By and bye we came to the Fuschl lake—lying deep in a hollow, and had it below us on the left for two or three miles. Its waters are of an exquisite green—green in all its shade, from a delicate tint almost to blackness—as if the hoary old mountain beyond had bathed in them, and washed out the rich color of its dark woods and sunny slopes. We descended at length, passed the head of the little lake, drove through a village, and up a gorge between high hills. When we reached the height of the ascent, the narrow horizon in the distance was filled by a cluster of huge mountains—at whose feet, after a few turns and windings in the road, we saw the lake of St. Wolfgang—a lovely lake with a border of fields and meadows. St. Gilgen, the picturesque little village—still sits, as Flemming saw it, on the hither shore, like a swan ready to spread its wings and fly out upon the crystal waters.

We too drove slowly down the long, winding descent and stopped at the village inn. In front a large apple tree, still spreads thick branches over a round table with benches. Just above the lower row of windows, extending the whole length of the house front, are painted in staring colors and mostly red, but now half effaced, scenes from the forester's life. On the left are men riding out to the hunt; then beneath the sun dial a Boniface is pouring out beer to a thirsty customer; then, successively, from left to right, huntmen with dogs in leash, a stag chase, a fight with a boar, and finally the capture of the wild boar. Above the door I read:

Gasthaus zur Post
des

Franz Schöndorfer.

I did not enquire whether this gentleman, "Whose beauteous name is known to fame," still lives (an error which shall be corrected the next time I am there) for my thoughts were more taken up with the landlady, whom I remember as the conspicuous personage in May, 1851. Nine years have made her of course older, and easily conceivable causes much fatter. Now a fat landlady is an excellent tavern sign. Such an one is usually amiable. I am quite sure she is, for when I told her that a celebrated American professor and poet had written about her tavern in a book, her broad face smiled through all its extent, and her jolly, small eyes twinkled. It is not after all of much importance, save for the truth of history, whether Franz Schöndorfer still exists in the flesh, or is now the "blessed man" of his corpulent spouse, since the better half is usually the power that is in these comfortable little inns; and that too whether wife or widow.

In the passage, which runs through the house, sat peasant people drinking and eating, beer and black bread. In the large guest-room the girls of the house were ironing; but a clean table in the corner was spread for us, and we made a by no means unsatisfactory dinner of boiled fresh beef and stuffed breast of veal with lettuce. I take my 'davy that one who is not too dainty can eat in comfort and dine in peace at the "Gasthaus zur Post des Franz Schöndorfer." It was perhaps another error, not to have gone up stairs and sought out the spot where Berkely the Englishman sat in his tub of cold water—but let him that is without sin cast the first stone.

The usual summer band music draws crowds on the Common on pleasant evenings, and the Gilmore Band fills the Music Hall with delighted listeners.

German Men's Song Festivals.

We translate from the Berlin Vossische Zeitung, some evidently well-meant remarks on Men's Song Festivals, of which the people of Buffalo had a specimen, a couple of weeks ago, and recommend them to the attention of directors, members and friends of all societies concerned. They are in all probability from the pen of Dr. Rellstab, the noted critic in musical matters.

We will put a question and try to answer it. This question is: What bearing have the German Men's Singing Societies had upon the growth and development of musical art? Have they furthered or retarded it? This question may be sub-divided into two. First: Has the cultivation of male part-singing benefitted the productive side of musical art-composition? and secondly; has it benefitted the vocal reproduction, the art of singing?

All musical persons of judgment and taste agree, that by far the greater part of compositions for male voices have but very little musical merit, if any at all. The classic German masters, Bach, Händel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven have produced so little in this line, and what there is of them is so decidedly inferior to their other vocal works, that it would never have been a sufficient cause to establish special societies for its reproduction. Franz Schubert too, has written too little to build societies upon, although of some of his male four-part songs might be truly said: ex ungue leonem. It is characteristic however of the tendency and the taste of their societies that you see very seldom—perhaps never a piece of Franz Schubert on their programmes, and that the few compositions left by Robert Schumann are neglected just as much. It is true, that Mendelssohn has written some very remarkable works for male voices, among which the Antigone music stands prominent, but none of them, save one, has become popular with our societies, so that hardly a festival passes by during which the "Farewell to the woods" is not sung by heart—and, generally speaking, very poorly too.

The principal food of these societies at their private meetings, as well as at their grand joint festivals consists—besides the Gambrinic malt juice—of the "still" liquid brewed by a few artizan-composers, who meet the enormous yearly demand for new part-songs by opening their sluices of musical idiocy and mediocrity par excellence. Masterworks, similar to the Singer's rambles, Student's rambles, Mordgrundsbrück &c., flood the market in the cheapest editions, excluding all competition of copyists, and satisfy to a marvel the wants and the taste of most societies and their respective directors. In these productions phrases take the place of an original melodic element, and instead of an independent carriage of the parts you find a piano accompaniment arranged for voices; for in almost every bar of these popular works you can trace the keyboard easily.

To proceed to the second part of our question: in the art of singing, are the voices benefitted by the cultivation of male part-singing? Every musician who has any experience in vocal music would answer, not at all; on the contrary, it is highly injurious to voices. All the mediocre manufacturers of male choruses speculate on the effect of the highest notes of the tenor-voice. Such an Amphion of the Liedertafels thinks to himself; a high A or B never fails of its effect, and there is hardly a society without one or two first tenors who can sound these high notes with full chest voice; why then should I not put them in as often as possible? It would be well if the assassination of tenor voices could be placed under the surveillance of the police. Any one who has ever been present at a regular meeting of a Men's Singing Club must have noticed, that instruction in the proper use of the vocal organs, or even correct pronunciation of the words is never thought of. Practising, cigar in mouth, and beer glass within reach, is kept up till the first tenors cry for grace, and the bill of fare.

An excursion generally proves fatal to some young promising tenor voices, which if they had joined a mixed chorus instead of a male chorus might have been preserved and been useful. But it has of late become very difficult to obtain male members, especially high tenors, for singing societies in which ladies participate. In the first place the compositions which are studied and performed there are altogether too classical, that is too say too tedious for the majority of our young men. Of course nobody can become interested in the works of Händel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, without first possessing himself of some initiatory musical knowledge. Moreover our first tenors, if they were to join mixed choruses, would but too often stand convicted of utter ignorance in reading readily—especially in the tenor-clef—in counting and keeping time. And this is reason enough for keeping aloof from societies in which they sing fugues—horrid word! Such is the state of things now, that Choral Societies have to engage professional singers to get even a decent proportion of tenors and basses. It has happened quite lately that, in a pretty large provincial capital, not far from Berlin, there were but seven male singers to ninety-seven ladies present at an oratorio rehearsal. Many Choral Societies which used to flourish have been obliged to disband only for reasons of this kind. The principal cause of this is the so-called cultivation of male part-singing. Really, if old Zeller—supposed to be the Columbus of the Liedertafels—could have known how his discovery would affect the higher vocal music, he would have looked at it with horror.

A Japan Lily.

Our pen is generally a good working creature, and will follow almost any lead, as an Editor's ought. But all creatures rebel at times, and in that case the only rule is the one the butcher gave to Tom Pinch, when, contrary to all propriety, he was cramming his beef-steak carelessly into his basket—"Meat," the butcher said, with some emotion, "must be humored, not drove." Our pen must be so treated, this very hot weather; for "the heated term" is the American Saturnalia.

We have caught sight of a most gorgeous Japan lily. Never was anything more exquisitely rich. We should describe it, were it not that the language we should use would seem so extravagant that it would detract from the sobriety of our article. The ancients called the poet and the seer by the same name. In those days, men would endure melodious instruction. But those times are past. The Editor is now the seer. They call the poet a creator too. All has passed over to the chair of the Editor. It is the tripod now. He is teacher, seer, creator. We profess to listen to the minister; we do homage to the popular orator; but we give our ear and our heart to the Editor. For have we not voluntarily chosen him for our guide? and why continue to receive his teaching, if we do not like it? But, as we are Anglo-Saxons and not Greeks, the Editor must not be a poet-prophet, but a sewing teacher.

Yet there was something in that connection of the melodious teacher with the prophet, that was for all times and all people—a truth in it that belongs to us. We do not know that we can state the matter in any way that will be less exceptionable, than by looking at the question: What is the reason of the impression made by a very magnificent flower? or, not to make it too metaphysical, What is the moral influence of the beautiful?

The Puritans were very much afraid of the beautiful, and its recognition as a legitimate power has, therefore, been very slow in America. That there are dangers in it, appears from the fact, that Protestantism is rather shy of the fine arts; Paganism and Romanism not caring so much for the moral bearing of customs and pursuits.

For one thing, however, let us observe, that the beautiful cannot be bad in itself, because children all love flowers. Not to resort to Wordsworth's exquisite reason for this in his "Ode on Intimations of Immortality," we may appeal to all hearts for the truth of the fact. A crowd of children from courts and alleys will gather eagerly before a gentleman's garden, and gaze wistfully through the iron railings at the roses and fuchsias, the japonicas and the oleanders, as if their possession would be paradise itself. They do not look at all with the stupid wonder with which they walk through a gallery of art or a house filled with costly furniture. The flowers make some kind of deep, natural appeal to them. The beautiful, then, we gather, in itself, is innocent.

We are absolutely sure of our ground when we say that the beautiful is refining in its influence. It is hardly worth our while to argue so plain a point. Taste grows up usually in countries highly favored by nature. Their names are upon every tongue and in every book. A subtle influence steals gradually into the heart of such a nation, until at last their boats are models of beauty, the pitcher carried to the well takes on a classic shape, and grace moulds the living forms of bandit and beggar, lady and contadina.

The question whether it is favorable to virtue is more serious and more subtle. One thing is certain, whatever be the danger, the beautiful is a necessity in a complete character, else why is imagination an element in universal human nature? If in us, it needs its aliment as much as intellect or feeling, and there can certainly be no evil in the appropriate and moderate use of any faculty. If we refuse the beautiful, we reduce architecture to the simple function of producing that which is convenient, a result which will make any of us look blank enough when we realize it. We extinguish music, not only the interlinked harmonies of the concert and the simple melody of the school-girl's ballad, but the sacred song in the temple of devotion.

It comes very near to the sphere of virtue to consider the question whether symmetry is possible without the idea of the beautiful. Without symmetry, where is the idea of the perfect? Without the idea of the perfect is devotion possible? To tell a savage that the Almighty is perfect would carry no idea with it; to convey anything like an adequate conception of it, a long training, had to be gone through with in the Land of Promise and in the land of Philosophy. The child you train at your knees comes, you think, with a mind like blank paper to receive an impress entirely new. The fact however is, that he is the recipient of the resultant effect of ages of culture. What prophets saw, what patriots fought for, what martyrs died for, what poets sang, what philosophers thought, what science discovered and what art has carried into natural effect—all these are part of the character of that boy. That he conceives the perfect, is the effect of the moulding of nations into the beautiful ever since the morning stars sang together.

The beautiful may be in excess in a people. Byron's Sardanapalus is a great truth—a hero destroyed by the aesthetic. The story of the Sybarites is from the life—that they moaned if a rose-leaf was doubled up on their couch. But this only shows that we ought not to live for a side issue; that the ancillary is not the main thing; that a human being should cultivate his powers in proportion to their importance; that the moral nature must be supreme; the intellect have its appropriate sway; the useful occupy its proper position.

We think that the Anglo-Saxon race may be trusted in this direction. As long as a State spends a hundred millions for railroads, and starts back with horror from the idea of thirty thousand to build its chief magistrate a house that shall not disgrace it, we need not be afraid of the undue influence of this power. So long as the property of our State is worth, at a very moderate valuation, a thousand millions of dollars—for it could not be bought, house by house, farm by farm, coal seams, ore banks, salt wells and oil sites, for twice that sum—and yet we cannot get together fifty thousand dollars to build one Temple of the Beautiful in the shape of an Academy of the Fine Arts, we need not be deeply concerned at any danger from this source.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Harriet Hosmer.

Boston, June 29, 1860.—Harriet Hosmer has just had an order from some gentlemen of St. Louis for a bronze statue of Thomas H. Benton, for which she is to have $10,000. She is now engaged on a monument ordered by Mr. Crow, of St. Louis. It has been designed by Miss Hosmer, and the drawing promises a work of great beauty and power. The Saviour is represented extending his hand to raise a young girl who reclines at his feet. The figure of the Saviour is to be nine feet high, and the conception of his person evinces rare genius in the artist. Those who have supposed that Miss Hosmer, with all her fine powers of execution and her exquisite conception of lighter subjects, would lack the power to design a representation of those loftier types of character which illumine with unapproachable glory the highest productions of art, will be happily disappointed when they see this great work. They will hardly need to read the inscription below. "I am the resurrection and the life." Miss Hosmer returns from Rome to take care of her father, Dr. Hosmer, and just now she has interrupted her work to execute his bust. This young woman's energy is illustrated by the fact that when she heard of her father's illness she made the journey from Rome to Boston in seventeen days—the shortest time ever made. At Rome she has been the pupil and friend of John Gibson, the greatest of living English sculptors. All her life she has done brave work, sometimes audacious but never unworthy; and when she presented herself in Rome, where a great prejudice exists against lazy lady pretenders—not without reason, too—she won her coveted place in the studio of Gibson solely by the evidence which her work and her wishes gave that she both could and would achieve a success alike honorable to herself, her art and her master. Mr. Gibson's prophetic expectations have been more than fulfilled. From the first he expressed himself more than satisfied with the power of imitating the roundness and softness of flesh, add upon one occasion he said that he had never seen it surpassed, and not often equalled. A bust of Daphne, a lovely bust of the beautiful Medusa, a statue of Enone, for Mr. Crow of St. Louis, and a statue of Beatrice Cenci, for the public library of St. Louis, which was exhibited in the Royal Academy at London, and won golden opinions from eminent critics, were her earliest productions. When her father's financial reverses deprived her of the aid which he had so gladly given, just as she was starting for England to escape the dangers of a summer in Rome, she gave up the contemplated journey, sold her fine horse and expensive English saddle, remained in Rome to model her famous statue of Puck—a work all spirit, originality and fun—and in six months achieved an independence. Since that time she has met with distinguished success. A monument for the Church of San Andrea delle Frate, at Ryme, a fountain of original design, and a statue of Zenobia, larger than life, are the later efforts of her genius. Harriet Hosmer is but twenty-nine, a native of Watertown, near Boston, a woman of no ordinary worth, and an artist of great achievements and greater promise; and she will make us all more proud of her as she continues the career which her courage and faithfulness and extraordinary genius have so successfully inaugurated.

In answer to the committee appointed by the Legislature of Missouri for the erection of a bronze statue, in St. Louis, of the late Colonel Thomas H. Benton. She writes,—“I have reason to be grateful to you for this distinction, because I am a young artist, and although I may have given some evidence of skill in those of my statues which are now in your city, I could scarcely have hoped that their merit, whatever it may be, should have inspired the citizens of St. Louis to intrust me with a work whose chief characteristic must be the union of great intellectual power with manly strength. But I have also reason to be grateful to you, because I am a woman, and, knowing what barriers must in the outset oppose all womanly efforts, I am indebted to the chivalry of the west, which has first overleaped them. I am not unmindful of the kind indulgence with which my works have been received, but I have sometimes thought that the critics might be more courteous than just, remembering from what hand they proceeded; but your kindness will now afford me ample opportunity of proving to what rank I am really entitled as an artist, unsheltered by their broad wings of compassion for the sex; for this work must be, as we understand the term, a manly work, and hence its merits alone must be my defence against the attacks of those who stand ready to resist any encroachments upon their self-appropriated sphere. I utter these sentiments only to assure you that I am fully aware of the important results which to me as an artist, wait on the issue of my labors, and hence that I shall spare no pains to produce a monument worthy of your city, and worthy of the statesman, who, though dead, still speaks to you in language more eloquent and endearing than the happiest efforts in marble or bronze, of ever so cunning a workman.” In reference to the above, the St. Louis Republican says:—“We believe the choice of a woman for the execution of a work such as this, is a novelty in the annals of art. It belongs to the great west, however, to inaugurate novelties; and we are satisfied, from frequent contemplation of her works, both here and elsewhere, that the choice of Miss Hosmer for this, the first public work of our state, was fortunate, and will result in the production of a monument creditable to our city and commensurate with the fame of the great man whom it is intended to honor.”

Musical Correspondence.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., AUGUST 6.—In almost every house here there is a piano, but pass when you will, polkas, negro songs, schottisches, and Thomas' ballads are sure to reach your ear. Beethoven, Mendelssohn and the great masters are never heard at parties, nor at evening gatherings. Some Germans practice Mendelssohn's part songs and other things weekly, under the guidance of a Mr. Schubert late organist of the Unitarian church, who recently gave place to Mr. Escott, the violinist, (husband of the Lucy Escott of European celebrity.) They are to give a concert shortly, assisted by talent from Worcester and Hartford. Among them is a tenor with a high and true voice, who sings uncommonly well.

Carl Lenster, an excellent violinist from New York, gave a public invitation to musical amateurs to visit his hotel, three Saturday evenings ago to hear him perform. The few who went were highly pleased, and thanked the many who stayed away to prove their disregard for that, which had they gone to hear, they would have drowned by whispers and ill-timed remarks, and some of them certainly by loud jabbering to test which could produce a more formidable fortissimo—they or the violoncello? Casseres is teaching successfully in good circles, but is absolutely lazy as far as playing goes. They say he promised to play Beethoven's Duo in F op. 24, with Lenster, but did not go near the place. When asked to play, his answer commonly is, "I do not feel in the mood." His mood for playing recurs very seldom, but he can play when he will, then I for one can forgive his ordinary indifference and constitutional indolence, for when fairly in the midst of a piece that he loves, the passive, languid man becomes the artist of heated imagination and elevated fancy. Once I caught him in the right mood, then he played Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso in E minor, with its lovely, playful movement, Moschelles' Romanza in F, Beethoven's Adagio from the third Sonata inscribed to Haydn, Dussek's La Consolation and one of Field's Nocturnos. He has plenty of enthusiasm and warmth, aims at the regular position of the hands, fine quality of tone, clearness of execution, &c., &c., but his execution is too brusque, and there is a laissez aller about it, which fairly indicates his natural languor of disposition. Slow, expressive movements, which demand neat phrasing, judicious coloring, intensity of feeling—in these he is quite at home. Evidently he follows the school of Clementi which may be characterized as that of principle and delivery. There are some concerts in prospect for the latter end of this month, that of the Germans I believe is to come first. The Draytons will be here early in September. Some of the minor singers of Ullmann's last troupe at the Academy in New York, contemplated a visit here, but some kind soul wrote and advised them to stay away. It was a generous, open-hearted, unselfish piece of advice, for had they graced the Music Hall with the light of their countenances once, certainly on leaving it, they would have darkened the passage way, leading out with the shades of disappointment beaming vendetta on their faces, and a thousand maledizioni on their lips. A few good people would have gone to hear and see them, but what is a few in that hall whose capacity is thirteen hundred! But send along Campbell's Minstrels, or any other Ethiopian "show" then, make room for everybody, and why? because negro minstrelsy is the lyric product of the United States. The people must not be blamed because they are true to their own. But who shall educate the mass in good music? It is the duty of the rich, the powerful, and those in high places, as it is the case in Europe. In Boston, New York and other places you and they are highly favored. People respect and patronize your Dresels, Timms and Wollenhaupts. Here they are true to their own. For teachers they employ their own friends and members of their own churches, because a few lessons from Mr. — in Boston have qualified them to teach. Schubert, Casseres and Escott, with their European experience, amount to nothing. They must be content with some pupils, because they charge high! It is their own fault in a great measure. The first named plays the violoncello, Casseres the piano, and Escott the violin. They could meet and play Beethoven's and Hummel's Trios and other music, and invite the people to become intimate with these masters, but the one prefers his cigar and lager beer, the second enjoys his dolce far niente, and the violinist thinks it pays best to give lessons to a class of young men in the evenings. To succeed in music, there must be agitation as in other matters. Cheap goods sell best in the market, but they are the dearest, and it is on this principle that our people make a great mistake in the employment of teachers, as in the purchase of pianos.

I am, &c., A NATIVE OF SPRINGFIELD.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 18, 1860.

The Music Publishers in Council.

In default of anything more appropriate in this midsummer dearth of musical items, we are glad to have the glimpse at the annual convention of the Board of Music Trade afforded us by our well known Philadelphia correspondent "Manrico." The music publishers of our country have done their full share in promoting the steady advance of Music among us, not only by their publications, but by encouraging the cause of Art and its servants in many different ways. Although they give the world much that is indeed but trash, yet not a few of them can point to a list of publications of the very classics of Music (like that of our own publishers,) that do honor to any community and any people. Much good will doubtless arise from these annual conferences of those who have it in their power to do so much for the highest interest of Art. We are glad to hear that they meet next in Boston.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Board of Music Trade, which occurred on the 9th inst., at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, was marked by an entire and happy unity of action and good feeling on the part of those directly concerned therein. Not a single questio vexata, which could possibly have ripped the smoothly flowing current of its proceedings, came up during the entire session; and the members, upon adjournment, separated amid the most cordial expressions of friendship. Ever thus should it be with all those from whose exertions radiate the influences tending to an ultimate national taste for the finest of the fine arts, which shall have its blessed effect upon the entire social system of our country; humanizing, genializing, and tempering all orders of its citizens, in whose pursuits, for the most part, the material now predominates over the ideal and æsthetic.

The attendance at this meeting was large and comprised publishers from widely separated sections of the United States and Canada. Thus stood the roll-call:

From New York: Messrs. Jas. F. Hall, S. F. Gordon, Wm. E. Millet, Wm. Pond, Sidney E. Pearson. From Boston: Messrs. Oliver Ditson, E. H. Wade, H. Tolman. From Philadelphia: Messrs. Jul. Lee, G. André, Jas. N. Beck. From Baltimore: Messrs. Geo. Willig, Hen. McCaffrey, Wm. Miller. From Cincinnati: Mr. A. C. Peters. From Louisville: Messrs. D. P. Faulds, — Tripp. From Toronto, Ca.: Mr. A. S. Nordheimer. From St. Louis: Mr. G. Weber.

The only application for membership at this meeting was made by Mr. Ph. S. Werlein, of New Orleans, who was unanimously elected, and took his seat in the Board, during the progress of the proceedings. Immediately upon the organization of the first session, the President, Mr. Geo. Willig, of Baltimore, delivered the usual annual address, replete with wholesome suggestions, and presenting the divers points, comprehensively arranged, which claimed the deliberations of the Board. Toward the close of the final meeting, an election for officers was held, which resulted in the choice of the following gentlemen: for President, Jas. F. Hall; Vice President, D. P. Faulds; and for Secretary and Treasurer, Jas. N. Beck. Some few alterations in the By-Laws of the Association, important only to the active members of the Association, were adopted; and a series of resolutions upon the death of Nathan Richardson, an honorary member, were unanimously passed. The informal proceedings of the occasion were materially enhanced by the active participation of such men as Charles Grobe, Theodore Hagen, Charles Wels Messrs. Light & Bradbury, Theo. Moerling, Prof. Jas. Bellak, Col. Fitzgerald, of the Philadelphia City Item, and others. Fair ladies, too, graced the various scenes of pleasure, for almost every member was accompanied by his wife or daughter. The New York members of the Board were unremitting in well-conceived and admirably arranged pleasures, wherewith to entertain their visiting confidés. They had engaged, in advance, the most luxurious apartments of a superb hotel, amply provided with every appurtenance of comfort and enjoyment; and had given to the proprietors of the same hostelry, a carte blanche toward the best entertainment which experienced caterers could devise. On Thursday afternoon, the members and their wives and daughters, were regaled with an extended view of the magnificent Central Park, with its fanciful bridges, cool grottoes, romantic rambles, graceful swans, commanding observatories, and smooth promenades; all admiring the liberality of a municipal corporation, which has thus set apart for future generations, an oasis amid the sterile scenes of every-day practical life.

Thence the company proceeded along the Bloomingdale Road, sacred to fast men, to a caravanserai, distinguished by the by no means uncommon appellation of "Jones" — where the gentlemen of the pleasure party imbibed sundry ingeniously contrived milk-punches, while the ladies regaled themselves with the charming view up the magnificent Hudson, which has made the spot in question one of the most popular resorts around the great city of Gotham. The party returned to the Fifth Avenue Hotel at 8 P. M., to partake of a magnificent dinner, which the bounty of their New York hosts had provided for them. Every item of the bill of fare bespoke luxury as well as exquisite taste. Among those, outside of the Board, who participated in this elegantly contrived reunion à manger, was Col. Fitzgerald, editor of the Philadelphia City Item, a journal, which has made the development of musical taste a speciality for many years. He acknowledged a toast to the press of Philadelphia, in his usual forcible and entertaining style. Profs. Charles Grobe and James Bellak, men of untiring industry in the cause of Enterpe, severally caused their presence to be felt, by wholesome suggestions as to the readiest means of developing that spread of pure musical taste, so much desired by all true lovers of the art. An infinite number of toasts followed, responded to by Messrs. Light, Bradbury, Weber, Zöbisch, Geib, Pond, Hall, Beck and others. The wines on this occasion were sans peur et sans reproche; while the more substantial elements reflected infinite credit upon the proprietors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel. An interesting feature of this official dinner was the presentation of a massive silver coffee-urn to an ex-president of the Board, Mr. George Willig, of Baltimore, the earliest pioneer of music in the Monumental City, and a man fully deserving of a like tribute at the hands of his brethren. This token of respect and admiration was presented, in an eloquent address, by Oliver Ditson, chairman of the committee appointed to prepare the testimonial; and acknowledged by the recipient in feeling terms. On Friday morning many members of the Board, with some of the prominent professors of music, such as Charles Wels, Theodor Moerling, and the distinguished litterateur, Theodor Hagen, sat down to a splendid lunch, provided by the liberality of Messrs. Light & Bradbury, the well known piano manufacturers, in a famous saloon in Grand Street. This was another feast of reason and flow of the soul — such as have characterized the informal festivities of the present interesting meeting. Here were publishers and composers, both ministering servants in the great temple of art, devoting an hour together to the claims of geniality and friendship; and interchanging opinions as to their true mission of developing the art tendencies of the great world around them.

Altogether, the regular and informal proceedings of this annual meeting of the Board of Trade were satisfactory and delightful at every point. Before the final adjournment it was decided to meet in Boston, on the second Wednesday in August, 1861.

THE NEW YORK MUSICAL REVIEW AND MUSICAL WORLD came to us last week in its new form, which is substantially the old form of the Review. We part with reluctance from our old friend the Musical World, which for many years under Mr. R. Storrs Willis, was a constant and faithful advocate of whatever was highest and best in art, and the memory of which will always be pleasantly associated with his name. The new paper will doubtless gain a new life and strength from their union of forces, and, under the able conduct of its editors, and its enterprising publishers, Mason Brothers, we doubt not will have continued prosperity and success.

THE HOWARD ATHENEUM which has been made of late years a most pleasant resort again, by Mr. E. L. Davenport, opened on Monday evening to a full house. The company is an excellent one, made up of old and well known favorites of the public.

BOSTON THEATRE.—The "wonderful Revels," who have for so many years been the delight of old and young, and who are now as fresh, as agile and as comical as ever, commence an engagement at the Boston Academy of Music on Monday next. Their appearance here is always hailed with delight, and as they bring a full company, they will undoubtedly play one of the best engagements they have ever performed in this city.

EFFECT OF MUSIC ON THE SICK. — The effect of music upon the sick has been scarcely at all noticed. In fact, its expensiveness, as it is now, makes any general application of it out of the question. I will only remark here, that wind instruments, including the human voice, and stringed instruments, capable of continuous sound, have generally a beneficial effect — while the pianoforte, with such instruments as have no continuity of sound, has just the reverse. The finest pianoforte playing will damage the sick, while an air like "Home, Sweet Home," or "Assia a piè d'un salice," on the most ordinary grinding organ, will sensibly soothe them — and this quite independent of association. — Florence Nightingale, (Notes on Nursing.)

Music Abroad.

NAPLES. — One of the first effects of the new state of things in Naples has been to restore to the theatre of San Carlo more than half of the operas which had formerly been forbidden to its repertoire by the censorship. Moreover, the corps de ballet availed itself of the opportunity to get rid of the frightful green trowsers which had been the despair of choreographic celebrities, and the sylphides of the San Carlo have been consequently received with frantic applause. The management have engaged for the next season, the tenor Pancani, Negrini, Colletti, Mad. Steffanone, Mad. Vera-Lorini, and Mlle. Brochetti as première danseuse.

STOCKHOLM.—Ole Bull and Vieuxtemps have been concertizing here. The latter received the honor of election as a member of the Royal Musical Academy, and from the King himself the Order of Vasa. A female violinist from Vienna, Amelia Bido had also played with some success.

WEISBADEN.—On the occasion of a concert in the Kursaal, at which Rossini, Folz, Signora Sanchioli and our old friend Alfred Jaell appeared, a new overture, Loreley, by Capellmeister Schindelmesser, was produced and had a favorable reception.

Paris.

At the Grand Opera Semiramis still retains its position in the bills, and with good reason, for the receipts grow higher with each performance. The Opera Comique presents a more varied series of entertainments but with a little approach to novelty. The Songe d'une nuit d'Été has been done, and the Fille du Regiment, and the Dame Blanche, and the Domino Noir, but what sauce, however piquante, can disguise the staleness of such fare. Roger, by the way, after playing Horace in the last-named opera, has taken his departure for Baden. Having intended for a remove to entertain you with a little theatrical intelligence, and that article being entirely deficient in the market, we must pass on to the entrées. First, as an agreeable hors d'œuvre, I have two little facts to record which you will receive with equal relish. M. Delaporte, who received such high honors for leading the Orpheonists into a string of bungling disasters and inconveniences, has very properly resigned his presidency of the Commission des Sociétés Chorales, having proved his total incapacity for any kind of business whatever. Secondly, Adolphus Sax, the much injured brass instrument maker and inventor, and a very excellent fellow into the bargain, has obtained an extension of his patents for saxhorns and saxotrombas for another five years.—Musical World.

Germany.

For one of my entrées I have sent to Vienna, and beg to present it in the shape of a new theatre, to be built forthwith, between the Carinthian gate and a new street not yet formed. It will form a quadrangle 114 yards long by 100 wide. The design is to be thrown open to competition, and the prizes will be 3,000, 2,000 and 1,000 thalers to the authors of the three best designs. Foreign architects will be admitted to compete, and the last day for receiving plans is fixed for January 10, 1861. Wiesbaden next supplies a few scraps of gossip. The Italian troop there under Morelli has been playing Il Barbiere to a thronging audience, and there has been a capital concert at the Kursaal, where Mad. Sanchioli sang, as also did M. Bazzini. The orchestra belonging to the theatre officiated, and played, among other things, an overture by M. Schindelmesser, called Loreley, for the first time; it was much applauded. M. Niemann, the tenor, is expected at Wiesbaden, to fulfil an engagement at the theatre for six nights' performance. He is to appear at the French opera in Tannhäuser. Northern Germany has given its song-festival this year at Bielfeld, an appropriate locality for such a celebration, being the birthplace of the brilliant star Sophia Cruwell (Cruvelli), whose brightness has deserted the firmament of art to set in the ocean of matrimony. (The bath was taken under the auspices of le Chevalier Vigier.) The festival in question extended over three days, the 20th, 21st, and 22d of July, and was attended by 29 lieder-tafeln. At Darmstadt the 50th anniversary of the foundation of the Court Theatre was solemnized by the performance of Mozart's Titus. From the 4th of September, 1859, to the 23d of May, there have been seventy-six operatic performances. The works which were most frequently played are Rienzi, Gustavus, the Huguenots, and the Sicilian Vespers. Those played for the first time were Rienzi, Dinorah, and Linda di Chamouni. Among the other works produced were Norma, the Etoile du Nord, Cinderella, Tannhäuser, &c.

At Giessen, in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, there has been a solemn commemoration of Ludwig Spohr. One of his pupils, J. F. Bott, a violinist, and chapel master at Sax Meiningen, directed the concert; and the overtures to Jessonda, that to the Berg-geist, and the Hymn to Music (Die Weihe der Töne), were executed by the orchestra.—Id.

Berlin.

(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. John K. Paine, of Portland, U. S., who has already received honorable mention in your columns, gave a capital organ performance last Thursday in the parochial church, to a select auditory, including the American Ambassador (Gov. Wright), Hermann Grimm, Faubert, and several of the most renowned maestri of Berlin. The programme was as follows:

1. Fantasia und Fuge in E moll. . . . . J. K. Paine.
2. Choral—Vorspiel "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr." . . . . Seb. Bach.
3. Präludium und Fuge in A moll. . . . . "
4. Trio—Sonate in Es dur. . . . . "
5. Fantasia in G dur. . . . . "

6. Concert—Variationen über ein Thema von Haydn.
7. Trio—Sonate in G dur, later Satz. . . . . Seb. Bach.
8. Concertata in C moll . . . . . L. Thiele.

Nos. 4, 6 and 7 appeared to give the greatest satisfaction. From the second of these numbers a good idea may be formed of M. Paine's inventive talent. The whole of the variations are extremely original, and, what is really of more consequence, are natural, and—music. The veteran Haupt (his teacher), generally speaking a stranger to "wreathed smiles," could not restrain the satisfaction, mingled we feel certain with a touch of pride, which he inwardly felt, manifesting itself upon the mirror of his soul. Faubert, too, seemed highly delighted. He shook M. Paine warmly by the hand, and gave him a few kind words of encouragement. We were the more pleased to see this as M. Paine is a young man just entering upon the battle of life, and because the musical critics of the place, for some reasons best known to themselves and heaven, are pleased to ignore his performances. Knowing his classic taste, his sterling abilities, and his indomitable perseverance, we have not the slightest hesitation in predicting a brilliant future for Mr. Paine.—Id.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The first performance of Rigoletto—and, if the announcement holds good, the last till next year—took place on Saturday night.

The cast of the chief personages, with one exception, was the same as when people believed, and not without reason, that amelioration in any important particular was impossible. The Duke of Mantua and his privileged buffoon, the hired bravo and his sister—partners in his guilty traffic—were, as before, represented by Signora Mario and Ronconi, Signor Tagliafico and Mad. Nantier-Didiée. The exception was a weighty one; but in this instance offered no cause whatever for dissatisfaction. It was said of the lady who played Gilda last year that she did not make us forget Mad. Bosio; but of Mad. Miolan Carvalho, who assumed the part on Saturday night, it may be stated, without flattery, that, in more respects than one, she actually revived the memory of that much-regretted artist. Perhaps—not even excepting Dinorah, her first and hitherto most successful portrayal in this country—Mad. Carvalho is more entirely at home with Rigoletto's unhappy daughter than with any other character in which the London public has been afforded an opportunity of judging her. Acting more thoughtfully, graceful, and unaffectedly natural could hardly be cited, nor singing more finished and expressive. True, the quality of her voice being eminently French, it lacks the rich tone and volume which we are not merely accustomed to find in Italian sopranos almost as a matter of course, but also very frequently in the Germans and English; and again, by the excessive strain upon the higher notes (the result, no doubt, of parts written by indifferent or selfish composers for her presumed exceptional means) the middle and lower registers have been materially enfeebled; but these drawbacks admitted, and there is no further room for criticism. If, indeed, Mad. Carvalho had studied the music of Gilda under the direct superintendence of Signor Verdi himself, she could not have read it more correctly. Not a point of expression is overlooked, not a brilliant trait fails of producing the contemplated effect.

Although the style of the music is so essentially different, Signor Mario's Duke of Mantua is in its way no less irreplicable than his Almaviva. As in the Barbiere, so in Rigoletto he has to make love; and in this especial branch of stage business he is wholly unrivalled. Nothing can surpass the natural grace and passionate intensity he exhibits in the duet with Gilda, where the passage already mentioned ("Addio! addio!") occurs; and never did Signor Mario more completely identify himself with the situation, or throw more fervid expression into every phrase. The charming air, "Questa o quella" (Act I., where the Duke vaunts in his own person that fickleness with which, in the more popular "La donna e mobile," he afterwards less gallantly charges the fairer sex, was, like its successor, admirably sung—the encore, as usual, however, being reserved for the last, given with that easy nonchalance which the situation strictly demands. If these airs were to change places for once, it is by no means certain that "Questa o quella"—the most elegant and original, if not absolutely the prettiest, of the two—would not carry off the palm. Side by side with Gilda and the Duke of Mantua stood in dark and gloomy contrast the Rigoletto of Signor Ronconi, now, as ever, one of the most consummate achievements of the lyric stage. A character more studiously developed, more carefully considered in all its various aspects, or more thoroughly successful as a dramatic portraiture from one end to the other, could not be named.

Venice Unvisited.

[From All the Year Round.]

The lovely city married to the ocean
Disturbs me with her image from afar;
A troublous motion
Of music drawn from other years
Dulls a long vision down to tears,
Made bright by distance and by height, which are
The birthright of a star.

I stand aloof like some sweet lover pining
By night without the lighted room where she
He loves is shining:
Who strains across a rushing wind
To watch her shadow on the blind.
And feel, while waiting at the trying-tree,
The face he cannot see.

I see her now, this Chatterton of cities!
The sea crawls up to kiss her from the South,
Crooning old ditties;
And standing far away I trace
The lie of beauty on her face,
And still the slothful sin and idle drowth
Seem sweet upon her mouth.

The seeds of love are running wild around her.
Her pride has fallen since the wealthy waves
Arose and crowned her;
The spirit of the past still roams
Her shrines and palaces and domes,
A spectral future broods above, and braves
The glory of her graves.

She took her dowry from immortal nations—
The many winds brought wedding-gifts and loud
Congratulations:
The words of peace were on her lips,
Her seas were dark with coming ships.
And, as she gained the bridegroom crown'd and proud,
The nations cried aloud.

The slothful sin fell on her, and she trembled
O'er her own image in the violet deep,
With pride dissembled;
She left her crowded streets and towers,
And decked her brow with idle flowers,
She dreamed away her fame, where waters keep
A music soft as sleep.

The function faded wholly with the duty.
But left the everlasting bane of grace
Which gave her beauty
She saw with unaffrighted heart
The ships forsake her empty mart;
But God had found her in her dwelling-place
And cursed her with her face.

But still the old immortal beauty lingers,
And still she weaves the flowers of other Springs
With fairy fingers:
And still she holds her unreprieved
Communion with a time removed,
Wafted from heaven on the golden wings
Of high imaginings.

Is it enough that she is lovely? lying Unsinewed till the populous sea recedes
And leaves her dying?
Or might she give, through pain and strife,
The beautiful a deeper life,
Rising erect on sin and slothful creeds
To treble it with deeds?

Peace to this Venice, though fulfilling never
The law that made her lovely; she must twine
Such flowers forever!
Before our English woods are rolled
In blowing mists of autumn gold,
I trust to kneel before her still divine
And unforgotten shrine.

Lisbon.—The artists engaged up to this time for the opera, by the maestro Fabricca are, Mad. Gazzaniga, Eliso Hensler, Emilia Bellini and Signori Agresti, Neri Beraldi, and Autonucci.

The Diarist Abroad

UTILE ET DULCE.

The houses of St. Gilgen are so clustered together, that one sees little from the windows of the inn of which a commentator can take note. Another village inn across the way, which probably shows signs of life only upon Sundays and holidays; a house not differing from others in outward appearance; which I take to be the school house; another in front of which sat a lazy scamp, whose business it is to look lugubrious and beg of travelers, when they stop to change horses and dine, and to sit in the shade and smoke a pipe at other times. In short there was not much to note upon the departure of the post coach—for I had taken passage no farther; a little deformed girl, who brought wild strawberries on a plate and sold them in the house for three kreuzers; a woman drawing a small wagon laden with grass, and the like.

So I walked down the street and passing the house, which cuts off the view from the inn, I soon came to the gate of the little church yard in which stands the small, but, within, rather gaudy church of St. Gilgen.

It is a beautiful custom, this of keeping the churches ever open. They are in the minds of all the people truly sacred places. And seldom are they without some silent worshipper—except in smaller villages, on bright harvest days. But even here the small sanctuary had been filled at early dawn by the people, who came to morning mass, like one great household around the family altar, before scattering to their various occupations on lake and mountain, in field and forest. My reason rebels at the dogmas, but my imagination is oft-times touched with the poetry of the ruling church here. You enter one of these little village churches or the vast cathedral of the cities; the same emblems, though of all degrees of artistic skill meet your eye; the same fragrance of incense lingers in the air; and on the Sabbath or the holiday, the same tones, are heard chanting the service at the altar. How easily did I understand the lady of one of the first of the literary men of Vienna, as she related to me, how, after some weeks of travel in North Germany, she came to Bonn and there, entering the old Dom church, felt herself at home!

There is not much to remark in the church at St. Gilgen. At the altar the usual hideous representations of the great Teacher; cheap and gaudy pictures on the walls; the kneeling desks bespattered with wax from candles; banners presented for pilgrimages to neighboring shrines or to be used in religious processions and sacred merry-makings; these and the like are all. I passed on into the grave yard. Here also is little to note but rows of graves, each covered by a sort of wooden sarcophagus filled with earth and planted with flowers, and small crosses at the head. But what I wanted specially to see was the small chapel built against the wall of the enclosure. The door was shut, but not fastened and I entered.

A small room some twenty feet perhaps by fifteen, and corresponding height; one large window on each side; four kneeling desks and seats against each wall; in a vaulted recess the altar, and behind it on either side a representation of one of the Marys in a sad taste of sorrow and distress, and of a Roman soldier keeping guard in front of an iron grating. Behind this stood a Christus in plaster, crowned with thorns and excessively bloody, with his hands fastened by real chains to the walls of his niche. On the cornices, which extend across the end wall are preserved a score or more of skulls, with names and dates painted on them, some with considerable artistic flourish, in showy letters on green grounds. Within the eyeless sockets spiders line and weave in the brain chambers very different webs from those with which the fancies of their sometime owners once filled them. A few pictures hang on the wall but nothing remarkable. What attracted my attention most strongly and gave me the most pleasure was a piece of sheet iron cut and painted to represent an altar bearing a chalice of flame, and fastened to the east wall like a monumental tablet. Below the cup of flame is a rather neatly painted miniature, which the painter informs the reader is "Sancte Vinzens," and below this is the inscription.

Hier ruhet die Asche des Hochadelgeborren Herren Vinzens Kayetan von Sonnenburg, er verstarb den 24ten November 1809 in Seiner 37ten Lebensjahre. Herr lass im ihn Frieden ruhen, und verleihe ihm einstens eine Fröhliche Auferstehung.

Blicke nicht trauernd in die Vergangenheit
Sie kommt nicht wieder, nütze Weisheit die Gegenwart
Sie ist dein, der düstern Zukunft geh ohne Furcht, mit mündlichem Sinne entgegen.

(Death's head and hour glass neatly painted.)
MDCCCIX.

In English.

"Here rests the ashes of the high-noble-born heir, Vincent Cayetan von Sonnenburg. He died on the 24th of November, 1809, in his 37th life-year. Lord let him rest in peace, and lend him in the future a joyful resurrection.

Look not mournfully into the past,
It comes not back again, wisely improve the present,
It is thine: Go forth to meet the shadowy future Without fear and with a manly heart."

A better educated village painter might have given us the inscription with fewer of the orthographical errors which I have carefully copied above; but what amount of genius and learning could have devised a more exquisite one?

I now read it in the original for the first time; for whether in 1851 I was looking for a marble monument or had a vague and vain expectation of finding the inscription in Longfellow's English words, of course I no longer remember; but certain it is that it escaped me; nor have I forgotten the feelings of bitter disappointment with which I went away from St. Gilgen—feelings at which even now I cannot smile. To-day my eye fell at once upon it. Indeed it is a most conspicuous object, just beyond the window on the left wall.

"Blicke nicht trauernd in die Vergangenheit,"

God bless him, who inscribed this on the tablet to the memory of the high-noble-born Kayetan von Sonnenburg!

It is but the walk of a minute or two from the church to the lake shore. It was too hot to loiter there, there being no shade trees to break the force of the sun's rays. Under some small fruit trees in an unenclosed hay-field, I found a place to sit and dream for a time. How still and calm and bright the waters! and with what vivid disturbance they reflected back from their depths, the hills and mountains around—as a pure mind is a mirror of all grand and noble thoughts and sentiments.

When the heat of the day was past I paid my bill at the Gasthaus of Franz Schöndorfer, and took a boat to St. Wolfgang. The boatman was a chatty fellow and knew the legends of the lake, which he gave with slight variations from the forms in which I had hitherto heard them.

First, as every reader of Hyperion knows, we passed the monument on the rocky islet hard by the southern shore. This was erected by the man, whose ox had brought him safely across the lake from yonder point, and had rescued him here. My man's version of the story was, that the man, who could not swim, held fast to the animal's tail and was thus dragged through the water; that during this middle passage he vowed the monument in case he escaped. I enquired if St. Wolfgang had aided him. My man however seemed not clear on this point, and I judge that he is not inclined to give that particular saint any extra share in this miraculous tale of a marvellous tail. Indeed he did not appear to have any very great veneration for that saint, although he knew his history—as related by tradition and the priests—and could point out the mountain, behind which, he had first settled, and the like. In fact, my impression was, on leaving my boatman an hour later, that St. Wolfgang was not such a tremendously, overwhelmingly, venerable, old, pious codger, after all.

A little farther on, on a point within which a pretty little cove opened is the next monument.

"And there," said I, "is the place where the bridal party was drowned."

"Yea."

"They were dancing on the ice?"

"Yes, all but the musicians, they were there on the shore."

"And all were drowned?"

"Yes. Fifty-two of them. None saved but the musicians."

And he gave me the date of the catastrophe, I have forgotten it, but I think it was over two hundred years ago. I gathered from him, though he did not express himself clearly, but like a man, who feels bound to believe a story against which his reason revolts, that the ice was thick and strong so that horses, carriages, even heavy teams crossed it with perfect safety; that, the bridal party being on their way across the lake left their vehicles (on wheels or runners?) placed their musicians, on the point, as a good substitute for a music stand, and began their ball; that they did this out of bravado—Trotz—(against whom?) and therefore the ice broke. I did not explain to him that the regular tramp of a small body of soldiers will break down a bridge, which is amply strong for ten times the number of people passing pell mell; and that one need not accuse that party of breaking any other than a natural law, in seeking the cause of the catastrophe.

Thence we passed onward and stepped in front of the precipice, renowned for its echo. The face of the rock is somewhat concave and hence the startling distinctness, with which it repeats your words or tones.

"Echo, bist z' haus?" (echo, are you at home?) began my man, and "Echo, bist z' haus?" came back somewhat softened, but with a clearness I never heard surpassed.

We talked, we sang, we whistled, we shouted and laughed and the great face of rock sent back every sound as the still waters below reflected the objects on the shore.

And so on, strain for strain through the waltz.

And how high is the precipice? I judged some one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet.

"No," said the boatman, "it is over seventy fathoms high." I was incredulous.

"Why," said he, "we are some two hundred fathom from the shore," which was equally difficult to believe until I observed the time from the utterance of a word until it came back as an echo—and then I saw that we must be at least a thousand feet from the shore, and that it might be fully four hundred feet high.

Before this however he had called my attention to a small vaulted niche cut in the face of the rock, containing the effigies of some saint or other, this was so small I could not for some time find it—it appeared perhaps as large as an infant four months old, and seemed to be placed some six or eight feet above the water. He assured me that the statue was of full adult size, in a niche the top of which a man can just reach from the floor, and which is some sixty feet above the surface of the lake. Reckoning the velocity of sound at between ten and eleven hundred feet per second the echo substantiates all these assertions.

But, verily, height and distance were marvelously deceptive.

Then we passed onward and soon came to still another monument, and this is the story that belongs to it.

Once on a time, before the Bavarian princes were called kings, and the reigning individual was called "his transparency" instead of "his majesty" one of the princesses of the line, with her retinue had come via Salzburg and St. Gilgen, and thence over the lake on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Wolfgang. This business having been happily accomplished, they all set out on their return; but after coming by the point yonder, on which now stands that small castle of a lighthouse, there came a storm down from the mountains, and drove the boat, of which the men had lost the management against the shore, just at that point. Now the danger was imminent, and her transparency was in great fear; and her fear was so great that then and there a little transparency came into the world in somewhat of a hurry—but no damage was done—the storm ceased, and all went on their way rejoicing, and so a monument was set up there.

"But what is that small building there on the point like a castle?"

"That is the lighthouse. You see, when the Kaiser, and the king of Bavaria and other high lordships met at Ischl, they come up here sometimes for fishing and sailing parties on the lake. And then the light is set to burning, and the house is dressed in flags and all goes to with a wondrous magnificence.

Turning the point we were soon on shore at the village of St. Wolfgang, which is clustered quite upon the water's edge. And what was of necessity, the first step after enjoying a room for the night at the inn?

What but to follow Flemming across the street, up the steps to the small court in which stands the bronze fountain, and read the inscription which was around the lower side of the ruin. To-day I saw no priest—no one but one of those persevering old nuisances, who will take no hint that they are not wanted, and who persist in following you about and explaining everything. I was forced at last to speak sharply to the old ass to get rid of him.

When here before, I remember well that the village Pfarrer came down the wooden stairs that lead up to the parsonage, and read me the inscription on the fountain:

"Ich bin zu den Eren sanct Wolfgang gemacht,
Abt Wolfgang Habel zu Mannsee hat mich betracht
Zu Nutz und zu frommen den armen pilgramb,
Dye nit haben gelt zum Wein
Dye sollen bei diesem Wasser freilich seyn.
Anno Dom. 1515 ist das Werk vollbracht."

The good-natured Pfarrer left a very pleasant impression on my memory, which now after nine years remains. But he brought no half crazed priest to talk with me on learning that I was an American; nor was anything said of Father Baraga, whom I had seen in 1848 on the shores of lake Superior—a small, withered, quiet man, living at l'Ause, and devoted to his Indians and his Ojibway Dictionary.

Above the bronze basin of the fountain are several small figures in the same metal, with the well known initials, A. D. Did Albrecht Dürer work in metals also? Dürer, "painter, sculptor, engraver, mathematician and engineer?" I suppose so—at all events the date tallies—for he died in 1528.

I had intended going on to Ischl in the evening, but the price demanded, I thought might be better spent in going a day to the Schöfberg, which towered above the other heights so grandly, and upon whose top the glass shewed a few visitors illumined by the sun long after he was down to us.

I stayed over night at St. Wolfgang—and though the weather next morning was bad, I ascended the mountain. Magnificent views rewarded me during the ascent as far as the Alps, and the Senner huts, on the broad shoulder of the mountain. Thence "darkness and clouds of awful state" settled over the path: and on the top, the only gratification, was one moment which photographed itself on the memory.

It was but for a moment; the cloud passed away and I looked far away down upon a sea of clouds, like the garments of angels bright and shining, and caught through their skirts glimpses of mountain and valley, hill and plain and dark green lakes, towns and villages and secluded hamlets, transfigured and glorified. A. W. T.

P. S.—Is any reader of this, bound to this part of the world? And will he make this little tour or detour, on his way from Munich to Vienna? Then let him come to St. Gilgen from Salzburg—thence ascend the Schofberg, if he has good weather,—and spend the night—it will pay! Next morning return to St. Gilgen, take a boat thence to St. Wolfgang. From St. Wolfgang a boat to Strobe, in the afternoon, and thence take the omnibus to Ischl.

A Short Guide to Full Score Playing.*

When an invented piece of music is to be performed by an entire orchestra, each instrument must be given its individual share. As all bear a proper harmonic proportion to each other, and should sound to the hearer as though forming a sole instrument, the composer should lay out a plan of his work for general view; this is called a full score. It should be written bar for bar, all the parts above one another; by this means, it is possible at one glance to judge of a combination, as well as of harmonies, position of chords, separate passages, &c., individually or in mutual relations. Ancient composers had the laudable habit of figuring the bass of their scores; this, like many other useful customs, has disappeared; and, to speak candidly, we fear that many a natural composer would occasionally find it hard to give strict reckoning of his intellectual products—to mark the fundamental part with regular figures—and, by them, openly declare, "this is what I wish!"—"thus have I intended!" To play from a score thus figured, merely requires a good knowledge of thorough-bass; and the accompaniment will be similar to, though poorer, than that of many instruments. To supply the place of these, a player from score should endeavor to give a faithful sketch of all peculiarities in each part, and to seize the meaning of the composer, in harmony, progressions of subject, treatment of divers instruments, and general elaboration. This is real full score playing—a masterly art, which Rossini admired as a miracle, and which must appear such to the uninitiated, who can scarcely comprehend how an entire page may be read at one glance, while both hands render it intelligible to an audience. It cannot be denied that the task is difficult, and can only be achieved by long practice; universal rules cannot be given, but well-intentioned hints and experienced results may be written down for the benefit of beginners. The first requisite for a full score player is an intimacy with all five clefs; next to this, he must never be confused by the instrumental parts which are written in a key different to their sound—such as, for instance, horns in D, E♭, E, F, G, A, B♭, which, like trumpets and drums, are written in C—clarinets in A or B—basset and English horns, &c.; he must always be prepared to transpose them readily to their proper position. Before playing a full score, it is advisable to examine the order in which the instruments are placed; it is much to be desired that some law should be agreed upon on this subject, which would greatly facilitate performance; unfortunately, this is not the case, and each composer acts as he chooses; for instance, Italians usually write, in the first place, both violins—then the wind-instruments, the viola, trumpets, drums, voices, and the bass; others write the brass-band at the top; some insert the voices in the middle—and so forth. Perhaps the easiest and most natural order would be this:—the top line be given to the flutes, as these instruments generally contain high three-stroke and four-stroke notes, and therefore require the greatest blank paper; then may follow, hautboys, clarinets, horns, bassoons, trombones, trumpets, and drums, by which arrangement the upper half of a page unites the entire wind band; the remaining staves may be given to the violins, violas (if a vocal composition, all the voices), the violoncellos and double-bass. As the stringed instruments are often employed alone, it cannot be denied that it is an advantage to place them in close juxtaposition; and, if the first-mentioned order be followed, it will be necessary to search for the two essentially principal parts—bass and treble—at the farthest opposite poles. In vocal compositions, a player from full score must be guided, in a great measure, by the presence or absence of singers; should the vocal parts be appropriately sung, he need only occupy himself with the accompanying instruments; when this is not the case, his first duty is to render perceptible voice-parts containing a melody, and, if there should be tenor or bass, he must play them an octave higher with the right hand, in order that the flow of the song may be perfectly distinguished. The same should be done, when any instrument has to perform a solo-passage; the part must be individualized, and the accompanying complement be subordinate. It is permitted to every player, to accommodate compositions to his hand; that is, to arrange passages which are not adapted to pianoforte playing, so that they should be convenient to the fingers—care being taken not to injure peculiar characteristics. For instance, when a clarinet or horn contains an arioso, while violins accompany in arpeggio semiquavers, the right hand should perform the cantabile, and the left the accompaniment, properly modified; the little finger of the left hand should always strike the fundamental tones of the bass, that the position of the chords may remain unchanged, and that the rolling underpart should not create, by chance, a chord of the fourth and sixth, instead of a perfect triad. It often happens that several obligato passages in different instruments occur simultaneously, in which case it is impossible for two hands to represent them all.

Good judgment must at once decide what is most important, and what is best omitted; the lesser of two evils must be chosen, and a player should retain, in preference, those parts which would make most lasting impression on the ear if the piece were performed by a full orchestra, of which he is the representation—his faithful sketch must clearly render delicate shades and touches, as well as general outline. The fuller the harmonies, and the more perceptible individual peculiarities are read, the greater the praise due to the full score player. We need hardly remind a discreet accompanist, that vocal pieces are best treated with delicate and intentional moderation.

In recitatives, it may be advisable to give the commencing note of the voice part in the concluding chord of the accompaniment, as this will facilitate intonation for the singer. It must be clear to all, that a full score is absolutely necessary; by it, a composer is able to review his creation—he perceives beforehand the effect of the whole, and judges the mutual connections of the principal and subordinate parts—he can examine the correctness of his work, and improve any accidental defect, and thus give up his production of art in completed perfection. A full score offers great advantages to the initiated; by the mere reading or playing of it, on a pianoforte, he becomes as intimate with a composition as though he had himself created it. His eager eye may discover the design, construction, elaboration, and interweaving of all ideas—the united result of many component parts; nothing need escape him. If he can, in addition, imagine the charm of different instrumental tones, he enjoys as high a pleasure as those who listen to a performance of the same work by a union of musicians. But, precisely, this proper judgment of the manifold effect of divers instruments is a stumbling block to many composers, who cannot possibly be expected to play on all instruments, or to be familiar with their individual treatment, or even to be sufficiently furnished with the knowledge indispensable to their appropriate employment with fullest effect and peculiar beauty. When we consider how deficient orchestras were some few years ago, especially in the wind parts, which were still in their infancy—how, in modern times, not only the instruments themselves have been essentially perfected, but the performers thereon have so improved, that passages formerly reserved for concertos, are now entrusted to ripieno-players (whether rightly or not, remains unproved); when we recollect the laughable, but well meant warning of a certain chapel director, who, with the important mien of a field marshal, called out to his band, "Attention, gentlemen! semiquaver notes are coming!" and contrast this with a performance of one of Beethoven's gigantic symphonies; and when we lose ourselves in admiration of the unimagined effects created by this horde of musical art, who majestically trod the path prepared by Haydn and Mozart, and followed by Cherubini, Mehul, Spohr, Carl Maria von Weber: when we reflect on all these things,—who would not exclaim, with heartfelt conviction, "Vita brevis, ars longa!" In the same manner that newly discovered celestial bodies ever present themselves to the armed eye of astronomers, so also does never resting Time, at measured intervals, create beaming planets in the musical horizon; for art is eternal, and only the royal eagle may gaze unharmed on the sun. It is certain that one of the most dangerous rocks to an inexperienced composer, is the advantageous employment of united masses of instruments, which sometimes produce an effect quite unexpected, and not realizing his original intention. Every one must pay, so to speak, an apprentice fee—errando discimus. Individual experience will instruct scholars by degrees, and lead them into the right path. The study of really classic scores—the repeated hearing of such works—a careful comparison of effect, and the ways and means of producing it—friendly consultations with practical musicians, as to the capabilities and treatment of their appropriate instruments—constant essays, which, however, must be considered such, and not perfected masterpieces,—all these things will render steady service to a disciple of the art—will enlarge, correct, and enrich his views—and lead him, after happily-concluded and usefully-improved apprenticeship years, to a resting-place, from whence he may view his musical creations with an assured glance, and may safely prognosticate and guarantee the effects created in them.—London Musical Times, August 1.

Madame Fabbri and the Georgian.

A gentleman styling himself "A German reader of the Sunday Mercury," favors us with the following translation of an "art anecdote" which recently appeared in the Staats Zeitung of this city. The personages concerned are, Madame Richard Mulder (Madame Fabbri) and a musical Southern person:

THE PRIMA DONNA AND THE GEORGIAN.

During this "heated term," our great metropolis is as desolate, in the musical line, as a Siberian village, nearly all our lyrical cèlèbres spending their time in the rural districts.

Madame Fabbri, our celebrated countrywoman, fled with the rest of the prime donne from the dusty city, and is now rusticated at the beautiful Bergen Heights, on Staten Island (?) and resting from her severe labors last season with Verdi, to whom no singer ever did fuller justice than herself.

A few days ago, this favorite artiste was seated at her piano, studying an aria from "Lucrezia Borgia," an opera in which she is to sing next season. She was singing mezzo voce, whilst her husband accompanied her on the instrument, when all at once, there appeared upon the veranda, which surrounds the entire house, an exceedingly tall young man, accompanied by a shorter individual. The former deliberately advanced into the apartment, and, after introducing himself, said to the astonished prima donna:

"That is from Lucrezia," referring to the aria.

"Yes, sir."

"Sing it again," if you please."

Mr. Mulder, the lady's husband, thought that this was coming it rather too strong, and remarked, indignantly:

"My wife, sir, does not sing, she is studying."

"Never mind; she can sing from 'Lucrezia Borgia,'" replied the irrepressible intruder. "I am an American from Georgia; I arrived yesterday, and can only stop a few days. I have heard so much of Madame Fabbri, I came to hear her. I will pay you; how much do you desire?"

Thoroughly incensed by this insolent speech, Mr. Mulder informed the gentleman from Georgia that if he wanted to hear Madame sing, he might go to the Academy next winter, and pay, and hear her there. But all was of no avail; the bold intruder was inexorable in his demand, and prayed that the lady would gratify him. To rid herself of the enthusiast Madame Fabbri at length said:

"Very well, I will sing—not from Lucrezia, but from Ernani."

Mr. Mulder saw that his wife had adopted the most advisable plan, under the circumstances, and took his seat again at the piano. Fabbri executed the splendid aria, "Ernani, invola mi," with that intensity of expression which distinguishes her as an artiste, who, with Cortesi and Gazzaniga, forms the only trefoil of dramatic, soul-stirring singers, who, by their exquisitely passionate vocalization, have and will ever please an audience more than those singers who win applause by running chromatic scales and indulging in mechanical bravuras.

Whilst Fabbri sang, the enthusiastic Georgian gave vent to his delight by exclaiming, "Beautiful!" with such sincere zest, that Madame could hardly restrain her laughter.

"Now sing from Lucrezia," he said as soon as she finished.

"In eight days I will sing to you from Lucrezia," she replied.

"Very well," responded the Southerner, bowing profoundly, and shaking hands. "In eight days," and he made his exit in the airy style of his entrance. Entertaining and amusing as such little adventures may be, Mr. Mulder has made preparations to check, in future, all such enthusiasts—especially such persevering ones as the tall young gentleman from Georgia.

Personal Recollections of Beethoven in 1822.

(From the German of Fr. Rochlitz.)

I had never seen Beethoven, therefore I wished all the more earnestly that I might soon meet him. I mentioned the matter almost immediately after my arrival in Vienna, to —, his intimate friend. "He is living in the country," said the latter. "Let us visit him there then." "We might do so, but his unfortunate deafness has made him by degrees, misanthropical. He knows that you have been intending to visit Vienna, he wishes to make your acquaintance, and yet we are not sure that he may not run away if he sees us approaching; for he is often seized, irresistibly, and without the slightest cause, with the deepest depression, as well as with the freshest humor. But he comes to town at least once a week, and always visits us on such occasions, because we take charge of his letters and the like. He is then usually in good spirits, and we can hold him fast. If, therefore, you will indulge the poor, tried soul enough to suffer us to let you know as soon as he comes, and then would drop in—it would be only a few steps for you—as if by accident—" I, of course, gladly accepted this proposition. On the next Saturday morning the messenger came. I went and found Beethoven in lively conversation with —. He is accustomed to the latter, and can understand him tolerably by reading the motions of his lips and the play of his features. — introduced us to each other. Beethoven seemed pleased, but somewhat disturbed. And if I had not been prepared the sight of him would have disturbed me, too. Not his neglected, almost wild appearance, not his thick black hair, which hung around his head in disorder, and the like, but his whole appearance. Imagine a man of about fifty, rather short than otherwise, but broad and strongly built, thickset—largeboned, particularly—somewhat like F—, but more fleshy, and with a fuller, rounder face; ruddy, healthy color; restless, sparkling eyes, which when gazing fixedly at anything became almost piercing: hasty in his movements when he moved at all; the expression of his face, particularly that of his eye (so full of life and mind) a mixture of or a transition between the most cordial kindness and reserve; in his whole deportment, that excitement, that restless listening which is peculiar to a sensitive deaf person; at one time throwing out a freely and cheerfully spoken word; the next moment sinking back into gloomy silence, and added to all this the feeling which every observer brings with him, and which mingles with it all. This is the man who gives joy to millions—pure, spiritual joy! He made several polite and complimentary remarks to me, in short, abrupt sentences; I raised my voice as much as possible, spoke slowly, and enunciated distinctly, and in this manner, expressed to him, from my inmost heart, my gratitude for his works, and what they are to me and will be during my whole life. I named some of my favorites and descended upon them; I told him of the unexampled performance of his symphonies in Leipzig, of their all being brought out during every winter season, to the utmost delight of the public, etc. He stood close by me, sometimes looking earnestly into my face, sometimes bowing his head; then he would smile to himself, sometimes nodding pleasantly, but without saying a word. Had he understood me or not? At last I had to come to an end; he pressed my hand vehemently, and said, abruptly, to —, "I have still some necessary errands!" and in leaving, to me, "We shall meet again, I hope!" — left the room with him. I was much affected and agitated. In a few moments — returned. "Did he understand what I said?" I asked. — shrugged his shoulders: "Not one word!" We were silent a long time, and I will not say how deeply moved I was. At last I asked: "Why did you not at least repeat to him some of the things I said, as he understands you tolerably?" "I did not like to interrupt you, and he is easily irritated. I hoped, too, that he might understand something, but the noise in the street, your voice and accent, which were strange to him, and, perhaps, even his anxiety to understand you, because he could see well that you were saying agreeable things to him—he was so sad!" I cannot describe the state of mind in which I left him. He who enchants the whole world with his sounds, hears not a single one, not even the sound which brings him the thanks of his fellow men—it only gives him pain. I almost resolved never to see him again, and to transmit Mr. H.'s commission to him in writing.

Franz Schubert.

This is the age of "revivals." Not to glance at the Operas, where Gluck and Weber are being resuscitated, but to confine ourselves to the pianoforte and instrumental chamber music, simultaneously with a revival of the works of Jean Louis Dussek (more leisurely but as surely) is being effected a revival of the works of Franz Schubert. By means of these "revivals,"—unlike some others of the present day that might be named,—we are returning to a purer worship than has for some time prevailed. Of Dussek we have lately said enough; but a word or two about Schubert, and especially about Schubert as an instrumental composer, may not be without interest.

The pianoforte writings of Franz Schubert possess much of the romantic character that distinguishes more or less every one of his well-known songs. They are numerous, of all varieties of form, and, though they have achieved a far less degree of popularity than his vocal compositions, are scarcely inferior to them in genius and originality.

We may perhaps shock the prejudices of many in avowing our opinion that Schubert, from a certain point of view, was a somewhat overated man. That he has "a spark of the divine fire" is not to be questioned. The concession wrung from the haughty, and occasionally prejudiced, Beethoven, may be accepted as rather an epigrammatic than a strictly just expression of the truth. "A spark of the divine fire" was in Schubert, no doubt—nay, more, a flame. He was, however, neither a universal nor a commanding genius; nor was he a musician of very profound acquirement. He belonged to that order of composers and poets, so numerous in Germany, of which Carl Maria von Weber is the most illustrious representative. From peculiarity of intellect and temperament these musicians would probably have reached eminence in any pursuit to which the circumstances of early life and education might have conducted them. Their organization was not, as in the instances of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and the greater composers, so happily attuned to music that it were absurd to deny their being chosen instruments of Heaven to delight the world with melody. Thorough enthusiasts, with quasi-morbid natures, they seem ever lamenting their incapacity to set forth in plain and convincing language the thoughts that struggle for utterance within them. The antipodes of common-place, they are, notwithstanding, all more or less in trammels. Such men can hardly fail to meet with ardent worshippers—natures like their own, yearning for the impossible, disdaining self-evident truths, with minds attuned to their own in sympathetic discord. These proclaim Schubert and the rest the only true prophets, and advocate their pre-eminence over every rival.

What has been denominated the "Romantic School" is clearly traceable to Weber, Schubert, and their imitators and disciples, who in eager quest of a new and more striking language, have unconsciously given circulation to endless mannerisms, upon which the more ordinary sort of music-makers have laid hold to make their own emptiness pass current. But Schubert must be carefully separated from the imposters who make art subservient to the double-end of show and traffic. He neither held out wares for sale in a bazaar, nor exhibited them as a picture-monger, still less as a polichinello, to the vacant gaze of the illiterate mob. Schubert was a man of strong convictions, besides being a man of truly imaginative genius. That he did not succeed in becoming a thoroughly practised musician was partly due to an incomplete education, partly to a stubborn organic deficiency. As painter, poet, or novelist—anything indeed but arithmetician, mathematician, logician—Schubert would have attained an equal celebrity, and have displayed quite as powerful an individuality as distinguished his career as a musical inventor.

But to leave more speculation; in various symphonies, overtures, quartets, &c., Schubert evinced a strong desire to excel in the sonata form. Disdaining, however or failing to understand entirely its indispensable conditions—clearness, consistency, symmetrical arrangement of themes, keys, and episodic matter—he was by no means as successful as he could have wished. Though gifted with an abundant flow of ideas, Schubert was wanting in the faculty of condensation and methodical disposition of parts. He accepted all that presented itself to his fancy, rejecting nothing as inappropriate or superfluous; and then, while rarely insipid, nay almost invariably interesting, he is too often diffuse, obscure, and exaggerated. Occasionally, in place of developing the principle subject of a movement, he conducts an accidental phrase, a simple figure of ornament, a fragment of remplissage, through a labyrinth of progression and modulation, until the ear becomes fatigued, and satiety gives way to revulsion. In six grand sonatas for the pianoforte solus—which if length, vastness of proportion, and ambitious endeavour were enough to constitute perfection, might rank with the finest of Beethoven, or the most impassioned of Dussek—exuberance of detail, want of connexion, excessive modulation, redundant episode, strange and unnatural harmonies, and other glaring defects, lessen the impression that would otherwise be produced by many exquisite and undeniable beauties. A grand duet in A minor, also for the pianoforte, exhibits the same inconsistencies, amidst merits that are not to be contested. The minor works of Schubert for the same instrument—especially some marches and short characteristic pieces—are remarkably attractive; but in these, not being limited to set forms, his ideas are presented in their primitive simplicity, without any attempt at development. Here, for the reasons thus briefly stated, Schubert is quite as happy as in his best compositions for the voice.

For all who have a touch of romance in their dispositions, the pianoforte works of Schubert, like everything else that came from his pen, must possess a strong measure of interest. There is something fascinating in the tone of melancholy that marks even his smallest effusions, while the unquestionable originality of his ideas places him altogether beyond the pale of ordinary thinkers, and extorts forgiveness for the absence of those qualities which have conferred durability as well as charm on the faultless models bequeathed us by the great masters. We have said enough to explain why Schubert—like Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, &c.—should be assigned a place apart from his contemporaries; but the peculiarities that have won him this distinction have, in another sense, prevented him from exercising any decided influence on the progress of the art, of which he was a gifted, if incomplete, disciple.—London Musical World, July 21.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 25, 1860.

On the 7th of July last, the editor of the Journal of Music sailed for Europe to pass some months there. We present to-day to our readers the first instalment of his Correspondence with the Journal, which will be continued regularly, as circumstances may permit, during his absence.

To the numerous correspondents and friends of the Journal, it is perhaps useless to say that their communications, always most acceptable, will be doubly welcome during the absence of Mr. Dwight; nor can we omit to ask the kind indulgence of our readers for the many shortcomings of our editorial columns until the time of his return, for which we trust that his letters will make ample compensation.

Editorial Correspondence.

I.

PARIS, July 23, 1860.

But two weeks absent from our post, we hail our readers from another world—another age it seems. Because between two worlds has rolled that vague, vast, heaving and unsettled no-world of an Ocean; a life of idle and entire abandon; a state of enforced rest, rest from one's own life, because of the very restlessness of the wild element; a suspension of life, as it were, between two lives, the one of memory and home, the other of novelty and hope and wonder. And this has made it seem so long. Thanks to its monotony, thanks to the impossibility of work or care or thought, it has given us the long rest in a short time, which the unstrung energies so needed.

Whether to love or hate the ocean I am unresolved. Once escaped from him I loathe the thought of reëmbarking on his lap; yet I owe a debt of gratitude for many a kindly service; owe him a thousand pleasant memories and new experiences; now grand, now beautiful, now droll, fantastical and wondrous strange; new phases of nature, and new phases of humanity (for were we not a little world there cooped up and isolated from all else, in the centre of a great undulating, empty circle, like the saved remnant of mankind in Noah's ark, with nothing else to do but learn to know each other?) And pleasant subjects for the most part they were too; more than studies; one found himself becoming more and more attached to every one and could not quarrel with the destiny which brought him into close relation with that chance gathering of two hundred strangers. Yes, I thank the Ocean; and chiefly that he made a child of me, and rocked me in his cradle, and stole away the thread of care, and tipped over the work-table of thought, and tripped up the heels of firm-set, would-be continuous volition, throwing one back upon a primitive simplicity of wondering sensations, unconnected dreams and observations, childlike trust and freedom from all care about oneself, and consequently fresh interest in all about him. That state once reached, not without appetite destroyed and sickening qualms for so long time as kindly nature knew to be the best, and there were many hours of keen zest to relieve the dull monotony of life at sea. How fondly could we look back over it and lingeringly sketch it all, reproducing each day's pocket notes, if there were room or time!

The only thing literally musical about our voyage was at the start. It was a lively and inspiring scene, that bright noon of a breezy Saturday, the 7th of July, when we went on board the splendid German steamship, the "New York." The passengers, as well as crew, were mostly German; and we were not surprised, therefore, that something like a musical Godspeed was improvised. A brass band came on board and played national airs; and a Liederkrantz society came also to take leave of one of their comrades, and standing in a circle on the deck sang some of their part-songs, and uncorked a basket of champagne; and thus ran the burthen of their loudest lied:

"Dus welte Atlantische Meer!
Wenn's alles Champagner Wör!
(The wide Atlantic sea,
If it all of Champagne might be!) &c.

Presently the stalwart figure of our German captain, a hearty, noble looking personage, with golden beard and peach-ripe hue of face, like one just stepped down from the sun, a very type of some old Norseman, kindly as brave, loomed on the bridge. He gives the word, and we are moving, and all moving round us, and amid chorus, shouts, and waving handkerchiefs, we sail down the harbor, merry as a marriage feast, not realizing that we have left the world, past lovely Staten Island, past the Hook, until by six o'clock the lessening shores have vanished and we are fully out of sight of land. A dull, grey, leaden waste of waters only round us; a dull, grey, leaden sky above. No touch of color anywhere; it is like what was before the world, "without form and void," monotonous negation. And this is the boundless Ocean! How the want of color robs it of all suggestion of infinitude! How the infinite itself shrinks to a most finite, narrow and mean little circle (we prisoners in the centre of it), for want of the very variety and individual detail of the finite! Vast it is and boundless; but boundless abstraction and monotony is not genial to our feeling, and so hoops us round with the most painful sense of limitation. And then such desolation, isolation, solitude! Would the leaden rim and the horizon only stretch, and it would feel less lonely, for the soul would thus expand with it.

Cold and foggy all the next day; even fog suggests more freedom and more grandeur than that leaden and defined horizon. But it is a rolling, qualmy sea. We must be rocked now till we can resign ourselves: this the lesson of this first Sunday on the ocean. Tossed in the lap of restlessness, it may be, all-devouring, nothingness! What change could be more complete? What else in so few hours could isolate us so remote from all that we have called our life? And, to aggravate the solitude, one listens vainly for a sound, except sounds of our own making, or the ceaseless wash of waves resisting our intruding keel. The sea, our world, our prison, is as dumb as it is colorless. Many a time, both then and when its surface was enjoyable, we longed for music—some great symphony or chorus, myriad-voiced, to animate and humanize and realize the abstract form of music, the wide weltering rhythm all about us. Absurd wish! There would be no need of symphonies nor Beethovens, could such be summoned bodily wherever one might want them. Art is to inform the soul, that the soul itself out of its own life may in turn inform the wilderness of sea or land. And sometimes, in good hours, as one watches the motion and the color of the waves in all their glory, and their moody changes, how the music that he loves, with shifting dreams of other music like it, mingles their motion! how memories of home and friends, of all the tender, deep, or earnest passages of life, how one's life-plans and aspirations sing themselves, in strains remembered or imagined, to that else voiceless rhythm of wild waves! And then he thanks the masters of the tone-world for the grander meaning which their inspirations evoke from the vague, strange element.

With returning health and appetite, the next day, the sun returns to touch the waves with color and with wondrous life and beauty. But we are no painters, and we shall not try to reproduce the gentler and the wilder moods of ocean; the great waves gleaming and blackening in the sunshine; the white crests, topping the great waves in the far horizon giving it the familiar look of hill-side landscape dotted with white cottages and mansions; the glorious sunsets, now in misty mezzotinto contrast of mere dark and light, à la Martin's pictures, the sun-streak shooting across a sea of gleaming black, like gold on ebony, and now of richest purple glow: the wierd, wild night scene, when our great black masts and sails loomed gigantic, spectre-like, before us and above us, right against the rising moon, into whose very face we seemed to go plunging and driving; the soft, warm, silvery, misty blue days, as we kept along the edge of the Gulf Stream, "all in a summer sea"; the mornings with stiff breeze, and great mountainous waves, and cold as mountain tops; the angry squall; and then those lovely dreamy days, when the sea was smooth and blue as one imagines among Grecian isles, and one could almost fancy temples and white marble statues rising here and there—a clear, blue, lustrous mirror of a sea, a perfect circle, and we in its very centre, set in framework of most delicate and exquisitely shaped pearly clouds encircling the entire horizon. By this time we knew each other well enough, and found world enough within our ark, and in its little curious events, to take away the sense of solitude upon the ocean. Otherwise how utter were that solitude! For three whole days we did not see a sail: how easily, by a slight change of course, one gets beyond the limits where the poetry is true about the ocean "whitened by the sails of commerce"! We learned that the ocean has its highways; and our prudent course, a few points south of the usual one, kept us away not only from "the banks," the fogs, the icebergs, but also from the company of ships.

—England hid herself in mist, and gave us a surly, rainy, cold reception on the morning of the eleventh day, when we were running along her southern coast. No New England easterly rain in March could have been drearier than that morning in the middle of July. Had we broken in upon the Lion's sleep unseasonably? All day chilly, rainy, with some fits of frigid and unwilling sunshine; but enough to show us that green land did actually exist once more and that we were still in this world. How one longed to jump on shore and take a good run on those grassy slopes. In the afternoon the (to us) surprise of a partial eclipse of the sun added to the doubtful omens. But the night was clear; a great warm planet shot a cordial gleam across the wave to us, the Great Bear and the other constellations looked down friendly; all kept awake with expectation, and in the first faint streaks of daybreak, after sending up rockets and blue lights to herald our approach, we anchored off Cowes, just then the residence of royalty, the Queen's yacht lying alongside of us, the turret of the palace in which she was then (let us hope) asleep, rising in sight behind a wooded hill; and gradually the dawn revealed the lovely shores and hills of the green Isle of Wight, the garden of England, and nest of her laureate. Into the full day we watched the scene of fairy-like enchantment—the very color of the sea was strange, of a much lighter green than on our shores—waiting for the little boat that was to take off those of us whose destiny was Havre and not Bremen.

A beautiful hour's trip between green shores, noble mansions, towers, a ruined abbey, &c., brought us to Southampton, where there were two days to wait that were not in our programme. Two days, in spite of intermittent rains, delightfully spent. I for one did not regret the interpolation of two long summer days of the rich old rural life of England. What a zest they had after the long middle passage! And how much of a new life one may taste, nay, take into his own experience, in two good days! Let us thank our stars for that one bite into the ripe side of the peach of England. The old seaport itself nestled in rich green country, crowded with ships and steamers from all countries (some seventy steam-ships stop here on their passage), its broad quays lined with elegant hotels, both English, French, Italian, German, and what not, with corresponding motley promiscuity of costume in the streets, was a lively spectacle for one day. It has its antiquities, too; ivy covered remnants of old walls and castles from the feudal days, when there were French invasions. Street music in all forms was rife here, from the barrel organ to the small German band of brass, or almost orchestra with fiddles, of which there are some six or eight employed to play evenings in front of the principal hotels. Sometimes a harp or guitar prelude caught the ear, and presently a voice, then two, in parts, sometimes a quartet was heard. The strangest thing about it was to hear familiar Ethiopian melodies! But commonly the music and the execution were some grades higher in their character than we have in the streets of Boston or New York. There was evidence enough that music enters pretty largely into the popular life of merry England.

(Conclusion next week.)

MR. S. B. MILLS' SOIREE.—This pianist, of whom our readers have already heard something, gave to an invited company, a most delightful soirée at Messrs. Hallett & Davis' piano rooms on Wednesday evening, which after long weeks of no music was a veritable oasis in the desert. For such an oppressive evening in the dog-days, the programme was judiciously chosen, no long sonatas or protracted fugues, taxing the languid attention of the hearer, but dreamy impromptus and fairy like fantasias of Chopin, stirring and sparkling transcriptions of Liszt, fell on the charmed ear, as refreshing as showers after a burning day of summer. The audience was indeed a critical one, embracing all the professional pianists of the city, and of skilful amateurs not a few, and the unanimity of approval, and warmth of applause from such an audience was a flattering testimonial to the genuine excellence and brilliancy of the performance. Mr. Mills has remarkable powers of execution, combining rare delicacy of touch, with great force and power, and unsurpassed correctness in rendering the most difficult and intricate passages of those masters of difficulty and intricacy from whose works he played. He is a worthy peer of Mason and Jaell in the qualities which he has named, and will be a concert pianist of rare attractiveness. The last of the three pianos used on the occasion, (of course, Hallett & Davis') gave much satisfaction to the audience, and stood excellently the severe test of the pianist's vigorous execution, and of the oppressive and trying atmosphere of the evening.

New Publications.

From George Willig, Jr., Baltimore. EASY AND PROGRESSIVE PIANO FORTÉ INSTRUCTOR. Written expressly for the use of Female Seminars. By James M. Deems. 48 pp.

This is a simple elementary instruction book for beginners on the piano. Among the great multitude of such books, this seems to be well adapted for the purpose and a useful guide for young pupils.

THE MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE ORGAN.—A New, Progressive and Practical Method, comprising a History and Description of the Organ, Elementary Instruction, Exercises and Voluntaries in all Styles of Playing the Organ (without Pedals), Pedal Playing, Combination of Stops, Voluntaries, and Pieces suited to all occasions. By John Zundel, Organist and Director of Music at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Price, $3.00. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Mr. Zundel is well known as one of the best organ players and most successful organ teachers in the country. A pupil of Rinck, he, of course, has studied in the best school, and by his performance and his works shows how fit he has become to teach. This book is the most thorough and comprehensive instruction book for the organ that we have yet seen.

It is divided into three parts. Part I. comprises a history and description of the organ, elementary instruction, exercises, and voluntaries in all styles of playing the organ, (without pedals). Part II. is devoted to Pedal Playing, giving exercises for the alternate use of the right and left foot, in crossing the feet, substituting one foot for the other, octave playing, and exercises on the shake. It contains trios selected from Rinck, also selections from Best, and others. Part III. contains instructions in the combination of the stops, and choice organ compositions of the great masters, and of the author. The selections are from Rinck, Bach, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Best.

The book also contains many admirable suggestions on organ building and church music that are full of good sense and worthy the attention of church committees and clergymen as well as of organists. No one who faithfully studies this work, can fail to gain a respectable degree of skill in playing the grandest of instruments.

NEW VOLUNTARIES, PRELUDES AND INTERLUDES For the Organ, Harmonium, or Melodeon. By C. H. Rinck. Price, 75 cents. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co. 277 Washington Street, Boston.

What can be more fit to follow the instruction book than these well known preludes of the famous Rinck, who has done so much in our time towards creating a true organ style. There are no operatic fantasias in this book, but good solid real organ music, which should be known by heart, almost, by any one who touches an organ.

Musical Chit-Chat.

MR. S. A. BANCROFT, the organist of the Mt. Vernon Church, has just returned home from an extended but rapid tour in Europe. He will be gladly welcomed by his many friends here.

HAVERHILL, MASS.—The Messrs. Hook of Boston have just finished a large organ for the North Church in this place, which is highly commended by those who have heard it. At the opening, the choir of the Old South Church took part in the musical performances, assisted by Mrs. Kempton and others. The organ was played by various organists of Boston and Haverhill, and appears to have given great satisfaction.

NEWPORT.—Patti gave a grand concert under the direction of Maurice Strakosch, at Newport, on Friday, in the Ocean Hall, which was attended by a numerous and brilliant audience. Her reception was enthusiastic. It is feared that Fort Adams, in which Mr. Helmsmüller has been giving his delightful musical entertainments on Thursday afternoons, will be closed, because some heedless people disobey the government regulation by riding across the lawn within the fortification. A concert and soiree dantesque for the benefit of Carl Bergmann's Atlantic orchestra, at which the distinguished pianiste, Madame Johnson Graever, kindly and voluntarily performed, took place on Thursday evening.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—Mr. John Zundel, the well known organist, gave a concert at the Plymouth Church in this place to a large audience. Everybody seemed to be highly pleased by the new and varied effects produced by Mr. Zundel's performance on the organ, and also by the exquisite singing of Mrs. Kate Bennett Shelly. The choruses brought out were gems of Mr. Zundel's composition, being selections from his newly published "Psalmody" and "Introit"—the latter a collection of excellent anthems. Let us have from time to time, more of this sort of playing and singing, and there will shortly be a perceptible and wholesome increase of interest in the subject of Church music, which cannot fail to be of service both to community at large, and to the members of the musical profession, male and female.—Rochester Democrat.

Gottschalk the pianist, who has been at Cuba for some months, left Havana on the 7th by the regular British steamer for St. Thomas. He intends spending the summer months at Venezuela, and will be back at Havana early in October, to take his post at the Tacon Theatre, as leader of the orchestra.

Our old friend Bettini, of the Imperial Italian Opera of St. Petersburg, has been singing in concerts at Baden, and given great delight by his charming voice and excellent method.

The King of Saxony has pardoned Richard Wagner, who had been compromised in the events of 1848. The decree of amnesty was forwarded to M. Wagner at Paris, by telegraph.

The opera season just closed at Her Majesty's Theatre, in London, is pronounced a ruinous one to the manager. He expended over £15,000 ($75,000) in stage furniture, chandeliers, mirrors, carpets, sofas, and other costly fittings, and his company was numerous beyond precedent. The list of names is worth preserving as a curiosity. The female performers were Titiens, Borghi Mamo, Piccolomini, Lotti della Santa, Marie Cabel, Brunetti, Lemaire, Vaneri, Michal and Alboni. The males were Giuglini, Mongini, Belart, Violetti, Everardi, Aldighieri, Gassier, Corsi, Ciampi, S. Ronconi, Castelli and Steger. The dancers were Milles. Pochini, Cucchi, Morlacchi and Amalia Ferrais.

THACKERY ON ETHIOPIAN MINSTRELS.—"I heard a humorous balladist, a minstrel with wool on his head, and an ultra Ethiopian complexion, who performed a negro ballad that I confess moistened these spectacles in the most unexpected manner. They have gazed at dozen of tragedy queens, dying on the stage, and expiring in appropriate blank verse, and I never wanted to wipe them. They have looked up, with deep respect be it said, at many scores of clergymen in pulpits, without being dimmed; and behold a minstrel with a corked face and a banjo sings a little song, strikes a wild note which sets the whole heart thrilling with happy pity. Humor! humor is the mistress of tears; she knows the way to the fons lachrymarum, strikes in dry and rugged places with her enchanting wand, and bids the fountain gush and sparkle. She has refreshed myriads more from her natural springs, than ever tragedy has watered from her pompous old urn."

Signor and Signora Tiberini have proceeded to fulfil an engagement at Trieste. Signor Pancani, who is engaged for next March by M. Calzado, has also left Paris. He will spend a week at Aix-la-Chapelle, whence he will proceed to Naples, where he is engaged for the present.

Signor P. P. Boccomini, one of the principal members of Mad. Ristori's company, has died at Amsterdam. The management of the Riccardi Theatre at Bergamo has been confided, for the duration of the fair, to the Brothers Marzi, who will give performances of opera buffa and ballet. Some papers have spread the report that the management of the Theatres Royal, Naples, would perhaps pass, ere long, into the hands of Malvezzi, the tenor. Signor Lorenzoni and Signora Gavetti Reggiani have been engaged for next autumn at the Communal Theatre of Bologna, the former as first dancer, and the latter as prima donna.

Signor Masini, first bass, is at present in Milan, whence he will soon return to St. Petersburg, where he is engaged for the fourth time.

The Neapolitan journal Il Diorama has changed its title, and is now called L'Italia.

Among the recent engagements for Constantinople may be mentioned those of Signor A. Bianchi, first tenor; Fiorini, bass; Mattioli, buffo; and Signora Galli, prima donna assoluta.

M. H. Montplaisir is engaged as ballet master for the Carneval of 1860-1 at the Carlo Felice Theatre, Genoa. The fresh choreographic work produced will be entitled Benvenuto Cellini, on which the management will spare no expense. Verdi's Trovatore is being given simultaneously at Gerbino and the Alfieri Theatre, Turin.

The vocal and instrumental concert of the pupils at the Milan Conservatory took place on the 8th of July.

The opening of the Valle Theatre, at Rome, for the summer season was to have taken place on the 30th of June, with the Masnadieri. After the last rehearsal, however, Corsi the tenor fell ill. The part of Carlo was immediately given to the other tenor of the establishment, Signor Gianini, and the opening fixed for the 3rd of July, but, at the first general rehearsal, Signor Gianini was compelled, by an intestinal attack, to take to his bed. On this, application was made to Signor Negrini, who happened to be still at Rome, and that gentleman appeared in the part on the 7th ult.; Signora Teresa Armellini was the prima donna.

Signoras Pancani, Negrini, Coletti; Signoras Steffanone, Vera-Lorini, and Mlle. Boschetti, première danseuse, are engaged at the San Carlo, Naples.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—We learn that arrangements have been nearly concluded for the appearance at the Academy of Music, probably in September, of Nixon's fine equestrian troupe, part of which performed last spring, in the Walnut Street Theatre. After that Mr. Edwin Forrest, who has made a six months' engagement with Mr. Nixon, will appear at the Academy in a series of his best parts. The house will not be opened for Italian opera until after Mr. Forrest's departure. Strakosch and Ullmann are preparing for a brilliant operatic season, and Philadelphia will have her full share. Ullmann is now in Europe engaging new artists, in addition to those already in this country.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The committee for the Prince of Wales celebration at Montreal have made arrangements with M. Strakosch, who is to have associated with him Adeline Patti, Brignoli, or another tenor, a basso and a buffo, to give a portion of the entertainment (one hour's programme) at the ball building, the night after the ball, for which the committee pay Strakosch two thousand five hundred dollars.

BOSTON MUSEUM.—The season of 1860-1, opened handsomely at this theatre on Monday. The seats were well filled with an appreciative audience, among which it was not difficult to recognize many of the steady patrons of the Museum; whose presence was an indication of their confidence in the new manager, and their desire for his success in his new position. The comedy of the Rivals was as a whole, well and satisfactorily played. Messrs. W. H. Smith, Keach and Whitman were enthusiastically greeted, and Mr. Warren was received with deafening peals of applause. Other old favorites and the new candidates for popular approval were kindly welcomed. We have said that the opening comedy was well played. In certain details the cast could not be improved.—Gazette.

THE GREAT SAENGERFEST.—From a report published in the Buffalo Republic, we learn that the receipts of the great Saengerbund festival in that city, were $4,700, including $1,572 receipts from the three concerts. The disbursements, on the other hand, amounted to $4,584 68, thus leaving a balance of $124 84. The Saengerfest was a success financially, as well as every other way.

WORCESTER, MASS.—There was an impromptu gathering of musical friends at the rooms of Mr. Amos Whiting, on Friday evening, under the auspices of the Mendelssohn, Choral and Mozart societies of Worcester. Miss Lizzie Heywood and Mr. George Wright, Jr., of Boston, being present as invited guests, sang a variety of solos and popular songs and duets, in a manner which delighted the audience. Miss Heywood possesses a highly cultivated voice, of great power and flexibility, and she sings with much ease and grace. Mr. Wright has a rich, bass voice of great power and compass. The performance was as creditable to them as it was gratifying to those who heard them.

La France Hippique relates the following anecdote:

"Gerard, the celebrated painter, was charged by the Emperor Napoleon I. to paint the battle of Austerlitz. In his composition of that great feat of arms, General Rapp was to be represented coming up at full gallop to announce the gain of the battle. Every thing was prepared on the canvass, and there only remained to place Rapp on horseback, but Gerard could not find a charger which suited his ideas. The Emperor had placed at his disposal, not only all the horses of his own stables, but ordered that those of all the cavalry regiments should be open to him. The animals were made to gallop, rear, and perform all kinds of movements, but none of them pleased the painter, and Rapp still remained unmounted. One day while walking along the Boulevard, the painter, in passing before a toy-shop, uttered an exclamation of delight on observing a small pasteboard horse, painted grey and with a black head, which, from its position, looked as if it was about to leap out of the window. 'Ah!' cried Gerard, 'that is the horse for Rapp,' and entering, he asked the price of it—'Twenty-five sous,' was the reply; and the artist, paying the money, carried off the horse under his arm. It is this animal which, it is said, figures in the famous picture of the Museum at Versailles, carrying Rapp to the emperor, the General, in his haste, having lost his hat.

A QUESTION OF ETIQUETTE.—We find the following in the Philadelphia Press, written, probably, by its literary editor, Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie:—It is stated in the English papers that a difficulty has been raised at St. Petersburg, about the reception of Lady Crampton, wife of the British ambassador at that court. It is said that the objection is that, before her marriage, she was simply Miss Victoria Balfe, an opera-singer. The article says:—"The Russians are aghast at the idea of a singer having precedence of the ladies of the whole foreign Corps Diplomatique, together with the entrée to the palace. They cannot see how the daughter of a musical composer, the leader of the orchestra of the opera-house, (herself a public singer, moreover,) can worthily represent the Majesty of England! They say, 'It is true a noble earl married an actress, Miss Farren; the late Earl of Essex, Miss Stephens, the singer; the late Duke of St. Albans an actress, Miss Mellon; the late Earl of Harrington an actress, Miss Foote; the late Earl of Craven an actress, Miss Brunton, etc., but none of these noblemen were ambassadors or other representatives of British sovereigns.'" The case is not fairly put by the Russian sticklers of etiquette. The Countess of Derby was Eliza Farren, actress; the Countess of Craven was Louisa Brunton, actress; the Countess of Essex was Kitty Stephens, singer. Each and every one of these ladies had an exemplary reputation before and after marriage, and were received at the court of the British sovereign, for the time being, just as if they had been dukes' daughters. Their husbands, in a word, drew them up to their own elevated station, and society gladly received them. On the other hand, the Duchess of St. Albans (Miss Mellon, afterward Mrs. Coutts) and the Countess of Harrington, had light characters and loose conduct before marriage, and were never received at court, or in any society which had a care for its own reputation. It was just the same with the late Countess of Blessington, who, we believe, never ventured to solicit a presentation at court, and was visited, during her residence in London, only by gentlemen. Miss Balfe had an irreproachable reputation during her short, but brilliant, professional career. On her return to Russia, should any doubt then exist as to her right to the entrée to the imperial court, the master of ceremonies may be reminded that Henrietta Sontag, a public singer, quitted the stage to marry Count Rossi, that, while a public character, she had sung at the opera-house of St. Petersburg; and that when she subsequently accompanied her husband to Russia, whither he was sent as ambassador from his own country, the Emperor Nicholas and his wife cordially received her into their most intimate society. As persons who stickle for etiquette are greatly influenced by precedent, here is a case in point which may be found useful. No doubt, Sir John Crampton will urge it, if necessary.

Mr. Vincent William Wallace, the celebrated composer, has returned from the United States, to which he has recently paid a short visit on affairs of business. Mr. Wallace proceeds to Wiesbaden, where he will doubtless put the finishing touches to his new opera of the Amber Witch, pronounced by all who have heard it superior even to Lurline. The Amber Witch is to be produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, after Mr. Macfarren's Robin Hood.—Mus. World.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

THEATRE IMPERIAL DE L'OPERA. Robert le Diable was performed for the 425th time, on occasion of the debuts of Mad. Vandenhuevel-Duprez, (daughter of the great tenor) and Mlle. Marie Sax. The former gained a complete triumph in the rôle of the Princess Isabel, which was created by Mad. Damoreau and carried on by Mad. Dorus, and connoisseurs agreed in the opinion that no one, since the last named lady has filled the character with more éclat and charming real talent than Mad. Vandenhuevel-Duprez. Mlle. Sax also was favorably received in the character of Alice as a cantatrice of great future promise. The costumes and decorations for this performance was entirely new throughout.

Aug. 1.—I am this week almost in the same predicament again which obliged me in our last letter to entertain you de coquis et bobus rather than of actors and musicians. Paris has fallen into a sort of dreamy lethargic state, from which it will only rouse itself to rush off to the seaside or the German health springs. At the Grand Opéra, the run of Semiramis continues, if such an expression can be applied to the progression of the stately Queen of the East. The sisters Marchisio have gained more self-possession in their respective parts, and advance in public estimation. The famous duo between Arsace and Semiramis is nightly called for a second time. Pierre de Medici, Prince Poniatowski's opera, has been played once, and Robert le Diable is to be produced forthwith with Mlle. Vandenhuevel Duprez, and Mlle. Marie Sax. Roger was induced to sing once more at the Opéra Comique before his departure for Baden, and appeared in the part of Georges in Da Dame Blanche before a densely crowded audience, who greeted him with every mark of enthusiastic admiration. It was, indeed, an adroit stroke of policy on the part of M. Beaumont, the new manager, to bring Roger back to the scene of his first blushing honors, and thus to revive those laurels which, in the arduous trials of the Grand Opéra had somewhat faded. Le petit Chapeau Rouge, so long announced, will decidedly be revived this week, and immediately upon it will follow M. d'Hauteroche's comedy, Crupin Medecin, the production of which has suffered some delay, owing to objections raised to it on the part of the authorities. They have at last consented to let it be acted, but stipulate for a different title. This is a concession, no doubt, to the susceptibilities of the medical profession, who are in this country a very thin-skinned class, and mighty sticklers for the dignity of their cloth. The race of Diaphorus, though it has discarded powdered periwig and gold-headed cane, is as flourishing as when Molière scarified its bombastic pedantry with the sharp edge of his satire; but public authority now intervenes to save the dignity of science from such unseemly assaults.

Gossip is already busy with the future season at the Italian Opéra here. It seems a settled thing that if Tamberlik do not return, Mario is engaged for the last six months of the season, and Signor Pancani for March and April. Graziani, Gardoni, Badiali, Zucchini, Angelini, and Mmes. Alboni, Penco, and Marie Battu are coming again, so that a sufficiently complete company will to a certainty be available. The season it is said will open with La Sonnambula; and La Semi-amide will be given with Mesdames Alboni and Penco, and Badiali, so that the Parisians will have an opportunity of exercising their critical acumen by a comparison of the Italian performance with that now forming the principal attraction of their own Grand Opéra. Such operas as Il Matrimonio Segreto and L'Italiana in Algeri, which are not sufficiently long to furnish forth the entire evening, will be backed up by operas in one act selected from the old Italian repertoire.

The Orpheon Society of the city of Paris held one of two grand meetings last Sunday at the Cirque Napoléon, under the direction of MM. François Bazin and Padeloup, directors of vocal instruction in the communal schools. The programme may interest some of your readers after the recent visit to England of the Orpheonists. Here it is:—Part I.: 1. Veni Creator, by Bessozzi; 2. Le Médecin Tant mieux et le Médecin Tant pis, by F. Bazin; 3. Angelus, by Papin; 4. La Garde Passe (men's voices), by Grétry; 5. O Salutaris, by Auber; 6. Le Courre-feu, by Halévy. Part II.—1. Invocation, by Pasdeloup; 2. Le Printemps (men's voices), by Von Calle; 3. Les Vendanges, by Orlando de Lassus; 4. Faust (men's voices), by Gounod; 5. Cantique, by Haydn; 6. Vive l'Empereur, by Gounod. The second meeting will be next Sunday. Last week the Concert Musard distinguished itself by the performance of Spontini's overture to Olympia; and as few opportunities of hearing this work have ever presented themselves to the Parisians, great curiosity was excited on the occasion. Mad. Spontini is said to have furnished directions as to the true mode of rendering the work; and certainly it was very effectively executed.

The distribution of prizes at the Conservatoire for Music and Declamation has just taken place, but in neither apartment do the competitions appear to have brought to light talent of more than ordinary promise. It is worth while noticing, perhaps, that among the competitors for the violin and violoncello prizes, figured four young ladies, three violinists and one violoncellist. Lady fiddlers we are tolerably well accustomed to, but the attitude of a lady grasping with all her limbs a violoncello is one to the grotesqueness of which usage has not yet reconciled us. In time, no doubt, we shall think nothing of it. The cry after more female occupations, which is so fast breaking down the foolish distinctions between sauce for the goose and sauce for the gander, and has already given us a female goose practising physic, is destined, no doubt, to wear out our faculty of astonishment at such novelties. Female lawyers, soldiers, and sailors will be plentiful as blackberries; and the stories of Portia, and Joan of Arc, and the touching ballad of "Billy Taylor," will lose their savor.—Cor. of Lond. Musical World.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Saturday the theatre really closed for the season, although it was anticipated that it would be kept open another week, in consequence of the increasing success of Oberon. It could not be managed, however, some of the principal singers being imperatively summoned to their continental engagements. The performances on Saturday were for the benefit of Mlle. Titiens, and included Oberon, preceded by the "Shadow Song," from Dinorah for Mad. Marie Cabel; the last scene from Lucia di Lammermoor, for Signor Giuglini; and the divertissement from the ballet of Orfa, for Mad. Ferraris. The audience was enormous, in spite of the thunder-storm that raged furiously and the rain that fell in absolute torrents from 6 until 9 o'clock. It is not easy to account for the triumphant reception awarded to Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre, when it is remembered that, with Braham and Miss Paton in the cast, in the zenith of their popularity when the opera was first produced at Covent Garden with great splendor of scenery and decoration and the extreme care in the general getting up under the composer's own direction, it was a comparative failure. Was the musical taste of the public so much degenerated? Does there exist a stronger admiration for the decorative in theatricals? Is Signor Mongini a greater tenor than Braham, or Mlle. Titiens superior to Miss Paton? Does Her Majesty's Theatre enjoy a more powerful prestige than old Covent Garden before Music hurled the Drama from its pride of place? Is Mr. E. T. Smith a better or a more fortunate manager than the late Charles Kemble, or Mr. Benedict a more experienced and habile conductor than Tom Cooke of facetious memory? However these questions may be answered for or against the representation of Oberon in Her Majesty's Theatre, some things may be urged directly in its favor. It may be confidently asserted that the characters of Fatima and Oberon, so important in the score were never before so efficiently performed as by Mad. Alboni and Signor Belart; nor had Sherazadin and Babekun been entrusted to such artists as Signor Evcardi and M. Gassier. In short, the cast of Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre was incomparable, and such an array of talent could not fail to have a powerful allurement of its own. As the music became better known too it was more liked, and this gave a durability to the attraction which neither perfect cast nor splendor of decorations could secure. That Oberon has proved one of the most triumphant successes of late years on the Italian stage cannot be denied, and indeed its production promises to constitute an epoch in the annals of the opera.—London Musical World.

MADAME JULLIEN'S BENEFIT.—It is gratifying to find that the English public have not forgotten the man who did so much for the advancement of his art and the cultivation of the musical taste of the age, for we cannot but think that a very large portion of the 15,000 persons who were at the Surrey Gardens on Tuesday evening were influenced by the desire of doing some good for the widow of one who was deservedly the most popular, as he was the most talented of caterers for the amusement, and let us also add the elevation, of his patrons. Fortunately the weather was favorable, and consequently those who could not obtain room in the large hall, which was crammed to suffocation, were not inconvenienced by having to remain in the open air, and listen to the strains of the performers, mellowed by the distance which in this instance might have "lent enchantment," if not "to the view," at least to something else, for the heat and the crowding must have been positively awful to those in the area of the building; it was bad enough in the first circle, where standing room was just as much at a premium as everywhere else. Of course we cannot be expected to notice in detail a programme which numbered some thirty-five pieces, and lasted from half past six until—well, we cannot say when, for we certainly did not stay it all out. The entertainment was divided into four parts—the first orchestral, conducted by Mr. Alfred Mellon and Prince Galitzin (whose Surprise Polka was encored by the way), comprising the overture to Semiramide, one movement of Mendelssohn's A minor symphony, Jullien's Warsaw Varsoviana and Last Waltz—the latter for the first time of performance, and every way worthy the reputation of its lamented composer, the air charming and eminently dansante. The second and third parts entirely vocal, embraced a variety of songs, ballads, &c., all of which were received with a greater or less degree of noisy enthusiasm too closely bordering upon turbulence to be pleasant. Of the fourth part of the concert, in which the bands of the Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Fusilier Guards were announced to appear, we can say nothing, but have no doubt that Jullien's English and British Army Quadrilles afforded as much delight as they used when conducted by their composer, and the Last Waltz repeated to the gratification of the multitude, who seemed to evince no desire to quit the "gay and festive scene and halls of dazzling light."—Ibid.

MISS ANNA WHITTY.—The Buon Gusto of Florence says, "Anna Whitty is a young and fair daughter of England, who has made Italy a second country, and Italian art a passion and a religion. Distinguished for education, manners, instruction and talent, she perfected her vocal powers in Florence, under a first-rate master; her studies were not of that superficial order which the greater part of the singers of the present day pass through. She rendered herself familiar with the works of our best composers, and preferred, with the instinct of good taste, the classical creations of our immortal maestri. Mlle. Whitty has by this gained the gratitude of our land of song—it is for this she merits renown and honor. She made her debut at the Theatre-Royal Pagliaro, at Florence, some three years ago, having previously held the post of prima donna at Malta, for two seasons. Mlle. Whitty has a commanding presence and a pleasing countenance. As we have said before, her manners and deportment on the stage are eminently noble and distinguished. Her voice is not robust, but is rich and full in tone, with an excellent suavity and sweetness, of great compass, most flexible, and, above all, most sympathetic, being of that timbre that does not beseege but descends to the heart, filling the soul with the various emotions of tenderness and melancholy. Added to this is her rare trillo and perfection of method, her extraordinary agility with which she overcomes the most difficult passages, performing them spontaneously, and without an effort; her singing is an embroidery; difficulties become for her a mere plaything—a pastime. Mlle. Whitty, as a "lyric actress," is capable of interpreting any work; but it is in classical compositions, particularly those of Rossini, in which she most excels, and for which she seems specially created; it is in these chefs d'œuvre her genius develops itself, where her trillo is most displayed. For her there must be obstacles, difficulties, and then she is seen gliding, flying, playing among a million of notes the most complicated and perilous, with the same rapidity, ease, and security, as the butterfly frolics among flowers. Added to this trillo, the grace, the charm that accompanies it, producing an ensemble that almost reaches perfection. Mlle. Whitty's powers as an actress equal those she possesses as a singer. Her gestures are as graceful as they are moderate; each movement betrays intelligence and refinement. She never forgets the part she represents, being herself embodied in the character she interprets."—Ibid.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Blow, bugle, blow. Song. W. R. Dempster. 50

Tennyson's famous Bugle Song, which could have found no composer more adequate to the task of providing a musical garment than the composer of the "Rainy day," "May Queen" and numerous other ballads, which are permanently established among the best written to English words. The clarion notes of this Bugle Song will ring out far and wide and become forever coupled with Tennyson's sparkling rhymes.

Alma redemptoris. Quartet. Lambillotte. 40

Another capital number of the "Saluts" collection for Catholic choirs. Singing Societies who are not shy of the Latin words, would hardly find short sacred pieces of a more pleasing character.

Waves of Ocean. H. Phillips. 25

A companion to the old but always popular song, "Shells of the Ocean."

Alice O'Neal. Song. Geo. Barker. 25

My boyhood's holidays. F. Skirval. 25

Two charming new ballads. The names of the composers should ensure them a good reception beforehand.

I am dying. L. W. Wheeler. 25

Song of a summer night. C. S. Taylor. 25

'Twas a dream full of beauty. S. Nelson. 25

Pleasing Sentimental Songs for amateurs. Not difficult.

Instrumental Music.

Sultana Waltzes. (With Vignetto.) D'Albert. 50

A set of good, melodious waltzes, highly practicable in the ball-room, as might be expected from one whose dances have so long been the staple stock of band leaders. The titlepage of this piece is embellished with a magnificent vignette, illustrated in colors, representing the Queen of the Imperial harem in oriental splendor, a pet parrot taking a piece of sugar from between her lips, with a black female attendant looking on.

The Sylph's banquet. Fantaisie brillante from "The Culpit Fay." J. L. Ensign. 50

Introducing the leading melodies in this new and successful Cantata. Aside from this it is a pleasing and well connected piece of music, which amateurs will derive real pleasure from.

Books.

THE NIGHTINGALE. A choice collection of Songs, Chants and Hymns, designed for the use of Juvenile Classes, Public Schools and Seminaries; comprising, also, a Complete and Concise System of Elementary Instruction, by W. O. and H. S. Perkins. 30

This will prove a very acceptable volume to those for whose special profit and amusement it is intended. The songs are all excellent and highly attractive; the elementary portions of them from their easy and progressive nature will render the acquisition of a primary knowledge of vocal music free from those difficulties which often attend the efforts of the young. For these reasons the Nightingale will be found a volume of superior worth for children at school or at home.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Canterbury Bella.

Am I dreaming, through the gleaming
Of this golden summer day,
Of the ringing and the singing
Of the voices far away?
From the old Cathedral's cloisters,
From its tower the music swells
And the air is full of music
Of the Canterbury Bella.

'Tis the dawning of the morning
O'er the lovely English isles;
And rejoicing in the sunshine,
All the broad bright country smiles;
Bright the hedgerows gleam with freshness,
And adown the dewy dells,
Wanders in the chiming chorus
Of the Canterbury Bella.

And the gay old town awaking,
With the voices of the prime,
Seems the sacred spell partaking
Of the blessed matin time;
Tread the aisles the fair-browed singers,
Soft their silvery chorus swells,
And o'er all, I hear the ringing
Of the Canterbury Bella.

Then anon, the evening cometh,
Rich with sunset's rosy glow,
And the evening's purple shadows
Darken all the earth below;
And the vesper chime, soft stealing,
Still the same old story tells
That in centuries past was murmured
From the Canterbury Bella.

Nay, I wake, 'tis but the dreaming
That a morn like this will bring,
Faint, and soft and mellow, beaming
Like the sunshine of the Spring.
I am in the fairy palace,
Reared by Flora's mystic spells,
With each white and purple chalice
Of the Canterbury Bella.

'Twas a poet's mythic fancies
Thus to name these regal flowers,
Looked he back, in rapturous trances,
To his boyhood's dreaming hours?
When the chimes of England haunted
All his dreams with sweetest spells,
And he heard, like one enchanted,
Sounds of Canterbury Bella.

Heart of mine, which thus can waken,
Quick to sounds of grief or cheer,
When these fairy bells are shaken,
Waking tones for souls to hear.
Wander still across the ocean,
Fraught with memory's silent spells,
Hear, as in the dim old cloister,
Sounds of Canterbury Bella.

Hoffmann.

A musician whose works present many points of analogy with those of the composers mentioned by us last week as the heads of the German Romantic School is Hoffmann—far better known by his tales than by his Miserere, his Requiem, his airs and choruses for Werner's Crusade of the Baltic, or his operas of Love and Jealousy, The Canon of Milan, and Undine, which last production has always been regarded as his masterpiece. Indeed, with Undine, Hoffmann obtained his one great musical success, and it is easy to account for the marked favor with which that work was received in Berlin. In the first place, the fantastic nature of the subject was eminently suited to the peculiar genius of the composer. Then he possessed the advantage of having an excellent libretto, written by Lamotte-Fouqué, the author of the original tale; and finally, the opera was admirably executed at the Royal Theatre of Berlin. Probably not one of our readers has heard Hoffmann's Undine, which was brought out in 1817, and we believe was never revived, though much of the music enjoyed for a time considerable popularity, and the composition as a whole was warmly and publicly praised by no less a personage than Karl Maria von Weber. On the other hand, Undine, and Hoffmann's music generally, have been condemned by Sir Walter Scott, who is reported not to have been able to distinguish one melody from another, though he had of course a profound admiration for Scotch ballads of all kinds. M. Fétis, too, after informing us that Hoffmann "gave music lessons, painted enormous pictures, and wrote licentious novels (where are Hoffmann's licentious novels?), without succeeding in making himself remarked in any style," goes on to assure us, without ever having heard Undine, that although there were "certain parts" in which genius was evinced, "want of connexion, of conformity, of conception, and of plan, might be observed throughout;" and that "the judgment of the best critics was that such a work could not be classed among those compositions which mark an epoch in art."

Weber had studied criticism less perhaps than M. Fétis, but he knew more about creativeness, and in an article on the opera of Undine, so far from complaining of any "want of connexion, of conformity, of conception, and of plan," the author of Der Freischütz says: "This work seems really to have been composed at one inspiration, and I do not remember, after hearing it several times, that any passage ever recalled me for a single minute from the circle of magic images that the artist evoked in my soul. Yes, from the beginning to the end the author sustains the interest so powerfully by the musical development of his theme, that after but a single hearing one really seizes the ensemble of the work, and detail disappears in the naïveté and modesty of his art. With rare renunciation, such as can be appreciated only by him who knows what it costs to sacrifice the triumph of a momentary success, M. Hoffmann has disdained to enrich some pieces at the expense of others; which it is so easy to do by giving them an importance which does not belong to them as members of the entire work. The composer always advances, visibly guided by this one aspiration—to be always truthful, and to keep up the dramatic action without ceasing, instead of checking or fettering it in its rapid progress. Diverse and strongly marked as are the characters of the different personages, there is nevertheless something which surrounds them all; it is that fabulous life, full of phantoms, and those soft whisperings of terror which belong so peculiarly to the fantastic. Kühleborn is the character most strikingly put in relief both by the choice of the melodies, and by the instrumentation which, never leaving him, always announces his sinister approach.* This is quite right, Kühleborn appearing, if not as destiny itself, at least as its appointed instrument. After him comes Undine, the charming daughter of the waves, which, made sonorous, now murmur and break in harmonious roulades, now powerful and commanding, announce her power. The arietta of the second act, treated with rare and subtle grace, seems to me to be a thorough success, and to render the character perfectly. Hildebrand, so passionate yet full of hesitation, and allowing himself to be carried away by each amorous desire, and the pious and simple priest, with his grave choral melody, are the next in importance. In the back-ground are Bertalda, the fisherman and his wife, and the duke and duchess. The strains sung by the suite of the latter breathe a joyous, animated life, and are developed with admirable gaiety, thus forming a contrast with the sombre choruses of the spirits of the earth and water, which are full of harsh, strange progressions. The end of the opera, in which the composer displays, as if to crown his work, all his abundance of harmony in the double chorus in eight parts, appears to me grandly conceived and perfectly rendered. He has expressed these words—"Good night to all the cares and to all the magnificence of the earth"—with true loftiness, and with a soft melancholy which, in spite of the tragic conclusion of the piece, leaves behind a delicious impression of calm and consolation. The overture and the final chorus which enclose the work here give one another the hand. The former, which evokes and opens the world of wonders, commences softly, goes on increasing, then bursts forth with passion; the latter is introduced without brusqueness, but mixes itself up with the action, and calms and satisfies it completely. The entire work is one of the most spiritual that these latter times have given us. It is the result of the most perfect and intimate comprehension of the subject, completed by a series of ideas profoundly reflected upon, and by the intelligent use of all the material resources of art; the whole rendered into a magnificent work by beautiful and admirably developed melodies."

M. Berlioz has said of Hoffmann's music, adding, however, that he had not heard a note of it, that it was "de la musique de littérature." M. Fétis, having heard about as much of it, has said a great deal more; but, after what has been written about Hoffmann's principal opera by such a master and judge as Karl Maria von Weber, neither the opinion of M. Fétis nor of M. Berlioz can be of any value on the subject. The merit of Hoffmann's music has probably been denied because the world is not inclined to believe that the same man can be a great writer and also a great musician. Perhaps it is this perversity of human nature that makes us disposed to hold M. Berlioz in so little esteem as an author; and we have no doubt that there are many who would be equally averse to according M. Fétis any tolerable rank as a composer.—London Musical World, Aug. 4.

Congregational Singing.

In the attempt to establish Congregational Singing in the churches of the land, it seems to be taken for granted by many, that those who are unfortunate enough to possess any special acuteness or delicacy of ear, are not to be regarded. If the majority of the congregation are willing to try to sing, that is enough; let that portion of the people who do not enjoy the exercise, when all varieties of sounds are made which go by the name of singing, bear it as they best may. They are not to be taken into the account. Congregational singing must be had. Be patient toward a word or two on the other side, for it is only once that I ask the privilege of being heard.

Let it be premised that in the pure and chaste tones of well-cultivated voices, there is nothing that will injure the natural sensibilities of any one. Good singing, in connection with a good hymn, will always have a favorable impression on every unbiased mind, whether of one who "has an ear" or of one who has not. It will hurt the feelings of no one. But how is it with singing, when the voices of many of those who purport to "sing," are so discordant that any sound which comes within a half, or at least, a quarter of a tone of what it should be, answers their purpose? How is it, when instead of all singing in harmony, there are many, in reality, singing independent solos, all through the congregation,—each one doing his loudest in his own way? To some, in every congregation, these things seem intolerable. Suppose that out of every two hundred in a congregation there are twenty five who should be annoyed at every religious meeting, by having repeated shocks from an electrical battery, administered to their persons; and it should be said by others, that there is no great objection to this, because the congregation, generally, suffer no such annoyance; and those few individuals who do, ought to have their minds and hearts on spiritual things, and not give way to it: would any man of sense say that such a state of things ought to be continued!

Now the actual effect on a portion of the people of some sounds, in what is called "congregational singing," is certainly very similar to the shocks from an electrical battery, and religion can no more shield them from it, than it can from the shocks from the battery; and yet this effect is ten times worse than the one supposed, for this reason: shocks from such a battery would carry no particular sentiment with them; while those received in the manner alluded to, come in the closest connection with the most sacred and beautiful hymns, and the disagreeable associations, thus inevitably formed, will remain; so that, in such a person's remembrance of the most delightful hymn, there will come—for a long time afterwards, if not always—the remembrance of the tragedy of its being literally executed, in a judicial sense,—not by the congregation, but by some few of those independent solo singers, who are scattered through the congregation;—each one showing off to his silent neighbors, how much in quantity, without regard to quality, he can sing!

Now to the idea of "congregational singing" we have no objection whatever. But to call that "congregational singing" which is really done by less, on an average, than one-fifth of the congregation, and done, as it too often is, in the very manner here described, is not calling the thing by a right name, nor is such singing that which would seem best designed for general edification. It is certainly one desirable part of religion to avoid, as far as possible, disturbing the religion of others.

With very many in our congregations, all this may be very tolerable, for they are not annoyed by discords. But is it kind, to say the least, for the many to trample on the sensibilities of those who may unfortunately be in the minority, when the mental and spiritual experience of all might be richer and more profitable, by having some due regard to the manner of our worship, and especially to the feelings of those whose sensibilities are not made of iron or brass? Having then "gifts differing," let those to whom these are severally committed, be found attending to their own with faithfulness and sincerity, and there need be no schism. Let him that teacheth, teach, and him that exhorteth, exhort; but let not him who really cannot sing, undertake to aid the devotions of others by his vain attempts, before he has properly learned. To be a "thorn in the flesh" to others is bad enough for those who must endure the dispensation, but to be a spear in the soul is certainly a thing to be avoided by all possible means. We require the mind and voice of a public speaker to be properly trained; why not the voice, in one who is to sing in public worship?

We believe that a very great majority of the people may learn to sing with propriety, if they are properly instructed, and are willing to persevere in their efforts to learn: and when the congregation can sing, we should like very much to have them do it—but not before! A SMALL BUT EARNEST MINORITY.

We are always very happy to find room for any "small but earnest minority" to express themselves upon matters of common concernment; and we are doubly willing to insert the above communication because we can sympathize with its tenor—if that is the part which it sings. It is a good old maxim, which is so full of the spirit of the Bible, that it might have found utterance on the sacred page, that "whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well. Congregational singing may be the Heaven-intended, or, at least, Heaven-preferred method for the sanctuary; but, if so, it ought to be both singing, and Congregational singing. This it cannot be, until the Congregation have learned how to sing.

Singing is the utterance of sounds with melodious modulations of the voice. It involves some knowledge of melody and rhythm. Nobody can sing who cannot tell a chord from a discord as quick as we can distinguish the shriek of a steam whistle from the squeak of a penny trumpet. Doubtless—as our correspondent suggests—most people can be taught to sing in some tolerable manner, if they are taught young, and are made the subjects of long and careful training. But it is impossible for a congregation where non-musical members have not been thus dealt with, to make melody by their voices to the Lord.

We are aware that it is common to point to our lecture rooms, and the weekly prayer meetings held in them, and to refer to the "good singing" there, with the triumphant inquiry why, if the "congregation" can sing so successfully and with so much of real comfort and edification there, the "congregation" may not do the same thing in the house of God in the Sabbath service of song? We think there is an easy answer which negatives the inquiry. In the first place, the congregation do most seldom sing in the lecture-room; but only the ten, twenty, thirty, forty or fifty persons who have musical taste and culture, and whose volume of tone in that small room reverberates grandly from end to end and from side to side; drowning even the discords—if they are made by the unskilled. In the greatly increased space of the church edifice, that volume of tone becomes so thinned and enfeebled, as hardly to recognize itself, and to be no wise able to smother and conceal the discordant voices of those who, though they may sing with ever so much of the spirit, never sang five words with the understanding in their lives, and could not, if life depended upon it. The same tunes, sang by the same voices that sounded nobly and sweetly in the lecture-room, will, therefore, be very apt to disappoint expectation in the church: and if the organ occupies its usual place in the gallery, from eight to twenty feet above the floor on which the audience stand, it will be found next to impossible, for the organist and the people to "keep time," in anything approaching a quick and strong movement on his part; the consequence of which will be that all tunes will be played and sung with a slow and drawing movement, until the service of song in the house of the Lord "like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along"—to the weariness of all, and the special and intense disgust of those who are affected with musical sensibility in an acute degree.

It is a most hopeful feature in the case that the children—in our week day and Sabbath schools—are now so almost universally taught to sing. And it may not unreasonably be anticipated that, by the time that those children shall have passed up into our congregations so as to compose their bulk, it may be possible to have "congregational singing" in which all the congregation may share with some tolerable skill and strength. But there is a "good time coming." Its advent is not yet. And until it comes, we think the most successful congregational singing—and the most comfortable and edifying singing, any way—will be found to be the product of a small and well trained choir, who shall perform two-thirds of the Sabbath service—the congregation being invited and urged to join with them in the first singing of the morning, and the last of the afternoon; the choir leading off, and the people following, in the use of some of those good, simple and strong chorales, which would bear the stress of a regiment of voices, and an organ accompaniment like the war of the ocean on its reefs, without being overdone.

We may be in a "small minority" in this opinion, but we are "earnest," and what is more—we are right.—Congregationalist.

Music of the Moravians.

From a pleasant account in the New York Evening Post, of a Sunday spent at the Moravian settlement at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, we take the following description of their church music:

The music is peculiar. All the congregation sing, the tune being some old German chorale, to which the organist plays a varied and quite scientific accompaniment, introducing an interlude of a few chords between each line. A sermon follows, and the services conclude with a prayer and benediction.

After dinner we go to the cemetery, a beautiful plot of ground, where, under the shade of majestic elms, the "rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep," and where the Moravians are buried in regular order as they die. The cemetery is peculiar, because it contains no upright slab or monument, the graves being marked by square horizontal slabs laid on top, and bearing the usual inscriptions, sometimes in English, sometimes in German. It is always open, and seems to be used as a public park. It has none of the gloom which usually attaches to grave-yards, probably because it looks so little like one.

At two o'clock we must go to the church again, for there is to be a "Love Feast," and just as service commences we are in our place. They are playing the voluntary, not on the organ, but with a brass band! The band of only four pieces, but each echoing loudly and clearly through the church, is near the organ, and they play an adagio choral movement full of devotional feeling. As they close the organ commences with a majestic strain of slow swelling music. A venerable clergyman opens the service by giving out a hymn, which is sung as usual by the congregation, and is followed by a vocal quartet, accompanied by the organ and violoncello, for eight or ten players upon stringed instruments are seated near the organist, the keyboard of the organ being turned so that the performer faces the pulpit. The quartet is followed by a chorus sung by the choir, which includes some thirty ladies without bonnets, each wearing a pretty little cap on the back of her head. Other choruses and anthems follow, the service being principally musical, and the clear notes of the cornets and violins soaring up above the full, rich, diaphanous tones of the organ. The clergyman occasionally reads the hymn or anthem (sometimes in German, sometimes in English), the choir singing each line as it is given out.

The music, notwithstanding the orchestral resources at the command of the leader, is by no means florid, nor even brilliant. Slow choral movements sometimes, but rarely touching on the fugue style, are preferred. There are two organists, who play alternately, and the gentleman on duty last Sunday was good enough to show to Mr. Wisp the musical library of the choir. The music, much of it written in the old style of notation, on the C clef, and with figured bass, is entirely in manuscript, and some of it has been in the possession of the church for generations. All composers, Protestant and Catholic, are made use of, but not many of their works will suit the devotional style of the Moravian worship, and the compositions most in vogue here are those of old Moravian composers, and can be heard only in Moravian societies and churches. All the musicians who sing or play in the church, are, with the exception of the organists, volunteer performers. The violins, cornets, trombone, cello and other musical instruments used in the choir, are played by amateurs, (for almost every Moravian is skilled in music,) and it certainly has a singular appearance to see stout well-to-do farmers, property-owners, or store-keepers, leaning back in their seats in the choir and drawing their bow across the strings of the violins. Most people in other towns, in their condition or standing in their respective communities, would consider it trifling, and beneath their notice to bother with such things; but here in Bethlehem music is both loved and cultivated. Almost every lady plays the piano, and almost every man the violin or organ.

The "Love Feast" itself must not be forgotten. At a certain point of the service sweet buns and warm coffee are passed round, every one partaking. The services close with a few prayers in German and English, and the usual benediction. Indeed, it is noticeable that German and English are equally familiar to the inhabitants, the older Moravians speaking German in their households, while the younger naturally prefer the English.

If, then, any reader of these sketches wishes to take a delightful peep into Pennsylvania, visit a peculiar people and attend a strange and interesting, though perfectly orthodox religious service, let him spend a Sunday at Bethlehem.

Art in Newport.

NEWPORT, August, 1860.

I was surprised to encounter Rowse on the Cliffs. The statement that Carlyle and Tennyson declined to sit for their portraits to him is erroneous. The rain fell constantly while Rowse was in England, and an attack of inflammation of the eyes obliged him to cut short his visit. Richard M. Hunt is here recruiting from a severe illness; Ehninger has just left. As Monday is proverbially dull here, owing to the absence of a New York mail, and the large number who always prepare to leave on that evening, it is a good time to tell you something about Art in Newport.

Visitors who come here from the Hudson River, Berkshire County, or the White Mountains, complain of the tameness of the scenery. They miss picturesque elevations, noble trees, and the umbrageous masses which add so essentially to the beauty of the landscape elsewhere. It is true that the lover of nature must here look to the sea—with its ever-changing moods and hues, its limitless expanse, beautiful inlets, and graceful shores—for his scenic pleasure; yet the infinite variety of the ocean, to the eye of a keen and susceptible observer—for a time, at least, —more than compensates for the lack of woods and mountains. The rocks here are full of character; and for studies of color the painter will vainly seek a clearer twinkle in the grass, a deeper azure in the heavens, crystalline blue water more pure, sunsets more splendid, an atmosphere more lucent, or vaporous neutral tints more effective. For these reasons, and still more, perhaps, because of the good working Summer climate and the intelligent society of the place, Newport has always been fondly sought by the artistic fraternity. In the brief history of American art, it is one of the first places named as the abode of painters. Bishop Berkeley brought Smith here from England, and his are the first good portraits that were executed in America. In walking or driving with artist friends here, their frequent exclamations of discovery and delight, indicate that Newport is not deficient in picturesque materials. Now it is a magnificent cloud, and now a beautiful surge; sometimes a long aerial perspective, and again a charming costume or physiognomy that wins the artist's eye. Some of the cleverest caricatures of Augustus Hoppin were inspired by the grotesque side of life visible here in "the height of the season." The lamented Crawford found in Wright's portrait of Washington, belonging to a resident, the most authentic details of the peerless Chief's figure and features, whereof he made excellent use in his study of that grand subject. Amateur photographers find delectable objects to represent; sketchbooks are desirably filled at the Glen and among the rocks, and the daguerreotypists drive a flourishing trade.

There is a cottage in Pelham street which is the fruit of artistic labor, having been erected several years since by Richard M. Staigg—a painter of exquisite taste and progressive ability—whose early studies were aided by the kindly counsels of Allston. During the first years of his career, Staigg was devoted to miniature painting—a branch in which he so excels that there is always upon his easel some work of the kind, and his winters are as fully occupied in New York and Boston as his summers in Newport. Many of Staigg's miniatures of beautiful women are as much prized as works of art, in a sphere where high success is rare, as for excellent likenesses. He excels in color. Bryan, the well-known owner of the gallery of old masters, sat to him two or three years since, and fastidious critic as he is, considers the painting a masterpiece. To vary the minute labor bestowed upon his miniatures, and give scope to his love of art in a broader sphere, Staigg has executed, of late, many admirable life-size crayon portraits; several in oil; and a series of finished landscapes of cabinet size, with some genre compositions. His success in each of these branches has been remarkable. His head, in oil, called the "Exile," has won the greatest admiration for its mellow tints and earnest expression; his portrait of his mother was pronounced a gem in tint and tone, as well as character, by all the critics of a recent exhibition; his figure of the "Little Crossing Sweep" is so naive and true that photographs of it have sold to a large extent; and a set of views of sea and sky effects, and bits of coast in this region, are the favorite drawing-room ornaments of more than one tasteful dwelling on this island. Nor should the beautiful children, delineated by Staigg be forgotten; they are singularly authentic and graceful. This studious and refined artist has well sustained the early reputation of Newport as the birthplace or residence of favorite painters; and his progress and success have been legitimate, and are sources of congratulation to his numerous friends here. His sister is endowed with similar talent, and his studio is seldom without some precious and encased trophy of artistic genius.

In South Touro street, there is a nice bit of verdant lawn, where a large white goat, and sometimes a little black Fayal cow, may be seen grazing; in the rear is a mansion well shaded with trees, and still farther back, an eligible atelier, where instruction and achievement in pictorial art go on prosperously, despite of the frequent interruption of visitors. This is the house of William M. Hunt. He studied Art faithfully in Paris, and pursues it with the correctness and insight of a man who has adopted his legitimate vocation. He is an admirable draughtsman, and knows how to seize the picturesque in nature and the characteristic in humanity with consummate tact. There is nothing conventional or adventitious about his work—nothing evasive in his manner. He never arbitrarily chooses a subject, but is won by it. His eye is quick to discern, and his hand dexterous to embody the pictures that exist in life and nature; no effect of light and shade, of feature and form, of expression and character, is lost upon him. He has a remarkable affinity with the naïve. There is a true simplicity, like that of Nature, in his conceptions. Such charming and suggestive subjects as rural life, the wayside, the spontaneous and natural around him, afford, he instinctively adopts. Many of his pictures have been extremely popular, even in diminutive lithograph copies, owing to this subtle truth to nature; as, for instance, "The Girl at the Fountain," "The Boy playing the Mandolin," the "Paris Flower Girl," etc. A glance around his studio reveals the genuine artist at a glance. There are quaint, minutely-finished sketches of interior court-yards, or mossy walls in the Azores,—there are bits of rustic life gathered in France—a little shepherdess leading a cow through a wood and knitting as she walks, two angelic children singing, deer by moonlight, rabbits erect and vigilant, a fortuneteller and child, etc., all instinct with the expressive, artless grace of Nature. Some of Hunt's portraits are original and effective in treatment beyond any we have seen by living American artists,—as for example, that incarnation of judicial sense and integrity, Chief Justice Shaw—two children painted after death, and a score of female heads and forms, where the latent and absolute character of the originals is delicately as well as emphatically preserved. Attached to this painting-room are apartments for pupils, of which Mr. Hunt has several, and constant applications from others; for his talent for teaching is as remarkable as his executive skill. His education and the course he pursues are as different from those of most of our artists as are his standard of excellence and his peculiar talent. Educated in the scientific and patient habits of the best French limners, thoroughly independent in his tone of mind, and loving Art for its own sake, he wisely prefers the comparative isolation and the opportunities of study which Newport secures, during half the year, and the great social privileges obtainable there for the remainder, to the superficial excitements and trading spirit of our commercial cities. He has one of the most convenient ateliers in the country, and his artistic advancement and influence are unique; he is never without commissions, and yet can satisfactorily regulate his work and follow out his own ideas. Near the harbor lives a sister of Rev. Freeman Clark, who exhibits much talent in painting and sketching. A daughter of Gilbert Stuart receives many commissions—especially to copy her illustrious father's celebrated portrait of Washington—one of the full length originals of which adorns the Senate Chamber of the Newport State House. The house where Stuart was born is still standing, over in Narragansett—a few miles hence, and two of his earliest works are preserved in the Redwood library. The first years of Allston's artistic studies were passed here, and there are three memorable fruits of his pencil to be seen, where so many happy hours of his youth were spent. The first is a head of a venerable man, who taught him the rudiments of painting; it is interesting as one of his earliest attempts, wherein his skill in color is perfectly discernible; the second is a portrait of himself, as a young man—a most refined work—full of grace and character, and with clear mellow tints, the old fashioned costume and long hair adding to its pleasing effect; and the third is a work of his prime, and has the massive dignity of prophetic expression with the transparent and rich tone and harmony which made him so like the old masters. Allston's friend in his studies and rambles here was the beautiful miniature painter Malbone—whose exquisite works are the cherished heirlooms in many Newport families. George C. Mason as a draughtsman and architect, as well as a gentleman descended from one of the oldest and most respectable families of the place, has constant occupation for his brain and talents in designing and superintending the new mansions which, every year, spring up in this region. It is not surprising that Newport has been and is the favorite resort of artists. The best pieces of Huntington and Kensett were either sketched out or wholly executed here. Lawrence, the English crayon artist, passed a lucrative Summer delineating the likenesses of the visitors and residents. Ames, the Boston portrait-painter, brings every Summer, pictures to paint here. Ehninger has made us a visit, and notwithstanding constant social invasions of his time, has made some admirable illustrations for the new illustrated edition of Irving's Sketch Book, about to be issued by Putnam. Goodenough delighted in Newport, and proposed to execute a colossal bust of Cooper, the novelist, and present it to the city, to be placed upon the scene of one of the stirring incidents of the Red Rover. One of the new minor avenues has been named for the generous sculptor. Signor Patarnia, a Sicilian painter of rare talent, well known in New York for his artistic caricatures—but deserving to be still better known for his highly finished and masterly portraits, and is still sojourning here.

Love of the Beautiful.

No soul is so barren that it never feels a throb of its higher self—an aspiration for its lost divinity, a yearning for its loftier destiny. The midnight student, digging up Greek roots, combining words to make ideas, rests his beating forehead on his hand, and recalls soothingly some period of his life which was natural, true and happy. The sweating machinist, covered with soot and dust, pauses in his toil, thinks of the loving faces of his wife and children at home; and his next shaft is polished with a more graceful curve, the wearied expression passes away from his face, his labor is ennobled by its object, which is the beautiful.

God has indeed breathed into us a part of himself—that infinite thing which is called soul. Were the discord of earth done away, life would be all poetry; in the present state of things, too many of us make of it most miserable prose. But that the poetry of our nature can be extinguished, is impossible. The past, present, and our inherent shadowing forth of the future, forbids the idea. At some period of life, all mankind is prompted by nature to be natural; to find beauty in the mountain, the forest, the river, and no longer to delude themselves with false ideas of happiness. Even the most ignorant and wicked of the human family have yet something left of the true and beautiful in them. Falstaff, after his long career of drunkenness and vice, of robbing and lying, on his death bed "babbling o' green fields;" it is one of the most exquisite touches of nature by the great translator.

In this test of life—for he lives most who loves most—we all start from a level. Souls do no business at the banks, and they never shave notes. The man of millions bows to the production of some humble boy, who in his affinity for the beauty of form, has carved from a stone his lesson of poetry for the world. While banks make and break, fortunes grow and dwindle, some obscure child may be modeling his mud-images, or drawing his charcoal lines on the wall; gathering thoughts which shall live eternally.

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever." It is cheering to think that not a fine thought, or noble emotion or worthy impulse shall ever die. It must be an inherent belief in most minds, that by some power beyond, the good deeds, so dim and obscure among the rubbish of the bad, shall be some time separated, and shine forth in their own purity, unsullied by the base ignorance and error of the world. Call it faith or superstition, it is planted in the soul of man, and for a purpose. We all look forward to the time when the beautiful, the true, the good, shall be triumphant—we do all, at some period of life, form plans for the elevation of ourselves into something better. Even toil itself becomes beautiful, when its object is the beautiful.

Every one, however rude and uncultivated, makes some distinction between graceful lines and harsh angles—between harmonious colors and those which are out of place. It is the instinctive yearning to separate the lovely from the unlovely, that induces man, studying nature, to imitate. And the picture which he paints, or the statue he moulds, is not only an imitation of nature, but an expression of his own soul. It is as fascinating and powerful as it is suggestive. It is a poem revealed in form or color, revealed only in proportion to the capacity of the beholder to appreciate it. A noble statue is an object of physical beauty to all; but to the true lover of art, its ideal value is inestimable; for, in surveying it, he builds up within himself a statue-poem, an idea as distinct and glorious of the statue itself. He may be in part capable of expressing this feeling; but never wholly, for the impulse he receives is unbounded. As there can be no fixed standard of beauty, so varied are the capacities, and so different the degrees of cultivation, so there can be no limit to its appreciation. The farther we progress in cultivating a taste for art, still more enticing labyrinths do we discern, and the deeper is our desire to know and revel in them.

We live too much in dense cities, amid smoke and gas, too little in the woods, among mountains. There is much loveliness in nature that is as a sealed book to man. The heart of man, in a bent body, cooped up among boxes and barrels, loses its life, gets full of dollars and cents, which drive out faith and love. Pure air and fine scenery are a good remedy. Examine the sunset scenes of nature minutely—you shall find no fault. The twilight of the water, the shadows of the trees, the red light on the hills, the infinitely varied clouds—all are faultlessly, exquisitely beautiful. If we look at them in detail, or feel the grand harmony of the whole, we shall see that if there is error at all, it is in ourselves, and not in the thing which we can but partially comprehend, and which is infinitely above our criticism.—Spirit of the Age.

Return of an American Artist.

The friends of Art in this country will be glad to learn that Mr. William Page has returned to New York, from Europe, and will hereafter make this city his permanent residence. Two many of our artists stray off to Italy or Paris, and while indulging in the intellectual and social attractions of the old capitals of Europe, miss the golden opportunities for distinction which await them at home. It is worth the while of our young artists to remember that the most distinguished members of their fraternity have never been in Europe, and possibly never may go there. Elliott, the first among our portrait painters, was born in the state of New York, was a pupil of the National Academy, and has never wielded his brush except in this city. He owes nothing to Europe. Church, who is at the head of our landscape painters, if not of all landscapists, is a native of Connecticut, and learned his art in New York. He has travelled extensively over his native continent in pursuit of subjects for his pencil, but he has never felt the need of European study. W. S. Mount is the most celebrated of our genre painters, and he, too, is a native of New York, a pupil of the National Academy, and another home-loving youth whose homely thoughts have required no foreign polishing to give them currency among his countrymen.

We might enumerate many other examples; but these seem to prove that there is no absolute need for our artists to go to Paris, Dusseldorf, or Rome to arrive at the highest eminence in their profession.

Mr. Page had established his reputation before ever he crossed the Atlantic, and the works he has executed in Rome, great as their merits are, do no more than sustain the expectation which his earlier performances had warranted. Mr. Page is a native of Albany, and another of the distinguished pupils of the National Academy during the presidency of Mr. Morse. The severe accuracy and beauty of his drawings gained him the highest honors of the Academy while he was yet a pupil; but his master predicted that he would fail as a colorist. The first picture he exhibited, however, proved the fallacy of this judgment. The brilliancy of his color at once attracted the attention of the public, and the dignified treatment of his portraits, and the deep religious sentiment of his historical compositions, made him at once famous. No American artist ever attained so sudden a reputation, or so worthily sustained his early promises. His fondness for the serious subjects of Scriptural history was early exhibited in a Holy Family, painted, we believe, in 1835, and now among the collection of the Boston Athenæum; a composition remarkable for its expression and the brilliancy of its color.

But great as his success had been, Mr. Page was very far from being satisfied with his achievement. Like Reynolds, he had a devotional love for Titian and the religious schools of Venetian art, and, in aiming to discover the secret of color of the great hierarchy of painters, he made a good many experiments, some of which, like those of Reynolds, were failures, though they led eventually to the attainment of the object to which he so religiously devoted himself. Eleven years ago he left New York for Europe his object being to study the great masterpieces of Titian. After a brief stay in Paris, he pushed on to Florence, where he remained some three years, visiting Venice occasionally, and then took up his residence in Rome. He made a few copies of some of Titian's heads, to fill orders that had been given him in New York, which are said to be perfect marvels, not as imitations or copies, but reproductions. When placed by the side of the originals, it was impossible to tell which was the copy. But, it was not the aim of the artist to copy Titian, or to imitate his method; he worked to accomplish similar effects by his own methods. Robert Browning and other English authors in Italy who have seen the pictures painted by Mr. Page in Florence and Rome, have awarded him the very highest praise that could be bestowed upon a painter. The last great picture which he executed in Rome was on one of the grandest themes in the Old Testament, Aaron and Hur sustaining the hands of Moses. We are glad to learn that this picture is now on the way to New York, where it will probably be exhibited to the public.

It is a good sign for art when painters like George L. Brown and William Page, after residing so many years in Italy, find it to their interest, and in consonance with their inclinations, to come back to New York and set up their ensels among their own countrymen. West and Leslie found their home in London, and they would probably have failed to receive the patronage from their own countrymen which foreigners so liberally bestowed upon them. But times have greatly changed since they went abroad, and there is no longer such necessity for our young artists to go to Europe either for the purpose of study or in pursuit of patrons.—Independent.

THE CORPS DE BALLET.—Green-rooms now-a-days, says Dickens, are sadly dull, slow, hum-drum places of resort. In a minor theatre they are somewhat more lively, as there is no second green-room, and the young sylphides of the corps de ballet are allowed to join the company. The conversation of these young ladies, if not interesting, is amusing, and if not brilliant, is cheerful. They generally bring their needlework with them if they have to wait long between the scenes (frequently to the extent of an entire act) in which they have to dance, and they discourse with much naïveté upon the warmth or coldness of the audience, with reference to the applause bestowed; the bad temper of the stage manager, and their own temporary disposition from corns, which, with pickled salmon, unripe pears, the proper number of lengths for a silk dress, and the comparative merits of the whiskers and moustaches of the musicians in the band, (with some of whose members they are sure to be in love, and whom they very frequently marry, leaving off dancing, and have enormous families,) form the almost invariable staple of a ballet girl's conversation. Poor, simple-minded, good-natured, hard-working, little creatures, theirs is but a rude and stern lot. To cut capers, and wear paint; to find one's own shoes and stockings, and be strictly virtuous, on a salary varying from nine to eighteen shillings a week—this is the pabulum of a ballet-girl. And hark in thine ear, my friend. If any man talks to you about the syrens of the ballet, the dangerous enchantresses and cockatrices of the ballet, the pets of the ballet, whose only thoughts are about Broughams and diamond aigrettes, dinners at Richmond, and villas at St. John's Wood—if anybody tells you that the majority, or even a large proportion, of our English danseuses are inclined in this way, just inform him, with my compliments, that he is a dolt and a teller of untruths. I can't say much of the ballet morality abroad; of the poor rats de l'opera in Paris, who are bred to wickedness from their very cradle upwards; of the Neapolitan ballerino, who are obliged to wear green calzonis, and to be civil to the priests, lest they should be put down altogether; or of the poor Russian ballet-girls, who live altogether in barracks, are conveyed to and from the theatre in omnibuses, and are birched if they do not behave themselves, and yet manage somehow to make a bad end of it; but as regards our own sylphides, I say that naughtiness among them is the exception, and cheerful, industrious, self-denying perseverance in a hard, ungrateful life, the honorable rule.

Musical Correspondence.

PITTSFIELD, AUGUST 6.—Knowing the interest which you take in all that relates to the advancement of musical science and education, and the high estimation in which you have appeared to hold the Mendelssohn Musical Institute, at Pittsfield, I wish, to call your attention to a soirée, given by the pupils of that school a few weeks since, at which I had the pleasure of being present. And first let me say that these soirées are not the result of long-continued practice on a few pieces, for the express purpose of display,—but only fair specimens of the attainments of the performers. I notice this, because it is uncommon, and in doing so I give only a merited testimony to the honesty and thoroughness of the method adopted at this school. In regard to the programme, while all the pieces were remarkably well-performed, perhaps the most attractive were "Adelaide," the "Terzette, La Sera," and the "Allegro and Andante from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5, C minor." I give the programme:

Soirée Musicale, given by the young ladies of Mendelssohn Musical Institute, Pittsfield, Mass., under the direction of Edward B. Oliver, Principal, Tuesday evening, August 7.

1. Overture, Der Freischütz. . . . . C. M. von Weber.
2. Song. Auf Flügeln des Gesanges. . . . . Mendelssohn.
3. La Sylphide. . . . . Felix Godefrid.
4. Trio. Hark, 'tis the mermaid's evening song. . . . . Glover.
5. Sonata in D. . . . . Haydn.
6. Song. Adelaide. . . . . Beethoven.
7. Sonata in F. . . . . Kuhlman.
8. Sonata in Bb. . . . . Mozart.
9. Terzette, La Sera. . . . . Lucantoni.
10. Allegro and Andante from Symphony No. 5, C minor. . . . . Beethoven.

The whole of this excellent programme was listened to by a select and highly appreciative audience, with many expressions of delight at the finished and truthful style in which the pieces were rendered, as well as the classical character of the selections.

After the concert, an eloquent address was made by D. S. Reed, of Pittsfield, in which he stated the object, and the method of instruction of the Mendelssohn Musical Institute, saying truly that though the pupils educated there were second to none in musical execution, yet this was not the sole or the chief object of the instruction given; the principal aim being to cultivate the mind and heart by means of music, that treating it as a science, and not as a mere accomplishment. (I may mention here the opinion expressed by one of the professors in a neighboring college, that the study of music on the plan pursued at the Mendelssohn Musical Institute, would be a better discipline of the mind than many of the branches now considered so indispensable to a course of collegiate instruction.) In conclusion, Dr. Reed said in allusion to the name of the Institute, that he could not but feel that the spirit of Mendelssohn had been present, sympathizing in the enjoyment of the hour.

I am sorry that I cannot say much for the musical culture of Pittsfield, if I may judge from the specimens I heard yesterday at one of the principal churches, where we were treated to chorals miserably performed on the organ, with variations on "The last rose of summer" for interludes, &c., "Hear me, Norma," for a voluntary. The musical taste of the children is being cultivated by a new set of temperance songs, adapted to such melodies as "Nelly Bly," "Twere vain to tell thee all I feel," &c., which were sung with great spirit to a crowded house, at a temperance lecture last evening. In the midst of such opposing influences, if a classical school like the Mendelssohn, can exist and prosper, it must be because it has a life in itself which adverse circumstances cannot destroy; and such an attempt to advance music to its true position and dignity, should receive the encouragement of all lovers of the science. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., AUG. 20.—Mr. Dwight. On Monday last the German Festival commenced. From Worcester, Hartford, Westfield, and other places poured in singers, delegates, and non officials. In the evening, the Springfield Society gave a Grand Concert at Music Hall, assisted by the Worcester and Hartford singing societies, and Messrs. Casseres, Schubert and Escott. Schubert acted as accompanist, and conducted the full concerted pieces which were unaccompanied. Here is a programme which perhaps you may deem fit to insert.

PART FIRST.

1. Opening. . . . . Springfield Cornet Band.
2. "The Lord's Day": Chorus, with Quartet Solo. Sung by all the Societies. C. Kreuzer.
3. "Farewell": Solo for Baritone. . . . . Kucken. Sung by Mr. Ch. Meyer.
4. "The Precious Stone": Quartet. . . . . Taubert. Sung by the Hartford Quartet Club.
5. "Polca": Comic Song. . . . . A. Shafer. Sung by the Worcester Singing Society.
6. Trio: For Piano, Violin, and Violoncello. . . . . Beriot. Performed by Sen. Casseres, Messrs. Escott and Schubert.
7. "The Chapel": Quartet. . . . . Spontini. Sung by the Hartford Quartet Club.
8. Hunting Chorus. . . . . Fr. Abt.

PART SECOND.

1. "Huntmen's Farewell": Chorus. . . . . Mendelssohn. Sung by all the Societies.
2. "The Brightest Eyes": Song for Baritone. . . . . Stigall. Sung by Mr. Ch. Meyer.
3. "The Young Musicians". . . . . Kucken. Sung by the Hartford Quartet Club.
4. "The Bill of Fare": Chorus. . . . . Zellner. Sung by the Worcester Singing Society.
5. "The Alpine Morning": Duo for Tenor and Baritone. Sung by Messrs. Adelstein and Meyer. Kucken.
6. Fantaisie: For Cornet & Piston. . . . . Bellini. Performed by Mr. Patz.
7. Quartet: From the Opera, "The Daughter of the Regiment". . . . . Donizetti. Sung by the Hartford Quartet Club.
8. The Spring Feast March. . . . . C. Becker. Sung by the Springfield Singing Society.

Of the full concerted pieces the "Huntsmen's Farewell," by Mendelssohn, was decidedly rendered with greater effect than all the others, if I except in part the Chorus with Quartet Solo, by Kreuzer. The tenor of the Springfield Society, Mr. Adelstein, has a good voice, and sang both of his songs with remarkable precision and taste. "The Brightest Eyes," by Stigelli, was encored and the singer responded. The Hartford Singing Society was represented at the Concert only by the Quartet attached to it. The four singers have each fine voices, sui generis. They sang their pieces with great effect, paid close attention to marks of expression, &c. One of the finest things among the many was the "Young Musician," by Kücken, which was loudly called for a second time. For "The Chapel," a Quartet by Spontini, they substituted something else, which to me was not half so good as the former. It is seldom we hear anything of the veteran composer in this country, and my disappointment was therefore great. The Worcester Singing Society received a well-merited recall after the chorus by Zöllner, entitled "The Bill of Fare." It was a very amusing and lively piece. The duo, "The Alpine morning," did not go off well, whose fault it was it would be hard to say. It was evident that "a screw was loose" somewhere. Patz, of Worcester, played his Cornet Solo, from Bellini's "Il Pirata" finely, and was ably supported by Casseres' accompaniment on the piano. The latter undertook his part just a few moments before going on the stage, and consequently had not rehearsed once with the soloist. This was perceptible only in the Finale, where the tempo was rather hard, and the mistake on the part of the pianist was glaring and anything but pleasing. He read from a manuscript, however, and it may not have been his fault, although it is a duty which all performers owe to the public and their own reputation to rehearse together before they appear, and in this respect, he, or both of them may well cry "Peccavi."

The Instrumental Trio, by Escott, Casseres and Schubert on Themes from "Der Freyschütz," was very well executed, but did not produce any effect. It is too thin and disconnected. The airs recurring were pleasing, but De Beriot did not treat them with sufficient fullness. The piece is more suited to a parlor than to the concert-room. The pianist introduced a Cadenza which was rather long, but he executed it finely, on a poor piano, just good enough for nursery use. Why is it that Springfield cannot boast a decent instrument at concerts? For a place like the Music Hall, no square piano is sufficient, because the stage and its "fixins" absorb sounds which should go forth within the Hall. After the concert the Germans assembled at Gruendler's Hotel, where the practice room of the society is, to witness a performance of Kotzebue's play, "The Deserter." Curiosity led me down to the room among many others, and I was not at all sorry. The play was much applauded and all appeared to enjoy the speeches and fun which the actors engaged in with great delight. This being over, dancing was now on the tapis, and the good people enjoyed themselves until an early hour in the morning all the while praying earnestly, that the rain which was pouring lustily, might cease so that their picnic would have a fine day. Daylight came and with it no prospect of the rain's cessation, so the picnic was postponed and our German friends sang songs of "Vaterland" and danced all day with very little intermission. Schubert behaved bravely, and did not flinch one moment but was ever ready, to play accompaniments, or dance music, or call to order some noisy compatriot who suffered his emotions to overcome his judgment. In the afternoon, other singers and friends arrived from Worcester and other places and I had the good luck to be present at the performance of some of their finest pieces. In addition to the pieces on the programme, they produced several others whose names I do not now remember. Night came, and still music, singing and dancing continued, with refreshments of course—"mais, cela va sans dire." Wednesday dawned a brilliant morning and by 10 o'clock the procession was out, preceded by the marshal on horseback and the Springfield Band. On they went to the Round Hill where gymnastic exercises, part-songs, dancing, and other amusements began and continued until 6 in the evening. During the day and especially in the afternoon, many citizens joined them and gladly participated in the jovialities. Males and females, all seemed to "go in" with love. The procession returning was reinforced by many non-Germans. Peaceably and delightfully did the Festival commence, continue and end, without anything to mar the good feeling and harmony which all seemed willing to keep up. To me, the music, that is, the part-singing by male voices, was the best feature of the Festival. To the majority who enjoyed a "good time," the lager beer and the dancing were thought superior.

Yours truly, AN AMATEUR.

Editorial Correspondence.

The next day I improved, by the sun's favor, by a charming trip to Salisbury plain, and saw the glorious old cathedral—my first cathedral! O, there were builders in those days six centuries ago! I know not if they called themselves architects, but certainly "they builded better than we know." Standing under the grand old elms, in the green, silent close, we could not satiate the appetite with gazing, feasting on the vast, but light, symmetrical proportions of the soaring pile. Anything more harmonious, more beautiful upon so grand a scale we could hardly conceive. Long time we lingered, outside and inside, under the Gothic arches, in the religious stillness of the square green cloister with its galleries, in the curiously beautiful chapter house, its octagonal interior encrusted with very primitive and child-like sculptures illustrative of the bible histories from the creation to the time of Joseph; or climbing the tower and hanging over the quaint old town, with the bishop's palace and garden, the crooked streets and houses all so old and English, nestling in shrubbery and ivy and roses. After a long walk about the town, we returned to take a farewell gaze, and heard the sound of choir and organ swelling from within, and making the grand pile thrill to topmost spire with music that seemed like the religious outbreath of its own soul. The charming rural scenery, the highly cultivated fields, old trees, thatched cottages and ivied ruins, golden grain, and scarlet poppies strewn the road sides, on the way out and back, was equally rewarding. Good bye, old England!

The inexperienced traveller in Europe seems to live years in days. To wake up every morning, dreaming of home and the old wonted ways, and be startled to find in what long imagined and remote scenes you are! A fortnight since, America; now Europe. But yesterday at Salisbury Cathedral; in the sunset of this very next day, I stand before the far more marvellous and thoroughly transporting old cathedral of Rouen, gazing up with awe and wonder at its curiously sculptured towers, its vast variety and wealth of form, endless variety of details all climbing, growing up to lose themselves in the infinite, the incarinate spirit of the religious age which reared it. Inside of its court, where the masses of Gothic masonry, the towers, the unfinished iron spire, rise all around you, the impression is quite overwhelming and sublime. Inside the church, the thoughts are led up by the slender clustered shafts, along the lofty springing arches of nave, and aisles and transept,—the Gothic unity, disturbed, however, by huge Greek columns which sustain a gallery about the altar—and the soul forgets itself in the vastness of such surroundings, every point of which is vitalized and finished to some exquisite detail of suggestive art and purpose. Day had not faded out before we had made a rapid pilgrimage to the more purely Gothic and harmonious, as to our mind no less wonderful church of St. Ouen; to the church of St. Maclou, rich in curious sculptures by the famous old Jean Goujon; to the Palais de Justice; the Place de la Pucelle, where Joan of Arc was burned; the old palace of the Duke of Bedford, the wall of whose court-yard is covered with elaborate marble sculpture, representing the meeting of Henry VIII. and Francis on the "field of the cloth of gold;" to many a quaint old house and monument of those middle ages, such as surprise one at almost every turn amid the narrow, crooked streets of that fantastical old city. I hardly expect to see a place that shall speak so instantly and strangely to the imagination than old Rouen. It is the ideal of a picturesque old city. And beautiful as it is strange. There is the quaintest mingling of the oldest and the most modern. On the broad, spacious quays on both sides of the Seine, here wider than at Paris, spanned by beautiful and noble bridges, adorned with statues, and all alive with shipping and bright-colored streamers, you have stately blocks of hotels and of elegant stores, dazzling with all the dainty wares of Paris, and a fashionable throng, mingled with soldiers, Zouaves in their Arab costume, and whatever else is gay, continually streams by. Under the window of my hotel, on the quay, was a colossal bronze statue, in a sitting posture, holding a scroll of music: it proved to be that of Boieldieu, the most genial of the French composers, who was a native of Rouen. Statues of Corneille, and of Joan of Arc, were everywhere. All this new life within a stone's throw of such strange, majestic, almost weird old monuments of a past age and faith. The glitter of to-day's life and the romance, the dream of history, stand out there bodily, alike real, in close contiguity. Which is substance, which is shadow?

In truth there is something shadowy in the look of those old churches, particularly the Cathedral. From my window I looked down upon the new life and the river; turning to go down stairs, lo! there rose the strange and dream-like towers of the Cathedral right against me, with a startling boldness. As you stand in the square and contemplate the front, the stone of whitish grey, gnawed and blackened by the teeth of time, looks as if it had been passed through fire; it has a lava, pumice-like appearance; and the wondrous pile seems spectral, like the ghost of a cathedral. Not so the rich brown stone at Salisbury. Step inside, and the forms, the practices, at least, of the old faith exist there still. In every chapel and side alcove, or at the foot of the grand altar, at whatever hour, you find some kneeling worshipper; perchance a baptism, or a wedding, or some other sacred office, attracts you by its low hum in a corner; or some old man or woman is anxious to sprinkle you with holy water from a very dirty looking brush. Fresh-faced young peasant girls, in clean white pretty caps, trip softly in and kneel, and trip out with still lighter step, looking refreshed and comforted.

The next morning (Sunday) it was our good fortune to be present at a service, both in the Cathedral and St. Ouen. Then as we looked around amid the shafts, and aisles, and arches, the marble monuments, the paintings and the pictured windows of old Gothic architecture, shadowy and half-realized before, it suddenly with the thrill of music became all alive, aglow with sentiment and meaning; then there was a spirit in it; the music and the architecture became one. The compositions sung or played upon the organ were not great; there was no mass like those of Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven; it was a simpler, choral music. But it was exceedingly impressive; especially at St. Ouen. The great space of the choir, at the great altar, was a huge nest or cage of singing priests and boys, a hundred or more of them; there were magnificent bass voices, and tenors sweet and as robust as we have rarely heard in opera; and the silvery fresh soprani and contralti of the boys were pure and true. At times a school of boys, some hundreds, from beyond the choir, or a nest of charmingly little girls, from a side chapel, all so sweetly dressed, with pretty caps or bonnets, some all in white with roses, under the charge of some nun or abbess, reinforced the choral flood with the sweet contribution of their voices, like so many rills and cascades from the hillsides pouring into one basin. A powerful, but small-looking organ, finely played, accompanied, as also several instruments, a double-bass, bass-horn, &c. Over the entrance, at the east end of the nave, (some four hundred and fifty feet in length it is) is suspended the great organ, a marvellous piece of dark old architecture, laden with rich carvings, and surmounted with emblematic figures, angels, St. Cecilius, &c., and behind and above all, the richly stained round window, and the exquisite vaulting, by which it all melted into the general architecture of the building. The works of this organ (in both churches), we were told, are new; the outside is as originally shaped. As we stood back there in the nave, just far enough forward to look round at the organ, and its great flood of tone came down upon us, and thrilled and vibrated through all the arches and recesses of the mighty building, and then paused for responses from the singing crowd about the altar, at the other end, it seemed to us the most sublime, the most religious utterance that human Art could well invent. One was lifted off his feet, merged in the general aspiration, with which all that met the eye or ear conspired. Of course it was no time to be critical. Were we so disposed we might suggest that a much higher style of music might have been played upon that organ, than we heard whenever the organist stepped out of the most plain and massive choral. His instrument was magnificent; such round, voluminous hasses, such mellow, lusty diapasons, and such exquisitely voiced, piquant reed tones, it seemed to us that we had never heard. But his voluntaries were very modern, in the solemn moments of the Mass a little operatic and sentimental, and with next to nothing of the strict form or the implied spirit of the fugue, which is the very Gothic principle in music. One longed for a grand, infinitely suggestive fugue of Bach or Handel, to carry out the correspondence with such architecture, and let the whole service both to eye and ear spring as it were out of one vitalizing germ of thought.

O for a whole week in Rouen! That evening we found ourselves in Paris, and another new, strange world already takes us deep into itself, led hither as it were blind-folded through many a mysterious gate. D.

A Case of Conscience.

The other day a very respectable looking middle aged gentleman, entered one of the fashionable music stores up town in New York, to select some music, the selection made, payment was tendered, when the clerk, supposing him to be a music teacher, allowed him the usual professional advantage. "I really do not know if I am entitled to this consideration, said the gentleman, as this music is for a friend." "Do you belong to the profession?" politely inquired the clerk. "Yes! I do," was the reply. "Then sir, you are certainly entitled to the usual professional privileges." Upon which the gentleman took his change, and his departure forthwith.

A quarter of an hour had scarcely elapsed ere the gentleman returned, and anxiously looked around for the clerk who had served him, to whom he delivered a sealed envelope, enclosing the discount allowed in the price of the music, with the following letter which we recommend to the attention of those who claim the privileges of a profession to which they do not belong.

SIR,—Please indulge what you may regard as a foolish notion. I have been a teacher of music in this city for some years. Lately having moved away, and having no occasion for it, I have not taught. The music I got just now is for a friend. Under these circumstances I am not sure that I ought to buy at teacher's prices. Yours, TRUTH.

Music Abroad.

SIGNORA GUERRABELLA.—I have seen the young great American prima donna, the lady di Guerrabella. I say great advisedly, as she is a great singer, great actress, great beauty, and has a great heart, and all this I will prove to you in a few lines. She has been singing the carnival in Bergamo with brilliant success, and it takes a first rate artist to succeed in that noted musical city, famous for Donzelli, Rubini, Donizetti, Mayer, and a host of others. She sang there the "Stella di Napoli," a most difficult and tiring opera, and which demands the highest soprano voice, great agility, and great dramatic powers. These she displayed to the enthusiastic public, who interrupted her continually with the loudest applause. She sung often in some concerts given by Sivori, the great violinist, airs from "Puritani," "Beatrice di Tenda," "Linda," "Semiramide," and others, which were always encored, the great proof of success in Italy, and which brought down the house with applause. She next sang also in Milan, (where she has just finished one of the most successful engagements,) the "Daughter of the Regiment," and "Rigoletto." For many years there has not been such a brilliant debut in Milan, and it went on increasing every night in triumphs. Her singing and acting are perfect, and every one agreed she made them laugh or cry as she pleased—such singing, such life, such elegance, such handling of drum and rifle, had never been heard and seen in a vivandière before. In the adieu song handkerchiefs were at all eyes, the next moment every one was ready laughingly to join her, marching up and down the stage with her little feet in such martial style, trying to infuse life into her old aunt. The Addio and Salut à la France were encored every night, even to a third time. Her short skirt and tight velvet jacket set off her elegant figure, and if any one doubts the accuracy of my statements let him read the first papers of Milan and Turin, and they will say I have far from exaggerated. She is, I hear, engaged for the Fiera at Bergamo for the summer, and in autumn goes to Constantinople with large emolument.

Now as I have proved her a great artist, I must prove her great heart. She was engaged to sing at Trieste, to open the large theatre with "Linda." She proceeded to Venice, en route for Trieste, but was met at the station by the secretary, who told her that not being able to secure the theatre in Trieste, they begged she would open the theatre there in Venice. She at once saw through the trick. The national grief of the country being expressed by the Italians not sanctioning a theatre open, Count Tegenberg, Governor of Venice, ordered one open, and the artists were to be caught. She refused, although her own terms were to be accepted, an engagement at Vienna, another at the Fenice, and all this to be assured her by the Governor in person. I translate from the papers her answer: "What did the Lady di Guerrabella reply, who, being born in the country of Liberty, any one can imagine her detestation of despotism! Not the largest promises; not doubling the pay; not offers of the most lucrative engagements; nothing could tempt the heroic woman. She had lost money, she had lost another engagement, which she had refused for Trieste, but she calmly replied, 'I leave,' and returned to Milan that night." You may imagine the effect it produced in Milan, when, no sooner had she descended from her carriage, than congratulations poured in from every side, and the President of the Venetian Emigration Committee, Count Correr, and Count Maroner, waited on her to thank her in the name of the committee for her noble conduct, and to offer her the highest honor they could pay her—a diploma as citizen of Venice. I know you will feel interest in all these details of your gifted countrywoman, as the Guerrabella is descended from some of the oldest and best families in the United States, who shed their blood for liberty and their land; and you cannot but wish with us, success to the noble lady.—N. O. Picayune, Aug. 19.

Paris.

I have at last something like an event to tell you about, but it has been a long time coming. Boieldieu's Opera, Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, after being so long threatened by the manager of the Opéra Comique, was revived last Thursday. But before I enter into any details on this interesting musical occurrence, I will first discharge an agreeable duty and inform you of a promising debut on the boards of the theatre in question by a young artist from the Théâtre Lyrique, Mlle. Marimon. This lady was to have made her first appearance in Boieldieu's opera, but Mad. Faure-Lefebvre having been re-engaged, the part, which devolved to her by right, could not be withheld from her; consequently the débutante had to content herself with the part of Catarina in Auber's Diamants de la Couronne. In this she has now been heard three times, each new performance confirming the favorable impression of the first. Mlle. Marimon, though she has much to learn as an actress, is already a brilliant and accomplished singer, and will, no doubt, with the intelligence she displays, make rapid progress.

Now for Boieldieu and his once most popular of comic operas. Le Petit Chaperon Rouge was first produced in 1818 at the Théâtre Feydeau, when the principal parts were sung by the celebrated Martin, Ponchard the elder, and Mad. Boulanger, afterwards succeeded by the lively and graceful Mad. Gavaudan. It was one of the most attractive works of the day, and retained its attractions till they were eclipsed by the greater vigor and depth of La Dame Blanche. All the old airs, which were constantly hummed by the fathers of the present generation, were heard again on Thursday night with a sort of affectionate pleasure. Many of them had still the power of touching by their simple grace, and seemed scarcely to have lost any of their original freshness. Mad. Faure Lefebvre was charmingly graceful in the part of Rose d'Amour, and obtained an encore in her ronde "Depuis longtemps gentille Annette." M. Crosti sang the music of Rodolphe admirably, but failed as an actor to give the part its proper characteristics. Rodolphe is a sort of Don Juan in water colors, and should be played with lightness and an easy grace of manner, tinged with mockery; but M. Crosti takes the character literally and prosaically, and deprives it consequently of all distinctive mark.—London Musical World, August 11.

The corporation of the city of Paris is busy pulling down and building theatres.

Diruit, edificat, mutat quadrata rotunda.

It has purchased of M. Dejean the Cirque Impériale, that the new Boulevard du Prince Eugène may pass over its site; and, on the other hand, it is buying out the tenants and holders of houses in the Rue Basse du Rempart, which are to come down to make room for the new Opera house. The Municipal Council have just voted unanimously in favor of the plans and designs last submitted to them.—Ibid.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The season of 1860 has been pronounced, on authority, the most lucrative of the last ten years. This must be attributable in a great measure to the growing prestige of the theatre, since the past year has not been remarkable for its novelties or its new singers. The solitary novel production of the season, Gluck's Orfeo e Eurydice, was not much relied on, being brought out at a concert, the management fearing to essay it even on an extra night.

The new singers, Mad. Ceilling and M. Faure, were certainly great "hits," and did not fail to exercise a powerful influence on the fortunes of the theatre, the lady more especially, who proved herself a consummate artist in every respect, and who grew more and more into favor with the public up to the last night of the season. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, too, improved her position considerably, not because she did anything superior to Dinorah, the first part she performed in this country, but because she was better known and her talents consequently more thoroughly appreciated. The attraction of the season, moreover, was greatly enhanced by the announcement that Mad. Grisi was to give her "twelve last performances," a statement, nevertheless, that many, from reasons unnecessary to state, did not put implicit faith in, but which no doubt had its weight with some section of the musical community. The fact that Mad. Grisi's "twelve last performances" modulated into almost twenty, and that at the end of the season nothing whatever was said of the great artist's final departure—a very laconic mode of treating the public, by the bye—incontestably proves that she will re-appear to take more "farewells," and again, not disappoint the world by her breach of promise. Mad. Grisi has frequently been warned to quit the stage when her successor should appear. She looked around her this season, anxious no doubt for an excuse to go, and cried, "Where is my successor?" and Echo answered "Nowhere!" And so she will return next year, just "once more," and await her successor, who is sure to come and declare herself in the person of Mlle. —, or Mad. * * *. The public doubtless imagined that they should have been consulted in this matter; but the management thought otherwise, and seemed never to have considered how far playing at fast and loose with them might give offence.—Ibid.

MODENA.—The last Minister of Public Instruction, having been informed that there existed in the palatinate library of the capital of the duchy a collection of music of the 15th and 16th centuries, abandoned to the mice and worms, and that there was another collection, equally precious, belonging to the 17th century, in the National Palace, ordered the two collections to be united. Signor Angelo Catelani, maitre de chapelle at the cathedral, and assistant conservator at the Library, a gentleman deeply versed in musical bibliography and literature, has been charged by Government with the task of making out a catalogue of these musical works. Among them are numerous productions of Stradella's, some of which are not known. The catalogue, enriched with biographical, bibliographical, and historical notes, is to be published.—Ibid.

MLEE. FINOLI.—The journal Il Pirata, published in Turin, chronicles, in terms of enthusiastic eulogy, the debut, at the Teatro Alfieri in that city, of the Signorina Guiseppina Finoli in the character of Rossina in Rossini's celebrated opera Il Barbiere. The performance appears to have been a most successful one, and at the close of the opera the fair débutante was vociferously recalled to receive the congratulation of the audience. Our readers will remember the young lady as occupying a prominent position at our various public concerts a year or two ago—she was engaged by Mr. Lumley, when he was manager of Her Majesty's Theatre; but for some unexplained reason did not appear. The Italian critic speaks in strains of the highest encomium of the quality of her voice, method, and dramatic power.—Ibid.

Musical Chit-Chat.

NEW YORK.—About this time expect much humbug. Such should be the marginal reading for the month of August, in the social almanac of the metropolis. Humbug in the alarming sacrifices of the haberdashers; humbug in the fall trade of the milliners; in the closing week of the season announced by theatrical managers; in the pretence which finds the city intolerable in the summer; in the shut churches—as if every one whose soul is worth saving were out of town; in — but, though the subject is seductive, I will not be drawn out of my legitimate course.

The Italian Opera in its management, is not quite free from the epidemical humbug. The memory of the much suffering public goes not far backward; else we should less contentedly suffer so much; else we should not fail to note that the innocent looking paragraphs which now begin to meet our eyes in the newspapers, are very like what appeared last year, and twenty-four months ago, and the year before that. They are mild, charitable paragraphs, pleasantly, hopefully suggestive; they say that this or that indefatigable manager, or impresario—the latter word has lost the gloss of novelty, but is yet a favorite—will open the Academy of Music on or about the first of September, with a company selected with unusual care; that new operas are to be brought out "in rapid succession"—we always find this phrase; that a season of unprecedented brilliancy may be looked for; and then something is said about expectation and tiptoe. There is always another indefatigable impresario prowling about Europe, seeking talent. We remark that musical talent is like certain wines of rare bouquet: it will not bear the sea voyage, and is apt to arrive here in a deplorable condition, flat or sharp, as the case may be. Somehow or other, when the season really opens, we find all our old friends on the stage, in the orchestra, everywhere. The same fearful and wonderful chorus, with its good old gestures—right hand, left hand, both hands together—wanders clumsily about. The favorite operas of our youth again delight us, and the respectable second-hand stage furniture plays many a part, as in the winters past. Well, we can reasonably ask for no better artists than those we have, and the orchestra is usually excellent; we do not complain of the absolute; we only grow fretful at times when we compare promise with performance. If the management would but say that they were to give us a fair repetition of what we have always applauded, adding a word of confidence in the well-known generosity of an American audience, we would be well satisfied, would pay our money and enjoy the show, provided we had not free tickets. In the latter case, we should be obliged to criticise sharply and without remorse. We are all of us Minstrelsy in the matter of operatic amusements: we still hope that something will turn up next season. May we live to see it!

In town there has been very little music for the last weeks, as every one knows. The Palace Garden, a really delightful place, and much frequented, has offered to Mr. C. Jerome Hopkins a theatre for three concerts. These gave enjoyment to many, and added to his own reputation. A variety of music, called light, has been performed at the same establishment through this week. Fortunately the audiences have not been exacting, and the convenient situation of the concert room allows one to retire into the shade of the colored lamps and trees when he has heard enough of the vocalism. Ethiopian minstrelsy still holds its own, and draws the crowd to its halls. I must deplore the necessity which compels Señor Oliveira to blacken his face because he plays on the violin in the company of the sables; for he is too much an artist to become in any measure a buffoon.—N. Y. Albion.

MUSIC IN PORTSMOUTH, N. H.—A correspondent writes as follows, under date of Aug. 21st:

A taste for negro minstrelsy prevails here to a very considerable extent, but very little for music of the best quality. In fact I consider Portsmouth many degrees removed from civilization—at least in music, and see no prospect of advancement. On the 7th inst., Parodi's first concert was given to a fair audience, who seemed pleased; but on the announcement of a second concert for next evening, there were found to be so few persons in the hall, that Parodi, Dennett and Hoffman were not to be seen. The company left for New York on the following Monday.

On the 20th. inst., Mrs. C. Varian James, "the celebrated American Prima Donna," assisted by Mr. William H. Cooke, of New York, and Mr. H. M. Dow, "the eminent pianist," of Boston, gave their first concert here. The lady has a soprano voice, of considerable power, expression, and sweetness, which combined with a prepossessing person, told on the audience. Mrs. James and Mr. Cooke sang two duets in a highly pleasing and artistic manner. Mr. Cooke has one of the sweetest tenor voices we have ever heard in Portsmouth, and he is entitled to commendation, for the skill he displays in its management. Mr. Dow's piano accompaniments were all that was required, and his solos were well executed.

The Athenæum, in noticing musical matters in France, says:

A phenomenon worthy of consideration by all generous persons interested in the occupation of women, is the increasing number of female players on stringed instruments, which the chronicles of the Conservative speak of. This year, at the examination of students, Mlle. Boulay gained a first—Mlle. Castellan a second—prize. The violoncello, too, has its professional students (and prize-gainers to boot) among the gentler sex. Madame Viardot is about to turn her genius, experience, and science to account, by assisting to edit a selection of the best classical vocal music of the Italian, German, and French schools, with directions as to style, accentuation, coloring, &c. This is a promise of no common value.

SAN FRANCISCO.—SACRED CONCERT AT ST. MARY'S CATHEDRAL.—The largest and most elegant audience ever drawn together in this city at the performance of a concert, was present last evening at St. Mary's Cathedral to hear the splendid gems of sacred music sung by the best musical talent that this city can produce. The entire space in the large Cathedral was filled to repletion, and it is estimated over three thousand persons were present. The music was rendered with great spirit and success by the several artistes, and with the exception of a misunderstanding between two of the singers, which, however, was adjusted in time to allow the beautiful duet "Quis Est Homo," between Mms. Biscaccianti and Escott to proceed; everything went off admirably. We are pleased to be able to state that the amount realized last evening will go far toward putting the choir fund in easy circumstances. His Grace, Archbishop Alemany, accompanied by the reverend fathers connected with the church, were present, and sat in the chancel during the execution of the music.—San Francisco Herald.

Madame Jullien's Benefit Concert, at the Surrey Gardens, drew an immense crowd of the sympathizers with the widow of one of the most widely known musicians and musical composers of the day. The performance commenced at half past six. Previously, the great music hall was crammed, in every part, to suffocation, besides every outlet and avenue to the building being literally choked up with people vainly endeavoring to obtain an admittance to hear the performance. Up to nine o'clock, the people continued in an uninterrupted stream, so that more persons were outside than were able to obtain accommodation in the Hall. The number of persons who attended was computed at 15,000; the bands of the Household Troops were in attendance, and the members of the Vocal Association.

We may take it for granted that those who would invest music with such universal attributes are themselves no musicians, either in heart or in intelligence, and are, in fact, as much the enemies of the art they would raise so preposterously above its natural and essential province, as those who seek to detract from its high and ennobling character, and its sisterhood with the most intellectually inspired of the Muses. As an exemplification of the natural alliance between these two extremes, we find in a French periodical, devoted exclusively to musical interests, a criticism on the work we have mentioned, in which the French writer, answering the delusive aspirations of the German, reduces music to a mere frivolous pastime, a means of relaxation from all earnest purpose whatever, and its production, to a work almost of mere mechanical ingenuity. These two poles of opinion, between which lies the truth about music, have lately received a wide development, which would seem to indicate either a decadence in the power of appreciation, or a period of transition to some future unknown condition of the art. The latter, amidst the wide spread of musical taste and education which characterizes the age, can hardly be considered otherwise than the true alternative. We are ourselves not going to venture on the hazy sea of musical metaphysics, but simply record our opinion, that music will never express anything but musical ideas, and that musical ideas can only be expressed in music. They are a distinct produce of the human mind, and a reflection of its activity, and, as such, cognate with every other thought and feeling of the soul and of the mind, though not interchangeable. The more widely cultivated the intellect of a musical composer, the stronger he will be in his especial capacity, and the music he writes will, doubtless, have something in it it would not have had without such general culture.—London Musical World.

SINGERS AND DANCERS IN ITALY.—According to the journal Trovatore, the number of professed singers in Italy at the present time is 1730, viz.: 440 prime-donne, 330 tenors, 280 barytones, 160 bassi, 50 buffos. Beside which Italy possesses 1670 dancers of both sexes, to wit 180 premières danseuses di range francese, 220 di range italiane; 100 premiers danseurs, 970 dancers of both sexes mezzo carattere, (which we suppose to mean perhaps third or fourth rate) and 40 ballet masters.

THE APPROACHING OPERATIC SEASON.—The present lessees of the Academy of Music, have by no means been idle. Indeed they have exerted themselves most successfully, and have probably engaged the finest company which has ever been brought out together for Opera in this country.

In the first place, the engagement of Max Maretzek, to which we alluded some two weeks since rather dubiously, is a fact. He returns to his old place at the Academy, which he will share with Signor Muzio. Max Maretzek, consequently, is again in contact as an employe with Mr. Ullmann, under the joint operatic firm of Ullmann & Strakosch. Little Patti, of course remains with them, not having gone to Europe. We hear that her voice has strengthened greatly during the summer recess, and that she has studied four new operas, in which she will revive the enthusiasm which she created last season. Cortesi will probably also be at the Academy, while Colson is already engaged, and Fabbri, one of the finest dramatic vocalists we have ever had in this country, makes her début in the coming season, which will commence on the 3d or 5th of September. We presume that we also shall have Miss Phillips, although we have not heard this positively. Of tenors, we have a fair supply. Brignoli and Errani, are already more or less favorably known to the lovers of opera in this city. But Tamherlik has also been engaged by Mr. Ullmann during his visit to Europe, and will appear here, although not at the commencement of the season. He shares the crown of Mario, and indeed by many connoisseurs, is preferred to that more delicate of tenors, as far more honest, affective, and energetic an artist. Ferri and Susini, also re-appear, while Karl Formes—the greatest basso we have ever had in this country, will also return to us. Engagements are also pending with the tenore Musiani, and our old friend the fat baritone—Amodio. We are not yet aware what novelty in the way of operas is intended to be offered us by the management, but presume that with so excellent a company, this will not be wanting.—N. Y. Sunday Dispatch.

As we mentioned, last week, Maurice Strakosch purposes to give us a couple of months of Italian Opera, here, this coming season; with the charming young prima donna, Adelina Patti, suitably supported, as the principal star.—N. O. Picayune, August 19.

WHERE THE SINGERS ARE.—Madame Fabbri is living in studios retirement at Hoboken, and she has added to her already extensive repertoire, the operas of "Lucrezia Borgia," "Norma," "Linda," and "Don Giovanni." She will sing in Boston about the 1st of October.

Mr. Forrest opens at the Holliday street theatre, Baltimore, to-morrow, in "Hamlet."

Signor Amodio, brother of the popular baritone, and himself an artist of note, has been engaged by M. Servadio, the director of the Cortesi troupe. He is now en route to the United States.

On dit, that during the next Italian opera season at our Academy of Music, a new opera by Sig. Muzio will be produced.

Attilio Cortesi is enjoying her villégiature at Rossville, Staten Island. At the same place says the Eco d'Italia, Servadio meditates his plan of battle for the next season in Cuba.

Susini is rustivating near Fort Hamilton.

Asoni is at a pleasant villa near Clifton, Staten Island.

Angiolina Ghioni has returned from her Canadian excursion, and is passing some time at Elizabeth, N. J.

Muzio is with the Yacht Club on its summer cruise.

Sufini and Errani oscillate between New York and the villas of their friends in the neighboring country.

Madame Colson and husband and Scola, the tenor, are at New Utrecht, L. I. Colson is making great progress in her knowledge of the Italian language and its idioms.—N. Y. Sunday Times.

HONOR TO A BUFFALO SINGER.—The Courier says that Miss Schmidt, of this city, whose splendid vocal powers are well known to our citizens, has been engaged to sing the soprano solos in the Oratorio of the Creation, which is to be produced before the Prince of Wales, in Toronto, on the 14th prox. There will be a chorus of six hundred singers present on this occasion. Those who have heard Miss Schmidt, either in the choir of Dr. Lord's church, or in the several concerts which she has so largely contributed to make attractive, will agree with us in saying that the Canadians could not have made a better selection.

A VERY SHARP TENOR.—Recently in Paris, a certain tenor, whose name it would not be fair to give, appears before the Tribunal to insist upon payment of the full sum mentioned in the conditional contract he signed with the manager of one of our theatres some two months ago. The tenor is engaged by an English impresario, and reckoned upon the money for the expenses to which he would be compelled by his journey. The manager coolly refuses to pay him, because he had not fulfilled the terms of the contract. He had no C sharp! And it was for this C sharp alone for which the manager cared. If he could produce a B flat it was fully as much as he was capable of; therefore, nothing more than the pay of an ordinary chorus singer should he have. The poor tenor defends himself most valiantly against the imputation. Not only has he a full C sharp, but, moreover, he can hold it.

The court ruminates for awhile and decides that nothing but real merchandise can be brought into court—that the tenor must sue in the ordinary way for loss of time and nothing more. Thereupon the tenor, who is pressed for time, no doubt, starts up and exclaims—"But, gentlemen, my C sharp is merchandise, and I can bring it into court!" and begins a series of roulades which echo against the roof of the hall terminating in the aforesaid C sharp, which thrill through the ears of the bench until they cry for mercy; and the mirth occasioned by the incident so completely alters the temper of the lawyers that they gave their verdict in favor of the oppressed one; and he carries off the whole sum mentioned in the contract amidst the laughter of judge, lawyer, witness and even the defendant himself.

AMNESTY TO WAGNER.—We hear from Dresden that the composer, Herr Richard Wagner, has been favored by a conditional amnesty from the King of Saxony. Herr Wagner may return to Germany, with the only exception of Saxony. The King's pardon, then, consists in not requiring the other German States to deliver the culprit up to him, in case he should be found living in one of them. This news has been dispatched to Paris, where Herr Wagner now lives. It remains to be seen how the music of that originated thinker, will thrive when the nourishment of a controversy, based on persecution of its writer, is withdrawn from it. His "Tristan und Ysolde," and the four Nibelungen operas, are, as matters have stood, long in coming. Illiberal as this act of pardon may seem, it is more than the Prussian Government has done. Nevertheless, Saxony seems to have the precedence in its cruelty to its political prisoners. The disclosures that have lately been made by the book of Herr Oelkers, one of the State prisoners recently released, are very painful, and come very near to the Naples state of things; at all events, leaving far behind the sufferings of Silvio Pellico. Where, then, we may ask, is the humanizing effect of scholarship? The King is a scholar, and has translated Dante.—Athenæum.

NEW ORLEANS.—The new and elegant lyric temple, at the corner of Bourbon and Toulouse streets, is making ready to present itself, on its opening, in November, more beautiful than ever, and with many additional attractions. The corps operatique and dramatique will be greatly strengthened and increased, many of the old and greatest favorites remaining, and several new and talented additions made. Among the artistes engaged are the popular tenor and basso, Philippe and Genibrel, whom, by-the-by, we saw announced, the other day, to perform at the Theatre Royal, Montreal, Mlle. D'Arcy, the piquante comic cantatrice, was also of the party. She would be a valuable accession to the opera, next season.—N. O. Picayune, Aug. 19.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Fading rose. Verdi. 25

A pretty poem written to fit a beautiful, although little known air in Verdi's "Luisa Miller."

An Englishman am I. G. S. Cony. 25

Highly effective, with a kind of a national anthem air about it.

Mrs. Cruiser, or Taming a Tartar. A domestic ditty. Carpenter. 25

When it is recollected that "Cruiser" was the name of the most vicious horse which Mr. Rarey had the good fortune to tame, the import of this truly comic song will be readily understood.

Janet's Choice. " 25

Two easy and pretty songs from the pen of a highly gifted amateur.

Merrily, merrily shines the morn. Skylark song. Alice Foster. 25

Less pretentious than vocal operatic rondos, polkas, &c., this song, with its sparkling vivacity and ear-catching melody will be just as attractive a piece with most hearers. It is not difficult.

Sorrowful trees. Hon. Mrs. Norton. 25

A song of sterling merit of which the name of the authoress is sufficient guarantee.

With Guitar Accompaniment.

Twinkling stars are laughing. Ordway. 25

Silvery midnight moon. " 25

Two of Ordway's most favorite melodies, which, although long familiar have never yet been accessible to those who use the Guitar for their accompaniments.

FATHER KEMP'S OLD FOLK'S CONCERT TUNES. 25

The thousands of persons who have listened to the unique and attractive performance of "the Old Folks," under the direction of Father Kemp, will thank the publishers for this neat volume of all their pieces. The many applications made for certain pieces sung by this company has led to the publication of this book. It contains, in addition to its sacred music, several of the most popular songs of the revolutionary times of '76 and thereabouts, many of which are not to be found in any other work.

The Tides.

BY WM. C. BRYANT.

The moon is at her full, and, riding high,
Floods the calm fields with light.
The airs that hover in the summer sky
Are all asleep to-night.

There comes no voice from the great woodland round
That murmured all the day;
Beneath the shadow of their boughs, the ground
Is not more still than they.

But ever heaves and moans the restless deep;
His rising tides I hear;
Afar I see the glimmering billows leap;
I see them breaking near.

Each wave springs upward, climbing towards the fair,
Pure light that sits on high;
Springs eagerly, and faintly sinks to where
The mother waters lie.

Upward again it swells; the moonbeams show
Again its glimmering crest;
Again it feels the fatal weight below,
And sinks, but not to rest.

Again and yet again; until the deep
Recalls his brood of waves;
And, with a sullen moan, abashed, they creep
Back to his inner caves.

Brief respite! they shall rush from that recess
With noise and tumult soon.
And fling themselves, with unavailing stress,
Up toward the placid moon.

O restless sea, that in thy prison here
Dost struggle and complain;
Through the slow centuries yearning to be near
To that fair orb in vain.

The glorious source of light and heat must warm
Thy bosom with his glow,
And on those mounting waves a nobler form
And freer life bestow.

Then only may they leave the waste of brine
In which they wander here,
And rise above the hills of earth and shine
In a serenest sphere.

Piano-Forte Composers.

HUMMEL.

While on the subject of pianoforte composers who have written not for a country or for an age, but for the world and for all time, we may allude to one who has done perhaps more legitimate service in developing the bonâ fide mechanism of the instrument than any predecessor, contemporary, or follower. Next to Moscheles (by many placed before him—we cannot but think in some respects unreasonably), comes Jean Nepomuk Hummel, one of the most talented, voluminous, and classical of all the pianoforte composers. Hummel—be not startled, reader—was not an original genius, although a long habit of composing endowed him with an unmistakable peculiarity of manner. But Hummel was a musician, heart and soul—one of the right sort, unbending, comprehensive, and enthusiastic. Educated under excellent masters, he soon acquired the art of writing with ease, while the strict school in which he had been nourished, regulated his taste in the true direction. Hummel was a more learned musician than Moscheles, although he did not possess Moscheles' originality. His contributions to the art were not less numerous and valuable. Both have been of inestimable worth in directing the studies of pianists, and both were endowed with a facility which promptly seconded these intentions. Hummel's concertos owe much more

While in the tutti or orchestral preludes‡, Hummel (like Moscheles) followed Mozart's symmetrical arrangement, he also (like Moscheles) overlooked that peculiarity which endows Mozart's concertos with such unity and completeness. Let us explain. In Mozart's concertos the three solos, of which, like the majority of concertos, they are composed, are continually accompanied in the orchestra by one or both the principal themes, separate or in conjunction, elaborate and worked out to the end. We find little of this in Hummel, although occasional glimpses are not wanting; but a complete development of the themes is never attempted, except in the tutti. For this reason, without alluding to his higher genius, Mozart not only wrote his concertos as though he had improved upon the models of Hummel, who lived after him (instead of Hummel half-rising to the models left by Mozart), but wrote them, as it were, side by side with Beethoven, the great developer himself—even he who gave Mendelssohn the first hints of dispensing altogether with the tutti, an evident superfluity.¶

Nevertheless, devoid of pure invention as was Hummel, his concertos are fine productions, indispensable to the completion of a musical education, beautiful and interesting as music, independent of their influence and of all arbitrary considerations. No pianoforte writer ever produced a greater variety of new and elegant passages than Hummel, who, we need hardly remind our readers, was one of the greatest pianists of his day; and as an impromptu player, or improvisateur, had few equals, and fewer superiors. (This reminds us that we have neglected to speak of the wonderful powers of improvisation possessed by Moscheles.) The miscellaneous works of Hummel—studies, fantasias, &c.—would of themselves form an interesting library. But, to come to an end with him, his sonatas for pianoforte solo are almost as rare (master as he needs must have been of the sonata-form) as those of Moscheles. We have never seen more than five—that in F minor (the best—a chef d'œuvre); that in D, which, containing a scherzo and trio, assumes the distinction of the real grand sonata; that in E flat, dedicated to Haydn; that in C; and that *We cannot too frequently insist that the sonata is the model for the symphony, quartet, and all the larger form of instrumental music.

†The three specimens of the concerto left us by Mendelssohn, in which the sonata form is perfectly developed, have been frequently described.

‡The tutti, according to Mozart, is a kind of synopsis of the whole first movement, laid out like the first movement of a sonata.

§In the concerto in G major.

¶Beethoven, in the G concerto, begins at once with the pianoforte (like Mendelssohn in all his concertos), but, after a few arpeggios, he introduces a long tutti. This leads to the conviction that the idea of abandoning the tutti had entered into the ever-inventing brain of the composer, but that he almost immediately gave it up as untenable. The great concerto in E flat presents the same apparent discrepancy.

in F sharp minor, which, though styled a sonata, is, more strictly speaking, a fantasia. But these alone are enough to immortalize Hummel, had he not produced so many and such variety of works in another form as to place him among the most fecund and admirable of musicians.—London Musical World, Aug. 4.

A Posthumous Opera by Mozart.

About a year and a half ago the Operngesangsverein of Herren Lichtenstein and Ferd. Schmidt, in Frankfort-on-the-Maine, performed for the first time (in all Germany perhaps), an opera until then unknown, by Mozart, L'Oca del Cairo,—The Goose from Cairo. It produced a great impression upon all present, as it is well worth a detailed account. There are, indeed, already accounts of it, for instance, in Nissen's Biographie Mozart, p. 476; and, more recently, in Otto Jahn's admirable work, Vol. IV. pp. 162, 172, in the preface to the published pianoforte edition, there is also the necessary information; but it is not every one who possesses these works, and, consequently, the following facts and dates may not be unwelcome to our readers.

We are accustomed, and with justice, to call Mozart's music incomparable. This appellation is doubly appropriate; first, as concentrated criticism, and secondly, as a literal fact, for all the pictures he created, from the ghostly voice of the Commander, or the sentiments of the Last day (the Requiem), to the babbling of such a person as Despina; from the graceful lays of Belmont, to the frivolity, sparkling with humor, of Figaro; from the Jupiter Symphony to the "Sterbendes Veilchen" ("Dying Violet") invariably bear in themselves the impress of the noblest simplicity, and consequently, we cannot institute a comparison between his compositions and any others, for in no others do we find so spontaneously present this fundamental quality of Mozart's mind and style. While therefore, in these respects, Mozart's music may on the whole be termed incomparable, it cannot fail to surprise us, in the case of the opera under consideration, that, as far as light and graceful pertness is concerned, there is a great deal that approaches the Italian buffo style, and now and then, borders on Rossini; nay, prepares, so to speak, the way for him, without, however losing aught of real depth, or, amidst the most jovial humor, of feeling and grace. I could not produce any particular example in actual notes of this similarity, but it is the total impression of the music which called forth the comparison.

Now for the historical dates of our opera. After Die Entführung aus dem Serail had achieved its triumphs, and, in 1782, the Italian Opera was again opened at Vienna, Mozart yearned for a really comic libretto, which he at last got, after a long search in the shape of our Oca del Cairo, from the author of Idomeneo, the Abbé Varesco in Salzburg. During Mozart's stay at that place, from July to October, 1783, the opera was begun in common, as is proved by one of Mozart's letters, of the 10th December of the same year, sent from Vienna to his father in Salzburg, and in which he begs him "to do all in his power so that the libretto may turn out well."

Among Mozart's papers, which, as we know, the Hofrath A. André possesses in Offenbach, there is the first act, completely finished, and written in Varesco's own hand, as well as a full prose sketch of the contents of the other two acts. For the first act Mozart composed two duets, two airs, a scene in recitative, a quartet, and a grand finale with chorus. These plans and sketches belong, therefore, to the first act. The list of personages is as follows:—

Don Pippo, Marchese di Ripasecca, innamorato di
Lovina, credutosi vedovo di
Donna Pantea, sotto nome di Sandra, sua moglie.
Celidora, loro unica figlia, destinata sposa al Conte Lionetto di Casa Vusta, amante di
Biondello, gentiluomo rico di Ripasecca.
Calandrino, nipote de Pantea, amico di Biondello, ed amante corrisposto di
Lavina, compagna di Celidora.
Chichibio, maestro di casa di Don Pippo, amante di
Auretta, cameriera di Donna Pantea.

With respect to the plot, it will be sufficient here for us to give merely the leading points as they are shortly mentioned by Otto Jahn in the pianoforte edition:—"Don Pippo, bass, an arrogant inflated fool, has locked up, in an inaccessible tower, his daughter Celidora, soprano, whom he wishes to marry to Count Lionetto. Imprisoned with her is her maid Lavina, soprano, whom Don Pippo himself wishes to marry. He has, however entered into an agreement with Biondello (primo amoroso), Celidora's lover, that he will give him his daughter, provided, within a year, he can get into the tower. Biondello has formed a league with his friend Calandrino, tenor, the lover of Lavina and a skilful mechanician, the servants Chichibio, bass-buffo, and Auretta, soubrette, being won over to their interest. The time of action is the last day of the year. An attempt made by the lovers to throw a bridge over the tower fails in the first finale. But Calandrino has made an artificial goose large enough for a couple of persons, who can set the machinery in motion, to get inside. This is sent to Pantea, who, disguised as a gipsy from Cairo, is to exhibit it as a great wonder. Hopes are entertained of inducing Pippo to show the goose to the young girls, and thus enable Biondello to penetrate into the tower. In return for this, Calandrino stipulates that his friend shall procure him Lavina's hand. The stratagem succeeds, for Don Pippo, who thinks to increase the splendor of his own nuptials by the exhibition of such a wonderful thing, allows the goose to be brought into the girls. When all the characters are assembled, Biondello comes out of the goose, Pantea proves to be Pippo's wife, who has long been supposed dead, and—everybody is happy."

If any body is desirous of further information respecting the second and third acts, we refer them to the above mentioned fourth volume of Otto Jahn's Mozart.

It would be an unnecessary task to dwell upon the excellencies and defects of this subject, for, as Mozart set to work on it with such earnestness, when in his twenty-seventh year, the numbers we possess are calculated to invest the text with augmented interest. Herr Julius André says in his preface, "I would particularly call attention to the duet in A major, between Auretta and Chichibio, to the quartet in E sharp major, and to the finale in B flat major, as they contain masterly touches, and even in their incomplete form, may be placed by the side of the best pieces in his other operas, to which I add especially his Figaro. Mozart himself says in a letter that 'he is perfectly contented with Chichibio's buffo air, the quartet, and the finale; that in truth he is pleased with them, and that he should be very sorry if he were doomed to have written such music for no purpose.'" By this, he means that alterations are still required in the libretto. He proceeds to suggest the desired improvements himself, a sufficient proof how greatly he was taken by the opera, and how desirous he was of seeing it produced. It is a remarkable fact that both the basses lie very high; this is strange, coming as it does immediately after the low pitch of the bass part employed so advantageously in the part of Osmin. Had the barytone been then "invented," we may suppose Mozart would have given the higher bass part this title. No less remarkable is the quartet, on account of the distribution on which the bass is not at all missed. But what was there difficult or impossible for the genius of Mozart? Let the reader call to mind the wonderful construction of the quartet of the three Genii and Pamina in Die Zauberflöte.

Among the posthumous musical sketches of Mozart, there are several separate sheets, which may be considered preparatory attempts for several of the pieces in our opera. Several, however, are already so complete, that there would, we should say, have been but little to add, when they were fairly written out. It is also probable that Mozart had already settled the appropriate harmony, and the intermediate instrumental music, although we find merely hints in the rough drafts. The most convincing proof of this is furnished by an air of Biondello's, in B flat major, although it is treated in the most cursory manner. Herr André has placed a fac-simile of this sketch before the pianoforte edition, and, on account of its almost totally illegible character, added a clean copy. Every artist, possessing any antiquarian taste, will be thankful to him for this, since the air is not to be found among the pieces written out at length, and the sketch itself is certainly worthy of being rescued from oblivion. We here surprise the master in the very act, as it were, of creation. Again, this sketch proves to us that Mozart used not to compose the various pieces of his operas in the order in which they came, but selected certain ones, just as the situations struck him for the moment; a glance at the libretto sets this beyond a doubt.

An analysis of the pianoforte edition would prove too long a task. I only repeat, therefore, that the genial dash and the careful working out of these pieces are on an equality with each other. The finale of the Annual Fair, particularly, overflows with dramatic effects; the study of the vocal score, with its polyphonic and contrapuntal arguments, here becomes equally interesting and instructive for both masters and scholars. If the tumultuous rising to a climax of the last presto in B flat major (for six voices and independent chorus) on the words "Holla, zu den Waffen, Leute," produces such a grandiose effect even on the piano, how much more striking would the effect be on the stage, and with a full band?

My authorities are altogether silent with respect to the German translator. His version is, however, mostly satisfactory, as the verbal expression goes hand in hand with the musical, while correctness of rhythm, with a few trifling exceptions, is carefully preserved. Lastly, with regard to the pianoforte edition, which conveys a clear notion of the original plan, Herr André had not the slightest reason to excuse himself, and to give "every one" the option of arranging the pianoforte accompaniment ad libitum, according to the hints given in the book. Whoever examines attentively the instrumental sketches on the score will acknowledge not only the difficulty, but also the discretion with which Herr André has proceeded on his task. The thanks of every one of Mozart's admirers are due to Herr André, not simply for the idea of practically preserving this work to posterity, but also for cleverly carrying out that idea.

What can be said in nuce about a work of this importance is sufficient to direct general attention to it. Many other societies, imitating the example set by the Frankfort Operngesangsverein, help to spread this composition, which, alas! is impracticable on the stage. May this relic, after a slumber of seven-and-twenty years, be resuscitated, and in the concert hall, as well as in the domestic circle, meet with the reception it deserves.

C. GOLLMICK.

Rossini

BEFORE, DURING, AND AFTER THE PERFORMANCE OF SEMIRAMIS.

A single official act preceded and followed the solemn transformation of Semiramide into French. It was the authorization given by Rossini to his friend Carafa in the following terms:

"My dear friend,—Since it is proposed to bring out Semiramide at the Opéra, and as you know I do not busy myself with things of that kind, I beg you will undertake the task; I give you the most complete latitude for whatever arrangements may be deemed necessary. As this labor will be your work, it will be also your property, and all the author's rights, both in and out of the theatre, will belong to you, just as they would for an opera by yourself.

"Yours affectionately,
"G. ROSSINI."

Rossini has been called "the sublime idler," because, doubtless, no musician has ever written, or writes, more music—and what music!—than Rossini. Some day or other history will call him "the sublime miser," for he is always giving. What he has just done with regard to Semiramide he did some years ago with regard to Robert Bruce, and on that occasion his renunciation of all his rights was dated from Bologna. Did he not also do the same thing for the benefit of the authors, composers, and musical publishers who urged him to honor them by belonging to their society? "I consent," he replied, "but on the express condition that all the money my rights produce me shall be contributed to your charitable fund."

Again, what about the city of Paris, from whom the illustrious maestro solicited a plot of ground near the Bois de Boulogne, for the purpose of building a summer villa? Was there not a desire to offer him this plot of ground for his lifetime? "I should prefer paying for it," he replied, "and being completely at home, while at the same time among you, for, sooner or later, my property will go to your poor." It was thus this illustrious and worthy master paid a hundred thousand francs for what he could have obtained gratuitously from the munificence of the capital of the arts, which he has enriched with imperishable works.

Such is Rossini, the sublime miser! Seek elsewhere for the secret of such acts of generosity, without reckoning those he conceals from us, for he never thinks of ostentation. When, for instance, he is asked why certain external portions of his new habitation are completely sacrificed, he answers, in terms more energetic than it would do to write, that he did not build the house for the cockneys who might pass. Yet, while he neglects this striking part of a dwelling to which all Paris perform pilgrimages, we find him summoning, at a great expense, painters like MM. Samoglia and Besteghi, from Bologna, to recall to his heart and eyes the internal hangings and decorations in the modern Italian style. As for the subjects of these paintings, what is the first thing we remark? Mozart being complimented in the box of the Emperor of Austria, at the Opera House in Vienna, on the night of the first performance of Don Juan. In another place we have, as a pendant, Palestrina playing psalms to Pope Marcel, surrounded by his cardinals. Scattered about will be the portraits of Cimarosa, Haydn, Boieldieu, &c.

Rossini might have found twenty architects eager to build him a palace; he preferred applying to a friend, who, without any pretension, will erect what the master terms his little country-house, redolent of the perfumes of Italy and the East.

M. Doussault, who has given up painting for architecture, felt what Rossini wanted: Florence without leaving Paris, and Paris villeggiature. He has, therefore, given him balconies and attics, and sculptured models of torchieri with large rings, to which were fastened, in the old Florentine palaces, the hackneys and the palfreys of the guests and visitors. Being, too, a lover of color, he thought that enamel and crockery ware, with their unchanging tints, might, nay even ought to, find a place on the facade of the house built for the musician of melody, the master-colorist, par excellence. This is a protestation against this systematic rejection of all painting in our architecture.

With regard to color, does not the gardener's lodge at the entrance give us an exact idea of the least vulgar specimens of Oriental art, such as, with a few variations, is found in Wallachia and Moldavia, whence M. Doussault brought home the most poetic sketches?

But with all this talking about M. Doussault, we have strayed far away from our subject; we were discussing the Gallicized Semiramide, and the only official act of Rossini's which preceded and followed Méry's translation. As we have seen, Rossini gave Carafa every latitude in all that concerned the arrangement of the music, and his confidence was equally unlimited with regard to Méry's verses. Now the poet has translated so melodiously that the hearer might fancy he was listening to Italian, while the musician so well understood his mission as to respect the work in its slightest details.

But there was something that neither Méry, Carafa, M. Alphonse Royer, nor any of his friends could do, and that was to prevail on the celebrated master to go to a single rehearsal, far less to the performance. Nay, the Sunday before the first performance, Rossini introduced Carafa to all his friends as the author of Semiramide, and reproached him with not being sufficiently excited on the eve of a battle.

Rossini would not even hear the Sisters Marchisio, either before or at the performance. At present, things are no longer the same; M. Alphonse Royer has resolved to give him this surprise in his villa at Passy; the author of Semiramide will be touched by the attention, and grateful for it. He is, indeed, the man of genius, who has bid the theatre farewell, and will in no way infringe a supreme decision, of which God alone possesses the secret.

Speaking of Semiramide, for he does not avoid the subject in conversation, Rossini informed us that he composed it in one month at Venice, adding that, in order to obtain the stipulated price, five thousand francs, for all his rights of representation and publication, he was engaged for six months in the most active correspondence.

This was the last work composed in Italy by Rossini. Up to that period his operas had not brought him in more than five hundred or a thousand francs each. Il Barbiere was written and rehearsed in thirteen days for the modest pittance of five hundred francs! "It is true," said Rossini. "it is light music."

Rossini now came to Paris, and, during the same summer, bestowed on us two scores, that of Le Comte Ory and that of Guillaume Tell! Then, alas, the sublime idler abandoned himself to repose, even refusing while alive to witness the immortality of his works. J. L. HEUGEL.

Personal Recollections of Beethoven in 1822.

(From the German of Fr. Rochlitz.)

About a fortnight later, I was just going to dinner, when I met the young composer, * * *, an enthusiastic admirer of Beethoven. The latter had spoken to him of me. "If you wish to see him more cheerful and at ease," said * * *, "you need only dine at the same inn to which he has just gone with the same intention." He took me there. Most of the places were occupied, Beethoven was surrounded by several of his friends who were strangers to me. He seemed in the highest spirits. He returned my bow, but I purposely did not go near him just then. Yet I took a place where I could see him, and, as he spoke loud enough, could understand most of what he said. It was not exactly a conversation which he was carrying on, but he spoke alone, and generally for a long time, bringing in subject after subject at random. Those who surrounded him added but little, only laughing and nodding their approbation. He talked philosophy, and politics too, after a fashion of his own. He spoke of England and the English as he imagined both, in incomparable glory, which often produced a singular effect. Then he produced many anecdotes of Frenchmen from the double siege of Vienna. For this nation he had no great liking. All this he brought out with the greatest carelessness, and without the slightest reservation, and spiced with highly original quaint opinions and queer ideas. He seemed to me all this time like a man of rich, prominent mind, unbounded, never resting fancy, who, as a ripening, highly gifted boy, might have been cast, with all that he had learned or experienced till then, or whatever knowledge had come to him, upon a desert island, and there had brooded and thought over this matter, until his fragments had been shaped to a whole, and his fancies become convictions, which he now fearlessly and familiarly proclaimed to the whole world. Now he had finished his meal, rose, and came to me. "Well how do you fare in old Vienna?" he said, pleasantly. I answered him by signs, drank his health, and proposed to him to join me at my wine. He accepted, but beckoned me to a small side room. This was just what I wanted. I took the bottle and followed him. There we were alone, except now and then a looker-on, who left again in a few minutes. He handed me a tablet, on which I was to write whatever he could not understand from my signs. He began with the praise of Leipzig and its music, at least such music as is chosen for performance in the church, the theatre and the concert; otherwise he knows nothing of Leipzig, and has only passed through it once as a very young man on his way to Vienna. "And if nothing were printed about it but the mere programmes," he said, "I should yet read them with pleasure. One sees that there is sense in it, and good will towards all, while here."

And then he broke out, and violently, there was no possibility of stopping him. He spoke, among others, of himself, "You hear nothing by me here." "Now, in summer," I wrote. "No," he cried, "in winter too. What should you hear? Fidelio? That they cannot give and will not hear. The symphonies? They have no time for them. The concertos? In that line every one only rattles off what he has made himself. The solo pieces? Those have gone out of fashion here long ago, and fashion is everything. At the most Schuppanzigh sometimes brings out a quartet," etc., etc. Exaggerated though this is, it is yet not without truth and foundation. At last he had vented himself sufficiently, and returned to Leipzig. "But," he said, "I believe you live in Weimar, after all?" He must have judged so from my address. I shook my head. "So you don't know the great Goethe?" I nodded, and that vehemently. "I know him too!" he continued, proudly, and with pure joy reflected in his features. I made his acquaintance in Carlsbad—I don't know how long ago. I was not as deaf then as I am now, but I was already hard of hearing. What patience the great man had with me at that time, how much he has done for me! He related several little anecdotes and very pleasing details. How happy this made me at the time. I could have suffered myself to be killed for him, and not only once, but ten times. At that time, when I was right in the midst of the fire, I thought out my music to his Egmont, and it was successful, don't you think so?" Whatever gestures I could think of to express my pleasure and admiration, I made for him. Then I wrote down that we produce this music not only at every representation of Egmont, but perform it once every year, at a concert, combined with a sort of analysis taken mostly from those scenes of the drama to which the music refers. "I know, I know," cried he. "Since that summer in Carlsbad, I read Goethe every day, that is, when I read at all. He killed Klopstock for me. You are surprised? Ah, at my having read Klopstock? I carried him about with me for years, when I was taking my walks, and otherwise. Well, I did not always understand him, to be sure. He jumps about so, and he always starts from such a lofty position, always maestoso, D flat major, eh? But still, he is great, and elevates the soul. Where I could not understand him, I could guess,—about. If only he was not always going to die! There's time enough for that. However, it sounds well enough, etc., etc. But that Goethe, he lives, and we all must live with him. That is the reason that he can be set to music. No other can be set to music as well as he. Only I don't much like to write songs." Here I had the best opportunity of mentioning that idea of H.'s and his commission. I wrote down the proposition and his offer, putting on the most serious face, Beethoven read. "Ha!" he cried, raising his hand, "that would be a good piece of work! That would be worth doing!" He went on in this way for awhile, and sketched out the idea immediately and not badly, while staring fixedly, with head thrown back, at the ceiling.* "But," he soon rejoined, "I have for some time had my mind filled with those other great works. Much of them is already hatched, in my head at least. These I must get rid of first, two grand symphonies, and each one of them different from all my others, and an oratorio. These will take a very long time, for, you see, writing has not been as easy for me lately as it always has been. I sit and think, and think; it has come to me long ago, but I can't get it down on paper. I dread the beginning of such great works. When I am once in them, I go on very well——" And so he went on for a long time. So I am doubtful. But we will still hope, because the idea attracts him, and he has assured me again and again, not to lose sight of it.

M. A. R.

*The proposition was made to him to write a musical accompaniment in the style of that to Egmont, to Goethe's Faust.

The Two Webers.

Our readers are probably aware that managers, with the view of punishing editors of newspapers for the severity they sometimes exhibit in criticising theatrical performances, agreed long since to accord them the so-called privilege of writing free admissions, or "orders." A more ingenious system of vengeance was never imagined, for the apparent civility of the proceeding deprived the journalists of all pretext for retaliation. An order for a theatre is something between a present of game and the bottle imp. If the performance which the order entitles you to see, be good, a manifest improbability, the order may pass from hand to hand, a dozen persons will be obliged, and finally the one who makes use of it will be delighted. But if, and this is too often the case, the performance which you have the privilege of sitting out is really not worth a moment's attention? Then the order is given by the newspaper editor to his friend: the friend, annoyed with the newspaper editor for not giving him anything better, passes it on to another friend, who gives it to his tailor, who gives it to his baker, who gives it to his oldest son, who, being inexperienced, takes a cab and a young lady with whom he is "keeping company," and drives to the theatre, where he spends a wretched evening, quarrels with the inamorata, who is bored to death, and goes home in a rage to complain to his father the baker. The baker complains to the tailor, who speaks of it to his customer, who mentions it to his acquaintance, and so on, until at last the newspaper editor is made the object of innumerable reproaches from the friend for giving him an order to "a place not worth going to."

But we will suppose the representation to which the order admits to be one of high merit. Then, whenever you give it away you oblige one person and offend three or four whom you have been compelled to refuse. Nor does the recipient necessarily consider that any favor has been bestowed on him. On the contrary, it is ten chances to one that he will fancy himself injured or insulted because you have not given him stalls instead of places in the boxes, or private boxes instead of a couple of stalls. And if he does prevail upon you to ask for a box, the probability is that, just as you are paying to go into the Opera, yourself, you hear a voice shouting to the box keeper—

"Mr. De Quill's box, he gave it to me himself, and it must be on the grand tier; or at all events not higher than the first."

"No. 50!" says the box keeper, looking at the letter, which entitles the holder to the use of a very good box, on the second tier.

"Do you think I'm going up there? Do you think Mr. Carrickfergus and myself are in the habit of going in the gallery?"

"I do not know, Sir," says the polite box keeper of the first tier (he is the most distinguished looking man in the house, and is constantly mistaken, by visitors from the country, for the Duke of Mecklenburgh; somebody who has accidentally misread the royal box, and is strolling about the corridors in search of it) "but I can assure you that No. 50 is on the tier above."

"Where is the manager?" says our friend, indignantly.

"The manager, Sir? that is the manager, opposite—that gentleman in the white waistcoat."

"Oh!" responds Mr. Carrickfergus, as if at a loss what to say next. But he recovers himself, and adds

—"I shall tell Mr. De Quill of the rudeness I experienced at the hands of the officials; and I have no doubt he will call attention to it next week, in his paper." Then he enters box 50, is a little soothed at finding it much better than he expected, and—gives nothing to the box keeper. The next morning he has the coolness to write us a letter, stating that the performance was not bad (he had seen Titiens, Borghi-Mamo, and Ginglini!) but the next time we favor him with a box, he hopes it will be a little lower down. Would that we could procure him admission to a place a great deal lower down, where the box keeper is Cerberus, and the manager Pluto!

But if it be an inconvenience and even source of misery to have the privilege of writing orders, it is pleasant enough to be able to enter a fine theatre merely for the trouble of putting your name down on the "Free List." Many persons possess this real privilege; not only journalists who are in the habit of criticising the performances, but also well-known authors, musicians, and even artists. It is a compliment which a manager of a liberal turn of mind pays to all persons whose opinion is of some importance to him, to say nothing of those whose opinions are of no importance to any one—not even to themselves. It gets the theatre "talked about," and benefits the manager, if the representations are good; but if the contrary—then, the contrary. When Karl Maria von Weber was in England, he happened to be introduced to the manager of the — theatre, who, by way of paying him what he considered the highest honor in the world, placed his name on the Free List. The acting at the — theatre was good enough in its way, but there was nothing in the performances calculated to attract a poet and a thinker like Weber, and a considerable time elapsed before it ever occurred to the composer of Oberon to take advantage of the privilege which the manager had accorded him. One day, however, he happened to be passing the door, when something in the bills attracted his notice. Then, remembering that his name was on the Free List, he went up to the superintendent of that department, and mentioned his name.

"Just gone in, Sir," said the man.

"No, I am not gone in, but I will go in," replied Weber; "give me a card."

"I tell you, he's gone in these five minutes, and why should I give you a card?" asked the man, rather brusquely.

"Because I am Mr. Weber," replied the proprietor of that glorious name, and because my name is on the Free List."

"That's cool!" returned the official. Why, you are as much Her Carl fun Weber, as I am. I tell you, he's gone in this ever so long." "Two, Sir? There they are, Sir." These last words were addressed to a gentleman who had presented an order.

"Am I a liar, b'raps?" asked the indignant Teuton, as if by no means prepared to receive an answer in the affirmative.

"I don't know who you are, nor what you are, nor where you come from!" was the reply; only you're not Her fun Weber, and it's no good trying it on here." "Too late, ma'am! not admitted after seven and it's now half past;" continued the man, as a lady exhibited a ticket of admission.

"But it was given me by Mr. Pennfeather!" objected the dame.

"Can't help it, Ma'am; we have our instructions, and we must attend to them."

"Really, this is very extraordinary! I shall certainly complain to Mr. Pennfeather."

"Can't help it, Ma'am; you should have been in time."

"Should have been in time! What impertinence! I have a great mind to see the manager; but I will certainly complain to Mr. Pennfeather, and he shall cut you up in his journal."

"Thank you, Ma'am!"

Karl Maria was still waiting for his card, or rather was waiting with the view of proving that he was himself.

"What, you still here?" exclaimed the man in the box.

"I am Mr. Weber, and I will go in," replied the composer.

"Well, I'll tell you what I'll do," said the superintendent of the Free List, astonished at so much persistence. "As you will have that you're Her fun Weber, you shall go into the theatre, and see him."

"I insist upon it," answered Weber himself.

"Now you come along with me then, and you shall see him sitting in the front of the pit" (stalls had not yet been invented); "as civil spoken a gentleman as I ever saw; why, he's been in every night these two years."

"Is he a German?" inquired Weber, more and more astonished every moment.

"Is Karl Mariar fun Webber a German?" repeated the other, as if really shocked. "Why, of course he is. What a deal you must know about him!"

"I am he," said the German.

"Oh, you're him, are you?" said the Englishman, correcting (as he thought) the foreigner's bad English. "Well, then, who do you call that?"

They had now reached the stage, and from one of the wings Weber could see a German gentleman sitting in the front row of the pit laughing, applauding holding his sides; in fact almost wild with delight. A comic actor was on the stage, and he was singing a song which, to the real Weber, appeared rather dull, not to say stupid.

"Well," said the official "what do you say now?"

Weber gave no answer. The following reflections were passing through his mind:—"That man in the pit," he said to himself, "is an impostor, but he does me no harm. He is probably a poor man; and it is evident that his chief happiness consists in coming to this theatre, for it appears that he never misses a night. I have never thought of coming before, and probably I shall never think of coming here again. Then why should I, for the sake of proving to this person by my side that I am Weber, instead of being Schmidt, Schneider, or any other German, deprive my unfortunate compatriot of what to him is a source of intense enjoyment? It would not enrich me, and would make him 'poor, indeed,' as Shakespeare says:

'Who steals my name steals nought. 'Tis mine, not his Nor anybody else's that I know of.
But if I stop this fellow's free admission,
I take back that which not enriches him,
And make him deuced poor.'

The official heard the illustrious musician murmuring these lines, and came to the conclusion that he must be a madman.

"Well, what do you say?" he inquired at last.

"Are you satisfied?"

"Quite so," replied Weber. "I only wanted to see the composer of Der Freischütz."

"Then you admit that you're an impostor."

"No; I only admit that I wanted to see the composer of Der Freischütz. Good night. Sleep well."

"Go along with you," said the superintendent of the Free List. "What strange fellows those Germans are," he added, addressing his friend the check-taker; and when the other Weber came out, he told him, with a smile, of the "dodge" that one of his countrymen had resorted to in order to gain admission into the theatre.

The other Weber (who was a semi-insolvent bootmaker living in the neighborhood of Leicester square) seemed amused, and continued to present himself regularly every night at the Free List office, until at last the good Karl Maria died.

On hearing of the great composer's death, the semi-insolvent boot-maker was amazed. He considered himself decidedly ill used, and did not even attend the funeral.

THE CHARACTER OF THE POET BRYANT.

William Cullen Bryant is one of the purest characters, and has one of the most enviable reputations in the country. He deservedly ranked as the first of our poets until he almost ceased to write in verse, and allowed Longfellow to climb nearer to the summit of Parnassus, while he reclined on the hill-side, or rather while he turned into a more rugged path. The best energies of his maturer years have been given to the discussion of public questions, and among all the able journalists, his contemporaries, there is not one, active or retired, living or dead, who has succeeded in securing such universal respect, while plunging, as Mr. Bryant always has, into the thick of the fight, and vigorously assailing the opinions and measures of political opponents. He has never trod the tortuous paths of vulgar and crafty politicians; he has never descended to be the apologist of abuses in his own party; he has never hung around lobbies or political conventions; but his whole influence, both as a man and a journalist, has been on the side of straightforward, robust honesty in all public, as well as in all private matters. Holding himself aloof from scheming cliques, and dealing with great principles, he has had the forecast to anticipate public opinions, of which he has been an influential leader. His whole career is a striking contradiction to the shallow notion that a journalist cannot exert a marked influence in politics unless he is hand-and-glove with the able rogues and lesser rogues who pack caucuses and manipulate conventions. The New York Evening Post, under Mr. Bryant's management, has always ranked as one of the very best newspapers in the country, and the influence it has exerted has been due not more to the ability and taste that has presided over its columns than to its uncompromising honesty and fearless independence. We are glad of an occasion to express what we believe to be the public sense of Mr. Bryant's character.—The World.

MUSICAL FISHES.—Sir Emerson Tennent, in his work on Ceylon, gives the following account of the musical sounds heard in Chilka Lake, a salt-water creek close by Batticoloa, on the eastern shores of Ceylon:

I distinctly heard the sounds in question. They came up from the water like the gentle thrills of a musical chord, or the faint vibrations of a wine-glass, when its rim is rubbed by a wet finger. It was not one sustained note, but a multitude of tiny sounds, each clear and distinct in itself; the sweetest treble mingling with the lowest bass. On applying the ear to the wood-work of the boat, the vibration was greatly increased in volume by conduction. The sounds varied considerably at different points, as we moved across the lake, as if the number of animals from which they proceeded was greatest in particular spots; and occasionally we rowed out of hearing of them altogether, until, on returning to the original locality, the sounds were at once renewed.

Mr. George Buist published an account of these musical fishes in the Bombay Times, of January, 1847, and stated it was then supposed that the fish are confined to particular localities—shallows—estuaries, and muddy creeks, rarely visited by Europeans; and that this is the reason why hitherto no mention, so far as we know, has been made of the peculiarity in any work on Natural History. His description of the fish was as follows:

A party lately crossing from the promontory in Salsette called the "Neut's Tongue," to near Sewree, were, about sunset, struck by hearing long distinct sounds like the protracted booming of a distant bell, the dying cadence of an Æolian harp, the note of a pitch-pipe or pitch-fork, or any other long-drawn out musical note. It was at first supposed to be music from Parell floating at intervals on the breeze; then it was perceived to come from all directions, almost in equal strength, and to arise from the surface of the water all around the vessel. The boatmen at once intimated that the sounds were produced by fish, abounding in the muddy creeks and shoals around Bombay and Salsette; they were perfectly well known, and very often heard. Accordingly, on inclining the ear toward the surface of the water; or, better still, by placing it close to the planks of the vessel, the notes appeared loud and distinct, and followed each other in constant succession. The boatmen next day produced specimens of the fish—a creature closely resembling in size and shape the fresh-water perch of the north of Europe—and spoke of them as plentiful and perfectly well known.

Editorial Correspondence.

II.

PARIS, August 4, 1860.

Were I to begin with chronicling the magical impressions and experiences of the first fortnight of an untraveller American in this great, gay, cheerful, social, military, many-sided, cosmopolitan, catholic, democratic, imperial, antique, modern, picturesque, quaint, beautiful, immense world of Paris, I should fill up many letters (even with Art galleries and old architecture alone) before reaching the special subject matter of this Journal. Let us make sure then of the musical record first.

Of course this is not the musical season. Fashion and high life are out of town, gone to the watering places; though there was little need so far as water and cool air are concerned; for so rainy and so cold a summer, here and over most of Europe, is without precedent in the last thirty years. In sixteen days since I saw land, there has been only one day without rain. You are not safe one hour without umbrella. Summer clothes are never worn. The dealers in all summer wares have a dull time of it; yet all looks cheerful. The open air evening entertainments are but moderately frequented, comparatively speaking. Yet the bewildering maze of lights, white lights and colored lights, and revolving lights, entangle crowds of pleasure seekers every evening, between the showers, in the leafy walks of the Champs Elysées, where Punchinello shakes your sides with laughter, and the brilliantly lighted festooned salons of the cafés chantants gather their seated crowds at various centres, where prima donnas rustling in satin and sparkling with jewels, or tenors and baritones, comic and sentimental, sing whole scenes from the operas, accompanied by orchestras at least equal to the best in any of our theatres. You wander from opera to opera under the trees, the gas lights and the stars. A strange scene, something magical and dreamlike, to one used to the dull streets of Boston of an evening, and especially on a Sunday evening, the open heyday of festivity here. None the less, but all the more, do the fine bands of the regiments, perform on that day, as they do on all days, in the garden of the Tuilleries (rich strains come swelling up to my window at this moment while I write, strains from the Huguenots), and in the garden of the Palais Royal, at the feet of the column Vendôme, and many other places. Musard, too, nightly lights up his brilliant temple in the trees, in a remote quarter of the Champs Elysées, between the Palace d'Industrie and the Seine, and with a large orchestra discourses a light music mingled with a few classical overtures (one night Spontini's Olympia) to the gay crowd that promenade or sit sipping chocolate and ices. A fascinating scene it is, contrived with much artistic taste; the scene much finer than the music. The handsome octagonal Moorish temple, which contains the orchestra, springs gracefully from a pedestal of green and flowers; and one trifling circumstance a Yankee might be allowed to notice: the crowning circle of white blossoms, delicately graceful in the gaslight, was composed pure et simple of the homely and despised "white weed" of our fields, the object of the Yankee farmer's hatred. Here in Paris it is the fashionable flower; it adorns garden walks and fountains, and the ladies wear it on their bonnets. Lo, how French art knows how to utilize the meanest gifts of nature!

A word more of the bands. The very military character of Paris, the very despotism which now rules France (and rules it well, it must be owned, if perfect order, peace, pervading cheerfulness and courtesy are any fair criterion) produces at least one great benefit. It opens copious streams of art and beauty, free and without cost, to the whole population everywhere. It renovates and builds up on a gigantic scale; demolishing the old, the narrow and the dirty, streets and quarters where the sun scarce sent a wholesome ray, and opens great wide stately Boulevards or rears vast piles of regal architecture, bristling with emblematical or portrait sculptures, which employ the chisels of all the first artistic talents proudly for their country's glory, while it makes the common eye familiar with the forms and the ideas of Art. It continues to write out the whole history of France in sculpture and in painting in the endless galleries of the palace at Versailles. It cherishes and increases and keeps in perfect order, for the people, and for all comers, the time-honored collections of original Raphaels, Murillos, Titians, Rembrandts, Rubenses, the wonderful Venus of Milo and many masterworks of Greek and modern sculpture, and how many artistic curiosities more, in the galleries of the Louvre. It preserves the noblest efforts of the new men, and women, of Couture and Muller, and Rosa Bonheur, and Troyon and Ziem, and De la Roche, in the Luxembourg, the Palais des Beaux Arts, &c.; — and all this that all may see. And so too it keeps Paris full of music — not of course the highest, but music such as educates the ear, the sense, and stimulates to musical activity and aspiration. In the streets and crowds of Paris almost every third man is a soldier. This is more picturesque than pleasant when one reflects upon the meaning of a soldier. (Picturesque it is, as you see them everywhere, singly, in squads, or companies or regiments; on guard at palace doors and garden gates; swarming like red-breeched bees about the huge casernes or barracks, which seem to make a rising in the streets impossible; or sauntering about cafés and public walks, with white-capped mother or sister or chère amie on arm, so socially: witness that group of Arab looking Zouaves down there under the trees of the Tuilleries, the white circles of their turbans glancing through the leaves: — and as efficient for good order as it is picturesque: witness the mounted warrior in brazen helmet at each corner of the street leading to each theatre to opera, to see that there shall be no rude jostling and that each shall have his rights). This multitude of soldiers, this immense army of occupation involves of course a corresponding multitude of military bands.

We saw the emperor review the garrison army of Paris, 45,000 foot and horse, in the beautiful Bois de Boulogne. The number of musicians that made up the bands of all these regiments was something to amaze. Each regiment had its band, ranging from thirty to sixty instruments. The majority of these instruments are brass, of the Sax family of course (by the way Mme. Sax has had her husband's patent renewed for ten years). Some of the bands are all brass; but most of them have a fair proportion of clarinets, bassoons, &c.; and we must own their music averages vastly better than what we call good band music in America. Not a few of these regiment musicians are at the same time pupils in the Conservatoire, and figure in the list of prize winners in the recent concours. Those bands are everywhere; the sound thereof is in all the streets and pleasant places in and out of Paris. Very curious are some of their brass instruments; you see every conceivable modification and contortion of the Sax tuba type. One mounted band rode by me one day, in which one man bore, or rather wore, a huge brass tuba coiled about his body like a Boa and projecting a great bell mouth over one shoulder.

Of Opera we expected almost nothing at this season; yet some odds and ends remained these cool nights. The Italiens and the Lyrique are closed. But to our agreeable surprise the first night offered us the double temptation of Boieldieu's La Dame Blanche, at the Opera Comique, and of Semiramide at the Grand Opera. We had long wished to hear the former work, for Boieldieu is perhaps the most genial of the French composers — and had we not just come from finding his statue under our window there in Rouen! Alas! there was not one place to be had; so we wended our way over to the Rue Polletier and entered (by the porch made famous by Orsini's attempt upon the life of the emperor) the famous old Grand Opera. The piece had somewhat advanced, and we were forced to look down and listen from a very high and stifling perch. The music in itself, all oriental gold and purple as it is, was too familiarly drowsy to be much attraction to us; but it was an object to see how these things are done in Paris. The gorgeous display of scenery, especially the great scene in the second act, where "Ninny's ghost" appears, and where the hanging gardens and vast palatial splendors of the Assyrian queen were represented with studied fidelity to the latest explorations of Layard and other travellers and with prodigious effectiveness. It was well suggested in one of the innumerable Parisian theatre journals, that the Grand Opera might well be called the "Imperial Academy of Decorative Painting." Verily the splendor of the music was outdazzled. The musical ensemble, however, the large, effective chorus, and above all the superb orchestra of eighty, under most perfect drill, was to an American a new experience. The principal singers were in no wise remarkable. The sisters MARCHISIO were having their debuts in the parts of the Queen and Arsace. The latter has a rich and powerful contralto, quite well managed, not particularly sympathetic. The other had not got over the constraint of a novice and won barely a succes d'estime by a fair voice and execution, unsupported by any queenly majesty of person. OBIN, a respectable baritone, was Assur; the rest indifferent. Rossini himself declined all participation in and all responsibility for this exhumation of his work. In truth it was no work for the Grand Opera; it did not belong there, as "Tell" and the elaborate affairs of Meyerbeer do; it was hastily huddled together and altered. The witty old composer addressed a note, in his own happy and sententious way, to M. Carafa, who had arranged the affair, formally consigning to him the entire property and honor in the work.

The next evening I succeeded in hearing La Dame Blanche. The music itself is pleasing, graceful, in some parts truly beautiful; but much of it sounded old and hacknied; the plot was pretty, and the execution generally fair, and hardly more. ROGER, however, in the part of George, was an exception, and one was glad of course to hear for once the famous tenor, although he came before us in the character of one rejuvenated, and as it were risen from the dead. The loss of the right arm was quite artistically disguised; the man looks fresh and young; his action was full of life, of fine esprit and grace; and although his voice is doubtless but the ruin of what it was, and he resorted to falsetto more than we ever heard any man, yet he did it all so artistically, with such style and expression, that we enjoyed him immensely. He is certainly an artist, and one of the few. We were attracted once more to the Opéra Comique by a light and pretty opera by Auber, Haydée, with a Venetian story, the scene of one act being on board a victorious galley,—an opportunity which the scenic artist would of course improve. CARRE, the young and promising tenor of the evening, has a light and highly musical and sympathetic organ, which he uses with great taste and judgment. The principal females sang and acted agreeably; I forget their names. Here, too, you find a large and excellent orchestra.

Robert le Diable, we know, does belong to the Grand Opera. And who, that has seen it repeatedly announced with deceptive parade, cut up and murdered in New York and Boston, believing it at the same time to be the best, because the freshest, most spontaneous, most inventive work of Meyerbeer, could resist the announcement for last evening of its four or five hundredth representation? We went and were rewarded. There can be no doubt it was a fair specimen of the Grand Opera in its peculiar glory. The scenes were given entire and in their true order. The orchestral accompaniments were as nearly perfect as one can hope to hear. Eighty instruments, admirably balanced, admirably led; no individual sound or class of sounds unreasonably prominent; all fused and blended into one with a true colorist's art; a breadth and warmth and richness in the middle string parts, which is a very exceptional luxury with us; a purity of intonation and a sympathetic timbre in the reeds and brass, in all the wind band (the flutes, we noticed, were of metal); a perfection of precision and of light and shade; a brilliancy when needed; in short a power and beauty of ensemble, which we never knew in any orchestra at home. The scenic effects were of course marvellous, French as they were, instead of being ridiculous, as we have seen them. The great scene of the abbey, with the nuns conjured from their tombs and dancing, had all the moonlight mystery of Gothic ruins; and the transition to it was not sudden; cloud work separated it from the preceding scene. The ballet, too, was exquisite; the corps very numerous, as was that of knights, ladies, pages, and the whole singing scenic crowd that continually flooded the vast stage in new forms. You could not detect one man in two characters. The choruses were given with the utmost breadth and spirit. Every small subordinate part told. And of the principal rôles three were admirably filled. Duprez's daughter, Mme. VANDENHEUVEL (CAROLINE DUPREZ), was making her début in this theatre in the part of Isabella. She is a slender, fragile, lady-like person, in form and face resembling Mme. Biscaccianti. Her voice, a high soprano, seemed much worn, and did not promise much at first. But as she proceeded, you became aware of most consummate mastery of method, purity of style, and an execution in the most difficult and florid passages which few have equalled. She truly filled the character. We were still more interested and delighted with the other débutante, Mlle. MARIE SAX, whose efforts hitherto have been confined to the Théâtre Lyrique. A small, fresh person, with frank, bright, intelligent face, somewhat like Gazzaniga, she has one of the most bird-like, penetrating, pure and musical mezzo soprano voices that we ever heard, with glorious contralto tones. She sings with real earnestness and feeling; no one after Jenny Lind has so much interested us in the music of the beautiful part of Alice, the creation of which shall absolve Meyerbeer from the sin of dazzling the world with much elaborate effective sham. The part of Bertram was finely sustained by an uncommonly rich-toned, powerful basso, and a most intelligent and tasteful singer, M. DEVAL. He is not so powerful, and may not be so many-sided, as Carl Formes, but he has that truth of intonation which the great Spanish-German lacks. GURYMARD, the tenor, did not please us in the part of Robert; inadequate in voice, and somewhat vulgar in conception.

The Grand Opera ought to do its own things well. Petted and aided by the government, it still commands large prices from the public. It is bound to give performances the whole year round, three in each week. A position in its orchestra is a position for life, a sure dependence; hence only real excellence commands a place; and a most respectable looking set of men one sees in it. At this moment the journals proclaim a vacancy among the violoncellos and a competition for the place at a given date this month. The theatre itself is a faded relic of splendor, tawdry and shabby. It is soon to be replaced, (by this new government which renovates all theatres as well as cathedrals, all over France) by a splendid building in a new grand square yet to be opened.

I have still to speak of the Conservatoire, and of a Séance Solennelle of the Orpheonists, the people's musical movement in France, which has a future, to my mind more pregnant than all that Berlioz and Wagner would fain conjure up. D.

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, SEPT. 2.—I am stopping here for a few days, having about finished my summer vacation. Last week having business in New York, I arrived just in the nick of time to attend the opening of the Pianoforte Manufactory of the Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS. Early in the morning of the day, calling at the warehouse in Walker street, I found in the little sanctum Mr. SATTER, who played to me some of his new fantasias in Lohengrin and the Flying Dutchman. They are superb in every way. And here let me say, that his (Mr. S.'s) playing is as near perfect, as any that can be heard.

A large number of representatives of the press, with a slight sprinkling of the profession gathered at about three in the afternoon, at the factory in Fourth avenue, Fifty-second and Fifty-third streets. Master DENCK—a lad of about 13 years of age, native of Charleston, S. C., who has already studied four years in Dresden, and who will make his mark, if he keeps hard at work and leads a somewhat secluded life, which his father (a German born) must attend to—entertained the company with some light music. Messrs. WOLLENHAUPT, and FRADEL also played—on different grand pianos—such things, as would please. A sort of an impromptu arrangement of Mendelssohn's Wedding March was played on three grand pianos, by the Messrs. MILLS, WOLLENHAUPT, FRADEL and LASAR, also the March from the Prophet. The visitors passed, under the escort of the Messrs. Steinway, through the entire establishment, and all were interested to discover the secret, as Dr. Leavitt of the Independent called it, how the superiority of the Steinway pianos is attained. After examining the premises &c., the company repaired to one of the rooms, in which there was spread a good entertainment in the substantial or physical—eatable and drinkable, at which many good things were eat, drank, said, played, &c. It occurred to me, that Trovator and —t— might not have been there, and therefore thought, a little gossip respecting this somewhat historical event might be interesting to your readers. By the bye—it is an on dit that Ullmann has engaged Leopold de Meyer, the pianist, for the Academy. We shall all be glad to hear him again. The opening of the opera at New York is announced for Monday the 3d, with, as you see, the great Triplet Opera Company. S. L.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Cooper-Milner troupe opened here at the Walnut Street Theatre in their usual round of English opera. Miss Milner, of course, is much admired.

New Publications.

100 Operatic Melodies for the Flute. 50 cents.

Here we have the opera reduced, (like a fraction,) to still lower terms. Nothing remains after this but to whistle it. N'importe; in every form the charming melodies of the lyric stage will find a voice, and here is a choice collection of all the beauties of modern popular operas, well arranged, so as to be most acceptable to thousands of incipient flutists. To such there can be no more welcome gift than one of these little books.

From CASSELL PETER & GALPIN, New York, Cassell's Popular Natural History (Parts 6 and 7.) Profusely and admirably illustrated in the best style of wood engraving. Published fortnightly. Price 15 cents.

DON GIOVANNI, by Mozart. With Italian and English Words. Price $3.00. O. Ditson & Co.

This beautiful edition of Don Giovanni is the last addition to the series of operas issued by our publishers. It is taken from the English plates of the excellent edition of Boosey & Co., of London. It has several valuable features, among them we may mention the indication of the instruments of the orchestra making the accompaniment from which the piano score is reduced, thus giving a most desirable aid to the memory of the reader. The volume is bound uniformly with the other of the series. It must take the place of all other piano scores, from its beauty, cheapness and accuracy.

OPERA OF MARTHA. English, Italian and German Text, $3.00.

This is uniform with the other volumes of the series, and will be welcomed by the host of admirers of this charming opera of Flotow's. The words are given in the three languages in which the opera is sung.

NORMA, by Bellini. Piano Solo. $2.00.

The piano solo editions are invaluable to those who cannot conveniently make use of the vocal scores, and no opera is more pleasing or practicable in this form than Norma.

MONTREAL.—MUSICAL FESTIVAL IN HONOR OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The Musical Festival in honor of the Prince, which was given at the unique and gorgeous ball room, was one of the pleasantest of the entire series of festivities which were arranged to welcome H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, to the largest city of British America.

The festival was commenced by the Oratorio Society, who performed selections from Haydn's Creation and from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The music was given with admirable effect to an appreciating audience. The solos, duets, and trios were well handled, and the choruses were full and majestically delivered.

An intermission of twenty minutes as per programme, but of forty minutes as per timepiece, ensued, during which the two bands in attendance played alternately. The delay was occasioned by the non-appearance of the Prince, who did not reach the concert room until nine o'clock. He was received as he stepped into his box, surrounded by his suite, with more hearty and unconstrained cheers than any which have hitherto greeted his ears in the triumphant progress of the will-be king hereafter.

Having bowed his thanks in a more lively and interested manner than he has been accustomed to do, he took his seat, and the second part of the concert commenced, or rather re-commenced, for we had been treated to a portion of it before the Prince entered, and it had to be all done over again. It consisted of the grand Cantata, composed expressly for the occasion, music by C. W. Sabatier, words by Edouard Sempé, and performed by members of the Montreal Musical Union, consisting of two hundred and fifty members. The composition is very meritorious, and some of the music is charming. The performers acquitted themselves handsomely, received the hearty plaudits of the company, and the Prince himself clapped his hands.

At the conclusion of the cantata the Prince withdrew to the ante-room, and preparations for the grand concert by Strakosch's Italian Opera troupe were hurried forward. The troupe, among whom were Adelina Patti, Mme. Strakosch, our fat friend Amodio, Susini and Barili were in waiting, with ill-concealed impatience—for it had now got to be past 11 o'clock—under the dais, on the floor, which his Highness had occupied the preceding night. Soon all things were ready, the troupe mounted the platform, Strakosch took his seat at Chickering's grand, which composed the entire orchestra, but the Prince did not appear;—nor did he appear again during the night, to the great chagrin of the opera troupe and the especial mortification of little Patti. The company, too, began to thin away rapidly. But if the Prince of Wales did not appear, neither did the prince of tenors. Brignoli, who was announced in four pieces, was in the city, but it was said, had suddenly lost his voice. How unfortunate! Under these circumstances the artistes sang, and they failed to give that entire satisfaction which usually attends their efforts. With the musical portion of the audience, however, their success was great.—Cor. of Boston Courier.

NEW ORLEANS.—We are to have a plenty of good opera this coming winter. The new Opera House, so successfully opened last season by Mr. Boudousquie, will present a superb appearance upon its re-opening, early in November. There was no room for any improvements behind the curtain, all the appointments of that department of the theatre being as complete as could be, from the start. There was not time to decorate and finish the auditorium according to the original plans, and this work is now in progress, with every promise of the most brilliant success. The beautiful and symmetrically shaped salle is rapidly putting on a most attractive appearance. The accomplished artists of the theatre are lavishing their taste and talent upon the task of rendering it in every respect what a first-class lyric temple should be. The circular ceiling will present a fine copy of the famous "Aurora" of the great painter, Guido Reni, in the Rospigliosi palace, at Rome. Aurora, goddess of the morning, in her chariot drawn by the swift horses, Lampus and Phaëthon, and preceded and surrounded by the rosy hours, bearing the fruits of the different seasons and flaming torches, is represented as ascending up to heaven from the river Oceanus, announcing the coming light of the sun to the gods as well as to mortals.

Climbing our way to the platform of the scaffolding which forms the painting room of the artist, for the execution of this elaborate work, we were enabled, the other day, to obtain a gratifying view of it, in its half-finished state.

Enough had been done to assure us that, when completed, it will be a chef d'œuvre of art.

The semi-circular cornice that sustains the dome on which this fine painting is executed is to be richly painted in arabesque; the mouldings to be of burnished gold. An ornamental arcade has been thrown up, in the upper tier, which will completely relieve the monotony of the bare walls above that circle, and on the ceiling that covers that range of sittings medallions, containing the portraits of the great composers, are to be placed.

On each side of the proscenium, facing the audience, fre-scoes, representing Music and Poetry, are to be painted, which will give a fine finish to the interior decorations, while in the arch over the curtain are to be placed a portrait of "Pater Patrie" and emblematic paintings. All this work is executing under the immediate supervision of M. Boudousquie, who has shown much taste in the designs, as well as assiduity in superintending their execution.

We have already given our readers some idea of what the personnel of the opera is to be the coming season. Mr. Boudousquie's arrangements in this department are not yet completed, but enough has been done to assure us of a highly talented and capable corps operatique, in all its branches.—N. O. Picayune.

ST. LOUIS.—A SACRED CONCERT.—With a gentleman of St. Louis, who was very kindly my conductor, I was set down in the latter part of the afternoon, at the gate of this, the "Central Park" of the metropolis of the West; and we made our way, through a thicket of newly planted trees, to a more open spot from whence issued some very lively music. Of course, I had not expected either a camp-meeting or a chapel in the woods; but I was a little surprised to find that the arrangements for the "Sacred Concert" consisted of a well furnished "bar" with a great number of small tables—a German Winter-garten, in fact—where was assembled a considerable crowd, chatting gayly over their beer and juleps, salads and ice-cream. An orchestra of twenty-five musicians, perched upon an elevated platform were playing, at the moment, the liveliest of galopades.

Taking up one of the printed programmes, which was headed, in very large letters, "SACRED CONCERT," I looked to see when we might expect some of the music of a devout character, which would doubtless be interspersed in the performance; but the following (I copy from the programme, which I brought away) were the nearest approach to it:—"Fra Diavolo," "Overture to Don Giovanni," "Firefly Polka," "North Star Quadrille," "Kroll's Ball Sounds," "Cuckoo and Cricket Polka," "Airs from Foscari," "Coronation Waltz," "Grand March," and "Soldiers' Galop"—and, of course, there is no objection to this being considered "sacred music" west of the Mississippi!—Home Journal, Sept. 1.

SAN FRANCISCO.—A very successful opera season, lasting over two months, has been concluded at Maguire's Opera House, San Francisco. Mrs. Escott and Mr. Squire were the principal singers; they were assisted by Messrs. De Haga, Leach, Lyster, Madame Biscaccianti and Misses Hudson, Durand, and Ada King. The chorus, consisting chiefly of Germans, was excellent, and the orchestra, numbering twenty-five performers, well trained and of good material. "Norma," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Il Trovatore," "Traviata," "Ernani," "Sonnambula," "Rigoletto," and "I Puritani" were given in Italian. The English operas were "Rose of Castile," "Marriage of Figaro," &c. Escott and Squires are great favorites, and their trip to California must prove very profitable. Mr. Maguire who already enjoys half profit of the engagement, has already made ten thousand dollars. Squire has an exceedingly sweet tenor voice, which, in Italian opera, places him in a capital light before the public. In English compositions, where dialogue comes in, he falls in the estimation. His dramatic powers are not of much account, and he therefore fails to please in the "Enchantress" and "Rose of Castile." The troupe is now in Sacramento.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Italian Opera has published its programme. Here are, in alphabetical order, the names of the artists engaged for the season 1860-61. Soprani, Mario Battu, Penco; contralti, Alboni, Eda; comprimarie, Varona, Vestri; first tenors, Gardoni, Mario, Panconi; tenors comprimari, Cappello, Morley; barytones, Badiali, Graziani; basses, Angelini, Patriossi; first buffo, Zucchini; second rôles, Mad. Leva, Messrs. Canzaboni, Soldi; chef d'orchestre, Bonetti; maitre de chant, Uranio Fontana; chorus master, Chiamamonte. The repertoire will include Semiramide, Il Barbiere, Cenerentola, and Otello of Rossini; Norma, I Puritani, Sonnambula, of Bellini; Polliuto, Lucia, Regina di Golconda, Furioso, of Donizetti; Giuramento, Eleonora of Mercadante; il Ballo in Maschera, la Traviata, il Trovatore, Rigoletto, Ernani, of Verdi; Don Desiderio, of Prince Poniatowsky; Martha, of Flotow; la Serva Padrona, of Pergolesi; I Matrimonio segreto, of Cimarosa; Don Giovanni le Nozze di Figaro, of Mozart.

The marriage of M. Wieniawski, solo violinist to the Emperor of Russia, with Miss Hampton, niece of the popular composer and pianist, George Osborne, has just taken place at Pierrefitte, near Paris, where Mr. Stevens gave a handsome dejeuner, in honor of the occasion, followed by a concert. Madame Catherine Hayes sang "Qui la voce." The worthy host sang a morceau which Rossini did him the honor of composing expressly for him. Mr. Osborne and Mr. Oury also lent their aid to the gratification of the company, which comprised a host of celebrities in music, literature and art. M. Rossini was present.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.—(From a Correspondent.)—A grand concert, organized by Herr Alexander Reichardt, the popular tenor, was given at the Etablissement des Bains in this attractive watering-place, on Monday evening. The rooms were crammed to suffocation. The programme was as follows:—

PREMIERE PARTIE.
Marche du "Songe d'une Nuit d'été" exécutée par MM. Reichardt, Ilgritt, Engel et Paque. . . . . Mendelssohn

SPA.—The concert given by Vivier, assisted by Mlle. Francois and Franco-Mendes, came off on the 10th instant. On the 22d inst., we shall have a festival that will make some little stir, for it will be given in honor of a new promenade that the Ediles of Spa have baptized the "Promenade Meyerbeer." The resolution was proposed to the authorities, by M. Servais, in the following terms:—"Among the celebrated visitors who honor our city with their presence, there is none who has been more faithful to us, none who is surrounded by more universal glory than Meyerbeer, one of the greatest artists of the age. During thirty-two years that the illustrious master has come to Spa, our mountains, of which he is so fond, have inspired him with more than one of those songs, energetic and gentle in turn, which constitute the delight of the musical world. We may, therefore, without temerity, claim a right to call this brilliant genius in some degree ours; for it is generally known that there is not one of his productions, from the popular and ever young Robert le Diable, to his latest creation, Le Pardon de Ploërmel, which did not first germinate, or which was not developed, among us. The "Promenade Meyerbeer" will call to mind, at every step, the works of the great master—in one place, the repose of Alice; in another, Bertram's bridge; farther on, the cascade of Ploërmel, the grove of Dinorah, etc. This monument, hewn out of nature itself, will not suffer the fate of many other monuments, apparently more solid; far from suffering through the injury of time, it will enjoy the advantage of increasing, and becoming green again every spring. It will be like the eternally beautiful music of Meyerbeer to whom you consecrate this memento." The communal council adopted unanimously the proposition of M. Servais.—Ibid.

MAYENCE.—The first concert of the Mittelrheinisches Musikfest took place on the 22d inst. The second concert of the festival took place on the 23d. Among other pieces, Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht were performed.—Ibid.

London.

The season now concluded has been a brief and busy one. The majority of the musical performances were given between the 1st day of May and the last of July, and a mere statistical account of these will be interesting, as showing what an extraordinary amount can be got through in so short a time, and what a large quantity of patronage must be bestowed on the art to which these columns are devoted, it being admitted that each concert was attended by a goodly number of the public.

The list of actual societies comprise the Sacred Harmonic, Musical, Amateur Musical, Orchestral, Philharmonic, Vocal Association, Leslie's Choir, Society of British Musicians, Tonic Sol-Fa Association, London Orchestral Association, and Bach Society; to which may be added the following societies, classes, or institutions, not under the management of a committee:—Monday Popular Concerts, Hullah's Concerts, New Philharmonic Concerts, English Glee and Madrigal Union, Metropolitan Schools' Choral Society, Whittington Club Concerts, Beaumont Institution Concerts, The "Arion," London Quintett Union, London Glee and Madrigal Union, Jas. Robinson's Choir, Henken's Choral Class, St. George's Choir, Dando's Quartett Concerts, Professors' Concert Union, Perckham Musical Union, Purcell Club, Musical Union; not to mention the charitable institutions, such as the Royal Society of Musicians, the Royal Society of Female Musicians, the Society of British and Foreign Musicians, and the "Sons of the Clergy" Society, all of which have given performances in aid of their respective treasuries.

Amongst the most important of the orchestral concerts must be mentioned those given by Mr. Hullah, at St. Martin's Hall, as instances of individual enterprise rarely met with. With the aid of but one manager, Mr. Secretary Headland, Mr. Hullah gives performances only surpassed in magnitude by those of the Sacred Harmonic Society, while the scheme is so much the more satisfactory, as it embraces both secular and sacred music, both instrumental and choral performances; while there is no hesitation on the part of the conductor to produce untried works, or such, at least, as are unknown in this country. We note that the following complete works have been given during the past season of these concerts:—An oratorio, John the Baptist, by Hager, of Vienna; Gounod's Grand Mass, Handel's Messiah (twice) and Judas Maccabeus; Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Rossini's Stabat Mater, Haydn's Creation, and Macfarren's May Day. Dr. Wyld, too, must be specialised for enterprise. His New Philharmonic Concerts have been very liberally managed and warmly supported. His attention has been chiefly directed to the efficient performance of great orchestral works, and he has introduced Spohr's wonderful symphony, "The Power of Sound," but he, like Mr. Hullah, has a chorus attached to his institution, and he has, moreover, presented some of the best solo vocalists, during the series of concerts, to his subscribers. The Sacred Harmonic Society, whose business-like management is, or should be, the envy of all musical institutions, has given twelve concerts, independent of the soirees d'invitation issued by the Orphéonistes during their visit. They commenced the season last year with Spohr's Last Judgment and Mozart's Requiem, and followed with the customary Christmas performance of the Messiah. Since the turn of the year they have given Handel's Samson, Judas Maccabeus, Israel in Egypt, Dettingen Te Deum, and a repetition of the Messiah in Passion Week, Haydn's Creation and Seasons, and Mendelssohn's Elijah (twice) and Lobgesang, beside taking important part in a Mendelssohn festival at the Crystal Palace on the 4th of May. The Philharmonic Society has prospered, under the direction of the accomplished Doctor and Professor Sterndale Bennett, and the Queen attended one of the concerts, an honor which she omitted last year, to the great disappointment of every one concerned. The Musical Society of London has been peculiarly successful, and has arrived at its limit as regards the number of members. The concerts, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon, have been uniformly excellent, and a very clever cantata by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, entitled Christmas, was introduced at one of them and very well received. A brilliant conversation brought the season to a close. The Vocal Association has given but one concert with orchestra.

We regret to have heard so little of the Bach Society. The wonderful success of the Passions Musik performance at St. Martin's Hall, two years ago, the subsequent executions of some selections from the same at the Leeds Festival, and the well-received introduction of a song from it at one of the Monday Popular Concerts (first season), should encourage the Society to give at least a repetition of the work, if not other sacred compositions of the sublime master. The London Orchestral Association does not seem to have achieved anything beyond the holding of one or two meetings for the transaction of preliminary business, but it is satisfactory to note that the society preserves its existence. The Orchestral Society, too, has been rather quiet. Its conductor, Mr. W. Rea, has been appointed organist to the Town Hall at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and as he can scarcely be expected to conduct telegraphically, we suppose some one must have been appointed in his stead. We should think there was room for a good society for the practice of orchestral music. The Amateur Musical Society has thriven. Interest therein is spiritedly maintained, and there are always plenty of subscribers without necessity for appealing to the public. These are the only concerts in London where full dress is really indispensable. The Society of British Musicians, which, though heard little of now-a-days, has not relinquished the most important feature in its mission—viz., the representation of MS. orchestral compositions, by native authors, has given a trial of new works, and the Royal Academy of Music has exhibited its students in a short series of concerts, in which full band and chorus have been employed.

Turning to chamber music, we find that the Monday Popular Concerts have by no means absorbed the quartet-loving public. The Musical Union has been duly patronized, and two new associations have sprung up, while Mr. Dando's quartet concerts (excellent affairs, that deserve to be better known) have maintained their position. The new establishments referred to are the London Quintet Union and the Professors' Concert Union, the former with Mr. Willey for leader, the latter with Mr. Henry Blagrove. Each has given three or four concerts, and with tolerable success. The Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts has also combined some agreeable performances of chamber music with its soirees. The Whittington Club Concerts and the Beaumont Institution (the latter amongst the most spirited in the metropolis) have met with considerable support.

The choral concerts not yet noticed have been given by the London Glee and Madrigal Union, the English Glee and Madrigal Union, the St. George's Choir, Mr. James Robinson's Choir, and Mr. Henken's Choral Class. The first of these has been singularly successful, having given upwards of 100 concerts.

The musical doings at the Crystal Palace, which should be reckoned amongst those of the metropolis, have been important. Six opera concerts, supported by some of the best artistes of Her Majesty's Theatre, have been given; Mlle. Piccolomini has appeared at three of the Saturday concerts, and the Tonic Sol-Fa Association and the Metropolitan Schools' Choral Society, who measure their singers by thousands, have set thrice their number of auditors wondering at the excellent training of the children. The very striking execution and exquisite tone of the Orphéonistes are yet fresh in the recollection of our town readers and such provincial perusers as had the good luck to visit London and Sydenham during the last week in June, and the brazen strains of the competitive bands last month may be adverted to as a remarkable contrast to the afore-mentioned delicate choralism. Add to these the Mendelssohn Festival, consisting (musically) of a performance of Elijah by 2,500 executants, a concert by the Yorkshire Choral Union, one by the Vocal Association with 1,000 voices, and two performances of the May Queen, and one of Mendelssohn's Son and Stranger, and it must be admitted that the Crystal Palace has not been behind in the representation of the divine art.

It makes our head whirl to think that we should have attended the greater part of these concerts, and we have yet to add the Drury Lane Promenade Concerts, an amateur performance of Mendelssohn's Antony at Campden House, a concert by blind musicians at Hanover Square, and concerts for the benefit of the London Blind Society, a literary gentleman, Mad. Jullien, the family of the late Mr. R. Brough, the Society of British and Foreign Musicians, the Middlesex Volunteer Artillery, and the St. John's (Islington) Roman Catholic Schools. The majority of the concerts have been well attended, but what has gratified our critical senses still more has been the very remarkable fact, that scarcely a programme has appeared without at least one classical instrumental piece, a sign that a better order of music is not only tolerated but actually required.—London Musical World, August 18.

FLORAL HALL.—The most attractive concerts that are being given now are those of Prince Galitzin and Mr. Alfred Mellon at the Floral Hall. These take place every night, under the joint conductorship of the two eminent musicians just named—that is to say, Prince Galitzin conducts his Kozlov Polka, his Herzen Waltz, a "Sanctus" by Bortniansky, and the finale to Glinka's opera Life for the Czar; while overtures, airs, operatic selections, and fragments of symphonies are performed under the guidance of Mr. Alfred Mellon. It will appear strange to many persons that, after the remarkable and excellent concerts given by Prince Galitzin at the St. James's Hall, he should now confine his attention for the most part to dance music. Polkas and waltzes can, unfortunately, be composed by persons of all nations, though it is not every nation that can produce a Strauss or a Labitzky, a Jullien or a Marsard; but the true Russian music that Prince Galitzin introduced us to at St. James's Hall possessed marked peculiarities, and, in character as in form, was quite new to an English audience, as it also would have been to an audience of Frenchmen or Germans. If there is to be a Russian element in the concerts at the Floral Hall (and if not, why does Prince Galitzin's name appear in connection with them?), surely a genuine mazurka, in the style of the one (Glinka's) played by Miss Arabella Goddard, would be a more appropriate contribution than either a waltz or a polka. We may suggest, too, to Mr. Alfred Mellon that the charming air sung at the Russian concert by Mlle. Parepa would at least be found more novel than "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," which most of us must have heard of once or twice by this time. Nevertheless, Mlle. Parepa was encored in Mr. Balfe's too popular ballad, and she was also called upon to repeat Victorine's grand air from Mr. Mellon's opera of that name. The band engaged for the concerts is, with a few exceptions, that of the Royal Italian Opera. The chorus is also from that establishment. In other words the chorus and band are admirable.—Illustrated Times.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The merry mountain maid. S. Glover. 25
Written for the especial gratification of those numerous young singers who were so much taken with "Little gipsy Jane" and "I'm a merry laughing maid," and, we dare say, it will please them just as well, if not better.
- Come back Annie. Song and Chorus. Hatton. 25
Effective song for a baritone (or contralto) voice, in the popular style.
- The Rhine maiden. Song. H. Smart. 25
Lone old tree. " Clement White. 25
Sentimental parlor songs which would grace any music folio.
- Dreams of the heart are passing away. Harvey Newcomb. 25
An easy and pleasing song for amateurs.
- Ever my spirit lingers with thee. C. W. Glover. 25
One of the best English ballads written since "Ever of thee," to which song it indeed bears a slight resemblance. It has all the marks of genuine inspiration, and will quickly be recognized as such when heard. Everybody will want to buy it.
- I'm leaving home, my Willie. Balfe. 25
Charming new Scotch song, showing the versatility of the celebrated composer very advantageously.
- I dreamt that I had fairy wings. J. W. Cherry. 25
Very pretty, like the other "Fairy" songs of this author. Suitable for a lesson piece.

Instrumental Music.

- Rigoletto. (Operatic Favorites.) Nava. 35
Martha. " " 35
Not quite as difficult as Beyer's well-known Repository of operatic melodies. The selection of airs is in the best taste, and no favorite will be missed.
- Kathleen Mavourneen Waltzes. D'Albert. 50
A capital set of waltzes, introducing the air of Crouch's song in a very effective manner.
- But thou did'st not leave. D. Rimbault. 15
Qual anelante cervo. " 15
My song shall be of mercy. " 15
From the "Sabbath Strains," a collection of Sacred melodies arranged easily for small hands.
- Morning Star Waltzes for Violin and Piano. Lanner. 35
Il balen " " " Case. 25
Si la stanchezza " " " 25
Capital parlor pieces that no violin player should be without. The melodies are most pleasing, and the arrangement plain, telling and not difficult.

Books.

- A NEW AND SCIENTIFIC SELF-INSTRUCTING SCHOOL FOR THE VIOLIN, for Beginners, Amateurs, Business Players, and Teachers. In Three Parts, Complete in one volume. By George Saunders. 75

This work contains a large amount of valuable instruction for all grades of violinists, and, while it furnishes the rudiments of a thorough knowledge of Violin playing to those just commencing their studies in this branch of music, it also imparts numerous hints and facts of great practical importance to advanced players. The music comprises nearly two hundred popular tunes, thirteen sets of cotillions, and a good variety of Contra, Spanish, and Fancy dances, with proper figures appended.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

September.

BY THOMAS W. PARSONS.

September strews the woodland o'er
With many a brilliant color ;
The world is brighter than before —
Why should our hearts be duller ?
Sorrow and the scarlet leaf,
Sad thoughts and sunny weather,
Ah me ! this glory and this grief
Agree not well together.

This is the parting season—this
The time when friends are flying ;
And lovers now, with many a kiss,
Their long farewells are sighing.
Why is earth so gaily dressed ?
This pomp that autumn beareth
A funeral seems, where every guest
A bridal garment weareth.

Each one of us, perchance, may here,
On some blue morn hereafter,
Return to view the gaudy year,
But not with boyish laughter :
We shall then be wrinkled men,
Our brows with silver laden,
And thou this glen mayst seek again,
But nevermore a maiden !

Nature perhaps foresees that Spring
Will touch her teeming bosom,
And that a few brief months will bring
The bird, the bee, the blossom :
Ah ! these forests do not know —
Or would less brightly wither —
The virgin that adorns them so
Will never more come hither !

Piano-Forte Composers.

To go back a little in our retrospect of pianoforte music and pianoforte composers. The age of Dussek was extraordinarily prolific and rich. Besides Dussek and Clementi, there were Steibelt, Woelfl, Kozeluch, Krumpholz, Eberl, and many others, among whom one of the most distinguished by the services he rendered to the instrument was John Cramer. All these produced sonatas. Dussek and Clementi wrote the largest number and the best ; but Dussek had by far the greatest influence on his contemporaries. The characteristics of his style were salient and marked, while, like all men of genius,* he had mannerisms, upon which his imitators fastened exclusively, it being out of their power to copy the ideas that flowed from the springs of his inventive faculty—which, however, they, not seldom, either paraphrased, or stole outright.

Thus the world was deluged with good, bad, and indifferent imitations of Dussek. Among the good may be cited the sonatas and concertos of John Cramer, who, except in his inimitable Studies, has shown but little originality as a composer. Among the indifferent must be ranked the works of Eberl ; and, still more indifferent, those of Kozeluch and Krumpholz, which are also trivial and meagre. The bad would be too numerous to mention ; but some notion may be entertained of their quantity, when we state that they stood comparatively in the same relation to Dussek which nine composers out of ten who appeared in print in the second quarter of the present century, occupied in relation to Henri Herz and Thalberg, and which they now occupy and have occupied for many years in relation to Mendelssohn. Those musicians, indeed, have many sins to answer for, in the facility they have offered to common-place "slop-composers" to exaggerate and batten on their mannerisms.

Clementi, whose general style was somewhat pedantic, and whose learning could not be borrowed, found few imitators ; so few that we can not tax our memory for a single example. Nevertheless, Clementi was decidedly an original thinker, and those who compare him with Mozart only declare their incompetence to understand either. Moreover, Clementi, at times, almost equaled the inspirations of genius itself, which, if we were writing an account of his works, we could prove by several examples.†

Steibelt was another original, and perhaps a genius, although his style is not so individual as that of Dussek, whom he occasionally equaled, if not surpassed, in his ordinary flights, but never approached in his highest inspirations. To illustrate this opinion, we may suggest that the concertos in E and E flat of Steibelt, known as the Storm and the Chasse, are equal, if not superior, to many of the earlier concertos of Dussek ; but, on the other hand, in a far greater degree of inferiority does Steibelt's longest and most ambitious sonata—that in E flat, dedicated to Mad. Bonaparte—stand in relation to the Elegy, Op. 61, the Invocation, Op. 77, and other grand works of Dussek, which approach nearer to Beethoven than any sonatas for the pianoforte with which we are acquainted. Steibelt, however, was immensely popular, and many of his smaller sonatas may be safely taken as models. The pianoforte is, besides, indebted to him for a vast number of passages and effects of which later composers have availed themselves without acknowledgement. His studies, in spite of the strong resemblance of some of them to those of Cramer, are also as excellent as they are useful. The name of Steibelt, then, must always have an honorable place in the history of the pianoforte.

Woelfl was a composer of merit and a musician of more than ordinary acquirements. He was original, but his originality is somewhat affected. Many of his productions have achieved a high reputation among musicians, and more especially a sonata in A flat, with a fugue. This sonata is decidedly a work of thought, but the fugue is quite as dry and labored as it is ingenious. Woelfl enjoyed great consideration in his day, but his writings appear to have had very little influence on his contemporaries, to whom his peculiarities did not proffer a tempting store for petty larceny or wholesale theft. The sonata in E—or rather fantasia, since the first movement alone is in regular form—called Ne Plus Ultra, was his most celebrated work, and is that which is best remembered now. At the time it was composed its difficulty was regarded as immense. One of the variations on the popular air "Life let us cherish," in the last movement of the sonata, seems, by its skips of double octaves, to have anticipated a fantasia of Henri Herz on the romance in Méhul's Joseph. With all this, however, we are inclined to think that the greater part of Woelfl's compositions are likely to remain in oblivion, unless some future antiquarian shall valiantly step forward, and, with the spade and shovel of enthusiasm, exhume them from the grave in which they have long mouldered.

Of the other composers who flourished about this period there is little to be said. Their merits were small and their influence null. Some of them obtained a popularity as ephemeral as it was baseless. One of the most popular, however, and deservedly so, was Abbé Gellenex, who chiefly excelled as a writer of variations on favorite airs. He also wrote sonatas, but these were of little worth.‡ Another, a German composer, named Gaensbachen, enjoyed considerable fame, which such of his works as are extant by no means justified. One name, however, shone like a star in the midst of this cloud of obscurities. Pinto, an Englishman, who was cut off at the early age of twenty-one, gave every indication of becoming one of the most remarkable men of his day. His genius was undoubted. He played admirably on the pianoforte and violin ; wrote with facility for both instruments, and, though so young, was a wonderful extempore performer. It is a disgrace to our publishers and musical amateurs, that neither the enterprise of the former, nor the curiosity of the latter, has compelled a republication of the printed works of Pinto, and the production of that exist in manuscript. These sonatas for pianoforte solos, in A, C minor, and E flat minor,§ which we have seen, are as full of beauties as the best of Dussek ; while a set of vocal canzonets, which we have also had the opportunity of examining, might, without impropriety, be placed by the side of Haydn's well-known models. Besides these, a violin concerto and many other works exist in manuscript. It would, we feel certain, be a good speculation on the part of a music publisher in these times of dearth, to print everything that remains of Pinto, whose death was a severe blow to the hopes of England as a musical nation. Who can say that a genius like Mozart's was not thus untimely quenched ? Neither Mozart, nor Mendelssohn, the most surprising examples of precocious genius in the history of the musical art, gave earlier or more brilliant marks of originality and talent than George Frederick Pinto.

In the enumeration of those who obtained a high reputation by their contributions to the pianoforte, it would hardly be just to omit the name of FERDINAND RIES, a distinguished and voluminous composer of the Moscheles' period. Ries was one of the few who enjoyed the honor and advantage of Beethoven's counsel. A man of great industry and talent, he wanted nothing but genius to conduct him to the highest results. But invention and imagination were denied ; and Ries, like others before him, strove to make up in quantity for what was lacking in quality. He composed in every style. Oratorios, operas, symphonies, quartets, and chamber music of all forms and varieties, came from his pen with equal readiness. It was a matter of indifference to Ries what he undertook. He would set about an oratorio, a symphony, or an air with variations with the greatest nonchalance. He possessed the facility which is mistaken for genius by those who have not the gift of analysis, to so great a degree that it led him into twaddle and prolixity almost as often as it enabled him to accomplish good things. His amazing ease of production militated against his fame. Nevertheless, being a cultivated musician, whatever Ries gave to the world would stand the test of critical examination, and, if accused of exuberance and insipidity, could not be condemned for clumsiness. Thoughtful and ambitious, much and rapidly as he wrote for the publishers, Ries had always time to devote to a class of compositions for which those gentlemen are known to entertain an instinctive aversion. In the midst of his teaching, his public playing, his occupations as Kapellmeister and conductor at some of the great musical meetings in Germany, symphonies, concertos, quartets, would issue from his portfolio as regularly and in as quick succession as though his whole time had been taken up in manufacturing them. Ries loved his art, and it was no fault of his that he did not influence it in a greater degree. He had all the will to do great things, and entertained a full conviction that what he wrote was for all time and would entitle him to a place beside the great masters. But unhappily it was not for him to decide upon this matter; his contemporaries thought differently of the merits and influence of his works, and, now that he is no more, posterity has put the seal upon their verdict.

The pianoforte compositions of Ferdinand Ries are very numerous, and may serve as well as anything else to help us to a general estimate of his talent. He wrote concertos, sonatas, trios, duets, and smaller pieces of almost every denomination. He was a first-rate pianist, and his music naturally presents much that is interesting, and more that is eminently useful, to the student of the pianoforte. He was thoroughly acquainted with the sonata form, and has left many excellent proofs of his knowledge. There is, however, a certain dryness about his works which prevented them from being popular while he lived, and has since consigned the greater part of them to oblivion, although Ries has not been dead many years. The most celebrated of his larger compositions for the pianoforte is the concerto in C sharp minor, which is even now frequently used as a piece for display. There are some very fine ideas in this concerto which abounds in difficult bravura passages that require a great command of the instrument to play effectively. The opening is grand and passionate, and the whole of the first movement good—perhaps the best effort of the composer. The slow movement and rondo are much inferior, and the instrumentation, after the first tutti, presents very few points of interest. The Studies of Ries are admirable as manual exercises; and, for a brilliant morceau in the popular style, his fantasia on "Those Evening Bells" is, perhaps, as good in its way as anything of the kind that has been produced. The sonatas of Ries are all well written, and, in spite of a tendency to redundant detail, may be consulted with advantage both by pianist and composer. In none of them, however, do we find indications of those high qualities which entitle their possessor to rank among the composers of real genius.

ALOYS SCHMIDT, a German musician who resided many years at Frankfort, and KUHLAU, a flute-player, both deserve mention among the pianoforte writers of the epoch. The former, a professor of deserved eminence, is chiefly known by his Studies, which should be diligently practised by all who wish to acquire mechanical proficiency. The latter, in some duets for flute and piano (the best things of the kind extant), has shown a great familiarity with the sonata form, in which he writes with fluency, clearness, and effect.

MARSCHNER, a popular and well-known dramatic composer, has written some sonatas for the pianoforte, which, like his operatic music, smells strongly of Weber, whose mannerisms even are exaggerated by the composer of Der Vampyr. These sonatas, nevertheless, are worth perusal, although they are written so awkwardly for the instrument, that we are led to conclude Marschner was not a pianist.

REISSIGER, and his trios, are well known by all amateurs to serve as the necessity of dilating on their merits, which lie not very deep beneath the surface. They are good show pieces, and that is all. Pianist, violinist, and violoncellist, can each shine to his heart's content, without any prodigious amount of exertion, or any extraordinary display of skill. Hence their extensive popularity. Their form, however, is clear, and though the ideas are poor and the general style commonplace, the interest attached to the sonata form is so inevitable that even musicians can listen to these trios with some degree of interest. This must be our excuse for mentioning Reissiger, who, except as a manufacturer of easy pieces for amateurs, has had very little influence on the art, and has no claim to be ranked among the great composers for the pianoforte.

* By men of genius we can understand only those whose gifts of invention enables them to produce things that are at the same time original and beautiful.

† The sonata in B minor, Op. 40—one of the finest works ever written for the pianoforte: the Didone Abandonata (Scena Tragica), Op. 50, and many others.

‡ And "The Queen of Prussia's Waltz."—Printer's Devil.
§ Messrs. Coventry & Co., Dean Street, introduced the first of these in the excellent compilation of pianoforte works, edited by Mr., now Professor, Sterndale Bennett, under the title of Classical Practice. Copies of the others are very rare.

Among the successful imitators of Mendelssohn we should have cited KUFFERATH, a pianist and composer of some distinction, resident at Brussels. Kufferath has written some excellent Studies, which develop with great success many of the peculiarities of the modern style. Their practice cannot fail to promote the acquirement of that mechanical facility which is indispensable to those who desire to excel as public players.

Music in Schools.

The following we condense from a long and able article in the R. I. Schoolmaster:

The subject of the introduction of music into schools of all classes, is at the present time favorably entertained, especially where the people are awake to the interests of education.

A great change in public sentiment has been wrought, but even now, if we except cities and large villages, it is rather permitted than required. The time devoted to the pursuit of this branch is, by the multitude, considered lost. Because it does not assist the student in calculating interest or per centage, because it does not in some immediate direction augment the purse, no time or money can be expended on music. Now, verily, so far as this sentiment prevails it is a misfortune, and I apprehend that a better appreciation of music, vocal and instrumental, theoretical and practical, would prove a great blessing to both the present and rising generation.

1. As a science, it possesses many intrinsic and peculiar merits. It may be termed one of the exact sciences, as all written music is constructed upon purely mathematical principles, and one having no natural love of music may construct a series of chords perfectly philosophical, if not the most pleasing. Hence its study would require thought and afford discipline like any other of the exact sciences. But to the gifted and skilled in the art, it possesses charms rarely found in all the range of sciences. In Germany and Italy, multitudes, ravished by the charms of melody, almost worship a science affording such ecstasy of bliss.

I disclaim all profundity in the science, and have comparatively little practice in the art, but the testimony of its great masters and the character of their productions place it before us as of the highest order.

2. As an aid in discipline, I consider it without a rival. Practical and vocal music is demanded at this point. Musical attraction is the motive power in discipline, and it needs only judicious management to render it a powerful agent. The universal love of music, even of an ordinary character, in children, is the basis of sure success. I call it a moral suasion machine of steam power and lightning speed, cultivating the disposition, eradicating poisonous plants, and modifying and mollifying all the harsher elements of our nature. As such it operates in the development of mind, in the school especially, as well as in all other relations. In many instances it is the chief inducement for persons to attend school. When children have lost their natural temperament, either of mind, body or soul, by too much or too little labor, when they become stupid, or have fallen asleep, when irritable, quarrelsome, and hostile to each other, through envy, emulation, malice or any other passion, let no man say that singing a song is not the balm for these maladies unless he has thoroughly tried.

3. As an accomplishment. The term accomplishment I use as ornamental, music being considered as an ornamental branch, but while it is acknowledged to be emphatically ornamental, it should also be claimed as among the fundamental and useful branches.

At the present time no individual could claim what is understood by a "liberal education" without a knowledge of music.

Music, to be an accomplishment, must be understood as other branches are understood, it must be read as a language is read, it must be taken in by the eye, digested by the brain, as well as imitated from memory, then it is an accomplishment indeed.

Music often becomes in this way the prominent and most valuable attainment in a large class of persons; thus the only means of livelihood, usefulness, or agreeableness to the world about them. That one is a good pianist or vocalist is often the only door, to elegant and refined society for them.

4. Its physical influence. The exercise of the lungs produced by the cultivation of the voice is one of the best preventives against pulmonary diseases.

The Germans, who are a nation of singers, require music to be taught in the schools for the double purpose of disseminating the science and guarding against disease, and it is a significant fact that comparatively very few persons die of consumption in those countries where music is most generally taught. A portion of the lungs in healthy persons is ordinarily inactive, and this inactivity without caution would promote disease, but vocal music brings into exercise every portion and tends to keep them healthy.

The same effect is supposed to be produced upon the bronchial tubes, also the organs of the throat and mouth. There are numerous instances of persons of consumptive build and tendency whose lungs and chest have been expanded by vocal music, and whose lives have been lengthened for years from this very cause.

5. Its moral influence. Some English writer has said, "Let me make the songs of a nation and I care not who makes their laws."

Whatever the writer meant in relation to the sentiment of his songs, he certainly leaves us to suppose he relies much on the melody and execution of them. He depends much upon the power to appreciate music, and a disposition to be controlled by it. The same principle is recognized in our temperance meetings and political campaigns, and it should be allowed here as in all other departments that the moral influence may be good or bad. Music appeals to, and is expressive of, every passion. It is said of Beethoven that his visitors could judge what would be their reception by him by the music he was playing when they approached his study, and that when he was executing a certain style of melody no one ventured to disturb him.

Music is the medium through which we receive the most sublime instruction in the most effectual manner. It is this that softens the heart, that elevates the affections, makes men the most agreeable companions for earth and ripens them for the atmosphere of heaven.

A word should be said of music as an amusement. All men must have amusement; our nature demands it and will have it. Music hath power to amuse; almost every house proves the truth. The piano forte, violin, harp, guitar, accordion, or some simpler musical instrument, may be found in great numbers in all our villages, and they are by no means allowed to remain idle, and a great multitude of persons but for these instruments would fall into disreputable society and be ruined.

Nothing bath charms equal to music in the home circle as an amusement. This is true also in the social party or in solitude, indeed who can tell us where music is not a welcome guest. Music as an amusement surely stands at the head of the list.

Perhaps enough has already been said, but I cannot forbear to mention a single fact more.

The acquirement of the science of music, in order to be in any way practical, must be made in youth. If this matter be delayed until youth become young ladies and gentlemen, it becomes much more difficult and vastly more doubtful. My own observation has proved the statement true beyond a doubt. Nor can it generally be acquired in the common singing school, which is held weekly or perhaps semi-weekly, but it must be taught every day in the common school, at the blackboard as a lesson, and required as any other recitation and not left at the option of the scholar. The rudiments of music can be understood and practiced by children. Vocal exercises are pleasing and attractive to them, so also the art of timing. If properly introduced, this whole exercise proves a most agreeable and profitable deviation from study. This exercise should be introduced at least once during each session of the school, and continue from five to ten minutes. If this course be energetically pursued by a skillful teacher, all may become singers. The progress may seem slow, but it will be thorough and sure, and it seems to me that in no other way can this glorious science be understood and practiced. There is a sentiment prevalent that only the gifted can acquire the art. But this is an error. Some doubtless more readily than others become adepts but there is the germ in every human being born which if cultivated and developed will prove that Nature is by no means partial in her distribution of this talent. It is the lack of purpose, application and improvement that causes our inability and it is unjust, not to say irreverent, to attribute it to our Maker. If half the time and expense were devoted to children which is expended in the education of horses and other brute beasts, by parents themselves, the generation would be far better skilled in all departments of science than now.

Now, brother teachers, and indulgent reader, I have not written this article for the sake of writing something, and concluded this would be the most pleasant or easy, but because the subject demands and deserves attention. Much has been written, but not half enough, or what has been written has not been regarded. Will you place music upon the catalogue of the useful? Will you teach the rudiments of this science, or if you cannot, will you encourage the teaching of it, and adopt such measures as shall result in making your scholars singers? Preach the doctrine in the school, in the family, in the school meeting, in the borough or town meeting, the streets, on the house tops, plead for it, pray for it, if you pray (and you cannot dispense with prayer of course,) and very soon scores of sweet voices will salute you in tones and melodies that will lighten your toils, make elastic your steps and happy your hearts.

The Organ.*

NINTH STUDY.—THE LIMIT TO WHICH THE ORGAN MAY EXTEND ITS COMPASS IN HEIGHT OR DEPTH.

Every one is agreed in this, that the organ should be composed at the very least of the three distinct sounds corresponding with the three main divisions of the human voice, namely, of the three distinct sounds of the soprano, tenor, and bass voices. But beyond this we may ask how far it is necessary to be still further enforced with either a pelting hailstorm of shrill and almost imperceptible sounds in the treble, or with the deep-rolling thunders breathed forth by the enormous 32-feet pipes in the bass?

This is a question, which, if we are to believe Herr Seidel, our fathers have already answered for us. "The ancient builders," he says, "called a 16-feet organ a complete organ, and an 8-feet organ an organ only half way towards completion."

The absence of fixed ideas on this matter, as on so many others connected with the organ, has a tendency to produce various divergences in different directions from the true principles of their art amongst organ builders. One imagines that he has carried the art of building to its utmost limits, because he has added to the three main divisions just alluded to, a series of other sounds so low that he has not only great difficulty in tuning the pipes meant to produce them, but also in producing from them what may properly be called a sound, or at least a musical sound at all, and he will at the same time draw your attention to the enormous size of his pipes, on which a vast sum of money has been expended almost to no purpose, with a self-complacency that causes you to smile. Another would have you think he has done great wonders, because he has for once condescended to enter the lists with the piano-maker, and has succeeded (to his praise be it said) in producing sounds so extremely high and thin, that amidst the other contending sounds of the organ, and the echoes of the church, they are reduced to the dimensions of imperceptible atoms, and all but annihilated. For ourselves, we do not for a moment believe that the glory of a skillful builder consists in his having made pipes which are either absurdly large, or absurdly small, and we shall consider that the object of these remarks has been fully gained if we can make organ builders, and such as have the direction of these matters under their control, understand for once that it ill becomes an instrument of so dignified and religious a character as the organ, to imitate in its tones either a park of artillery on the one hand, or a musical snuff-box on the other.

To find them some reasonable mean between these two extremes of absurdity, we would again refer to what we have already said of the organ corresponding in its tones with the three main divisions of the human voice. A Swiss author, who is worthy of note, Herr Sulzer, writing on aesthetics, has said that "music is an imitation of singing." This dictum, applied to religious music, becomes mathematically exact and precise, for as regards the music of the theatre, far from being an imitation of the human voice, it plays a part which is for the most part wholly beyond its reach. It is there that certain effects, which belong to instruments only, rather than to that class of music which is purely vocal, are produced by a succession of myriads of notes, the very forms of which are wholly beyond the powers of the human voice. In the theatre these effects are in perfect keeping, for there all the resources of instrumentation and of sound are used with propriety for the due exaltation of things which are merely material; but in a church, where it is rather elevation of soul that is sought for, music will attain its end more by tempering even its lightest phrases with a certain amount of gravity, than by an indefinite variety of its forms, and an exaggerated use of its resources.

Now we find these principles of sacred music as first elements in the constitution of the organ itself, in so much that it is the only instrument capable of realizing the dictum of Sulzer, and of being, in the service of God, the imitation of singing.

The ancients of whom Herr Seidel speaks, and whom we shall never cease to praise, as having laid down the principles on which the organ, as specially devoted to the Christian worship, should be built, the builders, that is, of the 16th century, could, had they been so pleased, have themselves also so overlaid these same principles with a mass of very high or very low sounds as completely to have obliterated the principles themselves. At least they could have done so quite as easily as the builders of the present day,—builders that cannot now comprehend even their more worthy predecessors. But they were not pleased to do this. Had they done so, they would have entered upon a system of building, and probably they were aware of the fact themselves, which for once and for all would have severed the alliance between the organ and the massive voice of the people's song, and would have deprived it of those special devotional effects, with which the philosopher Montaigne was so much struck. Not that we mean hereby to express any admiration for a sceptic, for one of those men who is never sure of anything, but only to notice, that as regards the organ, Montaigne even gives up his scepticism, and that to him as well as to the builders of his day, the organ is but the more full realization of that homage which we pay to God by the most intelligent of our organs, namely by the voice, which is the interpreter of our thoughts.

That the Germans, a people separated more than any others from the traditions of external religion, should have multiplied indefinitely those various sounds, which are either imperceptible on account of their extreme height, or unintelligible on account of their extreme depth, may be explained without their being taken for a model in every case. The Germans in giving organ concerts have done their best to take the organ out of its proper sphere, as an instrument devoted to the church service only, as they have also done their best to take the Gregorian chant, the only true model for all chants, out of their churches, and use it for other purposes, but, we repeat, there is no reason why we should imitate them in this. Nevertheless, the French have not only imitated the Germans, but have even surpassed them by incumbering the instrumentation of the organ with all sorts of aftergrowths, in giving it such an excess of brightness, and in causing it to aim at so great a variety of sounds, that they have given it at last a character that we may look for in vain in French organs of the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries, built after the ancient models;—the idea on the contrary that has never ceased to direct the German builders in the midst of all their vagaries being that the organ should at all times be such as is best suited for the accompaniment of the choral, the idea which makes it to be at one and the same time popular, religious, and universally useful. All the French organs, with very few exceptions, are shrill, horny, and nasal instruments, in fact of such a quality of tone, that were the orchestras of the theatres to adopt the same, the most indulgent part even of the audience would not have the patience to endure them.

But must it after all be said that the organ, though devoted to the purposes of religion, ought not to exceed even by a single note, the ordinary compass of the human voice, of which it is the magnificent interpreter? We have answered this question from the very first line of the chapter, and we say again that the organ for the very reason that it is specially intended to be used as an accompaniment to the voice, has a right to ascend by at least an octave above and below the extreme notes of the same. We have said elsewhere, and we say it again now, that by accompanying, we mean adding to a given piece of music a lower part, a foundation, that is, a ground bass, we also mean by it a like addition made to a piece of music by throwing over it an ornamental dress or mantle to the upper part or treble; in other words, we mean the art of supplying it no less with a superstructure than with a foundation. And if we examine again the mission of the organ as intended to supply religious symphonies, the domain of its sounds may be still further extended, without their at all losing themselves in the absurd extremes of the drama. But some one may object, were there not, even from the middle ages, such extremes in the higher sounds of the organ that to have the pipes producing them required then, as it does now, all the skill of an able tuner, such extremes for example as are to be found in the sounds of the doubltte, the furniture, and the like. We answer, that undoubtedly there were, but that the very names of these stops, of which we shall see the full meaning later on, do of themselves answer the objections: doubltte,† that which doubles in a higher a sound already found in a lower octave; furniture, that which furnishes a more substantial sort of nourishment to the general body of organ-tone;—such terms evidently imply that these same sounds, of which the angust simplicity required by the church knew how to avail itself at all times to the best advantage, were by no means intended to sing alone, but to form in combination with other stops a foundation tone, and to impart to it what builders call roundness, point, or body.

To come however to the point—what shall be the limit to the compass of the organ, at what note higher or lower should it stop? To answer this we say that the art of organ building, even as applied to religious purposes exclusively, is not limited to a few notes more or less either way, but that its limits must be determined by the ordinary rules of common sense. All that we object to is that which we think we may well call a false musical scale, a series of sounds that is, which the ear of the people cannot appreciate, should be used for these purposes. Thus an eminent professor of natural philosophy‡ has pointed out to the Academy of Sciences the limits between which are comprised the high or low musical sounds which are perceptible to the human ear. After the contradictory observations of the English, German, and French savans, he has presented the Academy with the results of certain experiments of his own, which go to prove that a perfect chord formed by him in the ragged regions of the musical scale, as the journalist calls them, who gives an account of his proceedings, cannot be calculated by ordinary means, nor indeed by any means but such as are purely scientific. Now it is well known that scientific men appreciate sounds only by the number of the vibrations, and according to them the lowest bass sounds which the ear can appreciate, are those only which are produced by from 14 to 32 vibrations in a second, and according to the professor quoted above, the highest treble sounds which the ear can appreciate, are those only which do not require more than 73,000 of such vibrations in a second for their production. If a sufficient amount of musical sound, and distinctness of intonation, can be attained at either of these two extremes, we do not consider they exceed the limits to which the organ, considered only as an instrument for accompanying the liturgical services of the church, may extend its compass in either direction.

Singers and their Salaries.

A few weeks ago we called attention to the folly and bad taste of a gentleman (we forget his name) who wrote a querulous letter to The Times on the subject of singers' salaries, and especially about the enormous sum paid to them for attending festivals. No one in this country, where there is such an immense amount of competition in everything, is much overpaid, and certainly not singers and musicians. We remember reading some years ago in a French journal, that in Gluck's time the entire expenses of the Académie Royale, including the salaries of singers, dancers, chorus, corps-de-ballet, orchestra, costumiers, tailors, and scene-shifters, did not amount to half what was being paid to Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli alone for her services as first soprano. But was Mlle. Cruvelli, as a singer, worth more than twice as much as all the singers at the Opera in Gluck's time put together? That is the real question, and we have no hesitation in answering it in the affirmative. The vocalists for whom Gluck was condemned to write, were notoriously incapable, so much so, that at a supper where it was arranged that he should meet Piccini, and where the two rivals became convivial, the German said to the Italian: "These French people amuse me; they want us to compose songs for them, and they don't know how to sing."

Nor do any of those people know how to sing, or care an atom for singing, who are astonished and amazed that some of the prizes of life should occasionally fall to the lot of a great singer. The envious, if nothing else will console them, should reflect that if there were no great temptations in art, we should not have nearly so many great artists, by which the envious themselves, and all who have not the temperaments of mere brutes, would suffer. It is a sad thing, no doubt, that men and women who cultivate such a divine art as music should care for such a common thing as money. But bishops, who show us the way to heaven, are not insensible to its advantages; neither are generals whose first thoughts are of defeating the enemies of their country; nor judges whose chief care is that the law shall be rightly administered. We have all heard of great writers making their thousands a year, and of one great historian receiving a cheque for twenty thousand from his publisher, which he doubtless pocketed as prosaically as a banker or a broker on settling day. For our part, we rejoice that just now those who do the best things in this world occasionally meet with a fair amount of worldly success, and are enabled to leave something behind them besides a good name. We hear in the present day of painters, writers, singers, and musicians, making their fortunes; there are even poets and composers who are largely remunerated; and of all these successful ones it is quite a mistake to suppose that the most successful are those connected with the musical profession and the opera.

Formerly actors and operatic singers gained small salaries; but they led easier lives, enjoyed longer careers, and had fewer expenses. When a tenor has to shout John of Leyden's Morning Hymn at the top of his voice, and to yell Manrico's Song of War at the risk of cracking his A, surely he deserves to be better paid—not that the performance is more difficult, but because it is more dangerous) than if he had only to warble the airs of Cimarosa and Rossini? Singing the music of Meyerbeer and Verdi he knows that his notes, if not his days, are numbered, and charges accordingly.

Then think how a modern tenor has to regulate his diet, to protect his valuable chest and throat from all possible and impossible draughts; to eat nothing but boiled fowl when all London sets him down as a glutton; to drink nothing but weak claret and water, when by universal consent he is a flaming fiery drunkard. You get your feet wet, are hoarse, and are well the next day. The tenor gets his feet wet, is hoarse, is not well the next day, and as long as he is unable to sing, not only loses his money, if he happens to be a concert singer, but is usually regarded as an impostor, because he frankly and conscientiously declines to torture the ears of the public he has been in the habit of delighting. In short, the tenor is as delicate as a soprano, who is as delicate as a singing bird in Australia, where singing birds will not live.

Then there is the question of expense. Singers who receive the highest salaries have usually to travel a good deal and to spend a considerable amount of money on their costumes. In the old Italian comedy, the Doctor, Scaramuccia, Arlequino, Lelio, Vespenà, &c., played a thousand different pieces in the same dress; and if they had to go from one town to another each could carry his stage wardrobe under his arm. At present a tenor or prima donna of renown cannot go from one capital to another without being accompanied or preceded by several tons of luggage, of which the mere transport—from London, we will say to St. Petersburg, from St. Petersburg to Paris, from Paris to Madrid, from Madrid to New Orleans, and from New Orleans through New York back to London—costs more every year than was given annually to a singer in the days when singers could not sing.

These vocalists and musicians who do not belong to the Opera at all have still their expenses in the way of dress, and very heavy ones in the way of travelling, if they happen to possess great reputations, and to be in the habit of accepting engagements to appear at provincial concerts. These are secondary reasons why they should be well paid; the chief, however, of all being that their talent naturally commands a high price, and that they have a right to obtain for it its full market value, as the first-rate barrister who gets fifty pounds with his lying brief, or the celebrated doctor who takes a consultation fee of nearly as much from his dying patient. Indeed, it is only in connexion with music that this right is ever questioned; but people seem to think that in the musical profession high salaries should not be tolerated; moreover, that the habitual charges of eminent artists may without any sort of impropriety be first disputed, then disapproved of, and at last publicly outraged and condemned.—London Musical World, August 25.

Street Music.

The London Times of July 4th, says:

On Wednesday last Mr. Charles Babbage, the mathematician, who resides in Dorset street, Manchester-square, summoned four German brass band musicians before Mr. Sucker, the police magistrate of Marylebone, upon a charge of annoying him with their noise, after they had been requested to depart from the neighborhood of his house, and a reasonable cause had been assigned for the request. Mr. Babbage was engaged with his studies, when these fellows came before his door and opened fire with their instruments. He went out and asked them to go away, but they recommenced playing and refused to move. Mr. Babbage went in search of a constable, and when he came back he found that they had moved to the front of a neighboring house, but so close at hand that the noise was just the same disturbance as before. The owner of this house, as it appeared, liked their music and desired them to play on. When the constable came up he ordered the musicians to move off, but this they refused to do, and consequently he removed them to the station house. Here was a conflict of interests. Mr. Babbage wanted silence; the owner of No. 27 wanted noise. But Mr. Babbage's silence could not annoy No. 27, though No. 27's noise could and did annoy Mr. Babbage. On such a state of facts it is clear enough that the interests of the gentleman who would inflict a nuisance upon his neighbors must give way. If a relative of Mr. Babbage had been sick and suffering from disease, the tenant of No. 27 could not plead his musical partialities as a justification for causing a disturbance with street music simply to gratify an idle fancy. But the rule is that the musicians must move away when requested to do so on account of sickness in a family or any other reasonable cause. Now, Mr. Babbage had this other "reasonable cause," and against it the idle fancies of No. 27 could no more prevail than they would have done upon the supposition that sickness had actually existed in the house. There is an idea prevalent among these people that they are not compellable to move on, unless they are informed that there is actual illness in a house; but it is to be hoped that Mr. Sucker's decision of Wednesday last will go some way towards dispelling the delusion. "No one," said the magistrate, "has a right to play his noisy instruments within the hearing of persons who are pursuing grave occupations. The street is not to be infested with persons who disturb the inhabitants." Independently of this legal decision it would seem from Mr. Sucker's decision that there is another, which will spread joy throughout the studies of many overworked men. Whoever causes an obstruction in the public streets is guilty of an offence. These musicians "had no right to occupy the thoroughfare so as to cause an obstruction, and they were liable to punishment for so doing." The conclusion was that the four tuneless Teutons who had obstructed the thoroughfare—who had annoyed Mr. Babbage—and who had resisted the command of the constable to move on, were fined in the mitigated penalty of 5s. each; but with an intimation that if ever they made their appearance in Marylebone Police-court again the sterner fine of £2 a head was hanging over them. There was a subsequent and smaller case disposed of summarily by analogy, the gist of which was that Gatino—probably Gaetano—Circone, an Italian, was also fined 5s. for playing an instrument, also to the annoyance of Mr. Babbage, and, in default of payment, his instrument was detained. A musical fanatic who was present in court, being touched with sympathy for the misfortune of the wandering musician, paid the fine, and Circone was discharged to the further annoyance of the human race. There is no London nuisance equal to that of out-door music! Was there ever any torment like that of to ever pursued by the gaffly? Who would pass eternity in company with a blue-bottle? Who would spend a second night with a mosquito beneath his curtains if he could help himself? Oh for a little quiet in London!

The Cortesi Opera Company will open at the Boston Academy of Music on the first of October. The managers promise a succession of attractive entertainments.

Lamartine on the Psalms of David.

The last psalm ends with a chorus to the praise of God, in which the poet calls on all people, all instruments of sacred music, all the elements and all the stars to join. Sublime finale of that opera of sixty years, sung by the shepherd, the hero, the king and the old man! In this closing psalm we see the almost inarticulate enthusiasm of the lyric poet; so rapidly do the words press to his lips, floating upwards towards God, their source, like the smoke of a great fire of the soul, wafted by the tempest! Here we see David, or rather the human heart itself, with all its God-given notes of grief, joy, tears and adoration—poetry sanctified to its highest expression; a vase of perfume broken on the step of the temple and shedding forth its odors from the heart of David to the heart of all humanity! Hebrew, Christian, or even Mahomedan—every religion, every complaint, every prayer has taken from this vase, shed on the heights of Jerusalem, wherewith to give forth their accents. The little shepherd has become the master of the sacred choir of the universe. There is not a worship on earth which prays not with his words or sings not with his voice. A chord of his harp is to be found in all choirs, resounding every where and forever in unison with the echoes of Horeb and Engedi! David is the psalmist of eternity; what a destiny—what a power hath poetry when inspired by God! As for myself, when my spirit is excited, or devotional, or sad, and seeks for an echo to its enthusiasm, its devotion, or its melancholy, I do not open Pindar, or Horace, or Hafiz, those purely academic poets; neither do I find within myself murmurings to express my emotion. I open the Book of Psalms and there I find words which seem to issue from the soul of the ages, and which penetrate even to the heart of all generations. Happy the bard who has thus become the eternal hymn, the personified prayer and complaint of all humanity! If we look back to that remote age when such songs resounded over the world; if we consider that, while the lyric poetry of all the most cultivated nations only sang of wine, love, blood, and the victories of couragers at the games of Elis, we are seized with profound astonishment at the mystic accents of the shepherd prophet, who speaks to God the Creator as one friend to another, who understands and praises his works, admires his justice, implores his mercy, and becomes, as it were, an anticipative echo of the evangelic poetry, speaking the soft words of Christ before his coming. Prophet or not, as he may be considered by Christian or skeptic, none can deny in the poet-king an inspiration granted to no other man. Read Greek or Latin poetry after a psalm, and see how pale it looks!—Lamartine's Cours de Littérature.

THE ORIGINAL OF "FRA DIAVOLO."—The real name of the Neapolitan robber, Fra Diavolo, was Michael Pozzo. He was in early life a stocking maker, and was subsequently a friar. While acting in the latter capacity he joined a band of outlawed banditti in Calabria, and eventually became their leader. In the double character of robber and priest he offered his services to Cardinal Ruffo, who at that time was the head of the party in favor of the Bourbons of Naples, and through the influence of the Cardinal, although a price had been previously set upon his head, he obtained a pardon and a pension of 3,600 ducats, with which he retired from public and "professional" life to a small estate that he had purchased. From this retreat, however, he was soon called by the Bourbons, who on Joseph Napoleon ascending the throne, again availed themselves of his services. In 1806 he made a descent, with a large body of banditti and recruits, at a place called Sperlonga, where he threw open the prisons, and was joined by a great number of the lazzaroni. After a severe action, however, he was taken prisoner and summarily executed—a fate which he is said to have met with the most disdainful indifference. He was, in his way, a kind of Robin Hood, and many romantic tales are told of his chivalry and gallantry.—London Musical World, August 25.

M. E. DELAPORTE.—By a decree dated the 6th of this month, and issued at the suggestion of the Secretary of State, M. E. Delaporte has been named a Knight of the Imperial Order of the Legion of Honor. This high mark of distinction, accorded to the artist who founded the prize contest of the Orpheons in France, and, for twelve years, has consecrated all his energies to the propagation of choral singing, is pregnant with meaning, and will exercise a favorable influence on the future of the above institutions. In decorating M. Delaporte, Government decorates the Orpheonists of France; it renders a striking act of justice to the man and his work, and imposes silence on his detractors. Government is a good judge in matters of honor. While proclaiming the new knight, in the person of M. Delaporte, and saluting the cross thus bestowed on merit, the Orpheonistes of France will proclaim their glorious principle, and salute the triumphant history of their progress. In the acts of peace, as in the field of battle, the decoration of the flag is the glorification of the idea—the advancement of the chief is the exaltation of the army. The banner of the French Orpheons, rendered illustrious by the festivals of Paris and London, and valiantly displayed at the various performances in the provinces, will always be firmly held aloft by the men who have fought under its patriotic mottoes. It will occupy a conspicuous position in all the pacific manifestations of our national spirit.—J. F. Vaudin.—From the Orphéon.

Personal Recollections of Beethoven in 1822.

(From the German of Fr. Rochlitz.)

(Concluded.)

Our third meeting was the most cheerful of all. He came out here to Baden, and this time he was dressed very neatly and carefully, even elegantly. Yet this did not prevent him, during a walk through the Heleneuthal—and that means, in a spot which is frequented by every one, even the emperor and his family, and where the path is so narrow that those who meet have to pass close by each other—from taking off his fine black dress-coat, hanging it over his shoulder by his cane, and going on in shirt-sleeves. He remained from about ten in the morning, till six in the afternoon. The friend whom I have mentioned before, and Gebauer were with him. During this whole time he was exceedingly cheerful, sometimes highly amusing, and everything that came into his mind must come out. ("I am all unbuttoned (aufgeknöpft) to-day," he called it, and significantly enough.) All that he said and did was a chain of originalities, and mostly very strange ones. But from them all shone out a truly childlike good-heartedness, carelessness, friendliness toward all who came near him. Even his scolding tirades—like that against the Viennese of the present day mentioned above—are only explosions of fancy and a momentary excitement. They are blurted out without the least pride, without any bitterness or meanness of spirit, but only lightly, good humoredly, with humorous caprice—and that is the end of it. Indeed, he proves in his life—and only too often and too decisively for his own means of existence—that to the same person who has deeply offended him, and against whom he has spoken most bitterly in one hour, he will, in the next, give his last thaler, if he needs it. As to this is added his most cheerful acknowledgment of the merit—whenever really distinguished—of others (you should hear him speak of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart!) that he will accept no advice about the greater of his works, (and who, indeed, has the right to give it), but truly does not value them too highly—and yields the smaller ones to censure laughingly perhaps, more than any one else—as, besides when he is once put in motion, striking witticisms, humorous ideas, surprising combinations, exciting paradoxes, flow from him incessantly—in view of all this, I can say seriously—he appears even amiable; or if this expression startles you; the dark, rough bear seems so trusty and friendly, growls and shakes himself so innocently, that one cannot help being pleased and liking him, even if he were nothing but such a bear, and had never done more than such an one can. The story of this day, however, or rather the sum of its many short, eccentric stories, I must defer until we meet again, for when could I, the patient, who is forbidden to write, ever furnish them! Yet I must add, that when I had put the good Beethoven into the carriage, and walked up and down that lonely valley alone, I felt serious enough again. This time my reflections did not turn, as after our first meeting upon the heavy burden which Fate has put upon him. I had seen now that he has often cheerful, really happy hours—at other, equally favorable times, he lives in his art, or in plans and dreams regarding it; the bad hours he takes into the bargain, and soon forgets them: who, after all, is better off? My reflections turned in general upon such conditions of man and human things, which arise from peculiar relations (which, in their results, may be the happiest for others) of the powers of man toward each other and towards the world and its concerns. As it always happens with such thoughts—one weighs and weighs—adds here, takes off there; the tongue will not stand still and give the satisfactory decision. I thought of Prometheus; first as pictured by Æschylus and by Goethe—but then also of another, who is not found in fable, never can be found there.

Mercadante.

Translated for this Journal from the French of P. Scudo.

The name of Mercadante has been long known in France. Born in a village of la Pouille in 1798, he pursued his first musical studies in the college of St. Sebastian at Naples. Expelled from this school by the director, Zingarelli, who surprised him one day copying some quatuors of Mozart, for the purpose of putting them into score, which was a great crime for this old master, who remained faithful to the exclusive traditions of the Italian school, Mercadante must seek his fortune at the hands of the public, which in Italy is always favorable to new comers. The conduct of Zingarelli, with regard to the young Mercadante recalls the severity of Cherubini, director of the Conservatoire of Paris, who would not allow the pupils in Counterpoint to study the fugues of Sebastian Bach, whom he treated as a barbaro Tidesco! The first success of Mercadante was obtained at the theatre of Saint Charles in 1818 by an opera, l'Apoteosi d' Ercole, which first rendered him advantageously known to the impressarii. He went through the principal cities of Italy. In Milan, in 1822, Mercadante wrote his last work Elisa e Claudio, which gained him a European reputation. The Neapolitans even endeavored for a time to oppose Mercadante, who belonged to their school, to Rossini, the Romagnol, as they called him. This pleasantry happily was not of long duration. In 1824, Mercadante went to Vienna to direct the mise en scene of Elisa e Claudio; then he went to Spain, first to Madrid, then to Cadiz where he remained till 1830. Mercadante was appointed maître de chapelle of the cathedral of Novara after the death of Generali, in 1833. He came to Paris in 1836 to write the I Briganti, (from Schiller's play,) an opera that was performed on the 22d of March without much success. Mercadante returned to Italy and was nominated director of the Conservatory of Naples after the death of Zingarelli, which occurred May 5, 1837, which important post he still fills and is entirely worthy to occupy. The public knew the name of Mercadante only by the opera of Elisa e Claudio, which was sung at Paris with very great success on the 23d of November, 1823, by Pellegrini, Zucchi, Bordogni and Madame Pasta. In 1841 was given the Vestale, a work which it was difficult to make to succeed in a country that possessed a universally admired chef d'œuvre on the same subject, the Vestale of Spontini, so that the success of Il Giuramento, is after that of Elisa e Claudio, the most decisive that Mercadante has obtained in Paris.

Mercadante has written much, and they cite among those of his buffo operas which have had the greatest success, (next to his chef d'œuvre, Elisa e Claudio), Donna Caritea, composed at Vienna in 1826.

We desire to exaggerate nothing. The career of Mercadante is marked by hesitations and doubts. We see him at first strangely attracted by the eclat of the genius of Rossini, whose manner he imitates in Elisa e Claudio. On the arrival of Bellini and Donizetti, Mercadante modified his manner again and toward the somewhat complex style that is noticed in the score of Il Giuramento, in which a discreet imitation of German masters, such as Haydn, Mozart and Weber, is combined with that penetrating but slightly monotonous sentimentality which prevails in the Italian school since the silence of Rossini. If it is just to say that the examples of the Lucia, Lucrezia Borgia and Anna Bolena of Donizetti, the Norma and Paritani of Bellini, may have contributed to the last change that is noticed in the fine talent of Mercadante, it must be admitted also that it is from the score of Il Giuramento that Verdi has taken the elements of his peculiar style. Mercadante is a master of the art of writing; and is the worthy chief of an illustrious school which needs only follow his counsels to regain the high position from which it has fallen for so many years.

The Sleep.

BY ELIZABETH BARRET BROWNING.

"He giveth his beloved sleep."—PSALMS cxxvii. 2.

Of all the thoughts of God that are Born inward unto souls afar,
Along the Psalmist's music deep,
Now tell me if that any is,
For gift or grace, surpassing this—
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

What would we give to our beloved?
The hero's heart to be unmoved—
The poet's star-tuned heart to sweep—
The senate's shouts to patriot's vows—
The monarch's crown, to light the brows?
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

What do we give to our beloved?
A little faith all undisproved—
A little dust to over weep—
And bitter memories to make
The whole earth blasted for our sake!
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

"Sleep soft, beloved," we sometimes say;
But have no tune to charm away
Sad dreams that through the eyelids creep,
But never doleful dream again Shall break the happy slumbers, when
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

O earth, so full of dreary noises!
O men, with wailing in your voices!
O delfed gold, the wailer's heap!
O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
God makes a silence through you all,
"And giveth his beloved sleep."

His dew drops mutely on the hill;
His cloud above it saileth still,
Though on its slope men toil and reap!
More softly than the dew is shed,
Or cloud is floated over head,
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

Yea! men may wonder while they scan
A living, thinking, feeling man,
In such a rest his heart to keep;
But angels say—and through the word,
I ween their blessed smile is heard—
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

For me, my heart that erst did go,
Most like a tired child at a show,
That sees through tears the jugglers leap,
Would now its wearied vision close;
Would, child-like, on his love repose,
"Who giveth his beloved sleep."

And friends! dear friends! when it shall be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep,
Let one most loving of you all Say, "not a tear must o'er her fall!"
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 15, 1860.

Died, in this city, Sept. 6, MARY B., wife of JOHN S. DWIGHT, aged 87.

No words can add anything to this simple announcement that can in any way quicken the sympathy of many friends for him whose heart and home are made desolate by this sad event.

It is but three weeks since we announced to the readers of this Journal, Mr. Dwight's departure to Europe for an extended visit of some months, and but a few days had passed after he had left us, before she from whom he had parted in fullest health was attacked by the disease which, after some weeks' duration, suddenly took her away. Not severe in its nature, or in any way alarming in any part of its course, the unexpected and fatal termination, came, even to those nearest to her with the shock of a sudden surprise, as the tidings must soon come with a like shock to him.

The announcement of her death will bring sorrow to many hearts and tears to many eyes; for to a large circle of friends she had ever been an object of especial admiration and attraction from the many rare graces of nature, of culture and of person that were harmoniously blended in her. A genial, happy and spontaneous disposition made these qualities of mind and heart the delight of all who knew her. To her friends the loss is irreparable, and very many who knew her not will miss her beautiful and sunny presence from the occasions at which they have long observed her attendance, wherever Music or Art called their worshippers. Of the loss to those who stood in nearer and dearer relations to her we may not speak. A beautiful and very happy life has been fitly ended, though, as it seems to us, only too soon.

The services with which she was given to her rest were of a singular solemnity and beauty. She had desired, it was said, (though not, we believe, in any anticipation of the near approach of Death), that there should be no gloom at that time, but that there should be music and flowers around her. So there were manly words of Christian consolation and of prayer; there were flowers, the sweetest; there was music, the most solemn, of Bach and Mendelssohn, sung with wonderful beauty by the voices of friends with which her's had often mingled; and there were the friends of many years gathered around her, as she lay ready to depart. At the grave in the pleasant shades of Mt. Auburn, no words were uttered, but, as we stood around it, loving hands dropped flowers upon her dust as she passed away from our sight forever.

Editorial Correspondence.

III.

PARIS, August 6, 1860.

The annual concours at the Conservatoire of Music has occupied the last three weeks of July. The competition for prizes in composition, in harmony and counterpoint, in singing, in playing the pianoforte, the organ, the violin and every kind of instrument, stringed, wood or brass, and above all in operatic singing, both of the Grand Opera and of the Opera Comique kind, has cost much excitement and anxiety among the pupils, and much patience and hard work among the judges. There was not much to tempt a stranger in the most of these trials of musical skill; and some of them were held with closed doors. It is not the love of music that could prompt one to wish to hear the same piece by Herz, or by De Beriot, played through some twenty times by as many different competitors. The remarkable thing in the violin competition was, that the first prize was carried off, against many formidable competitors of both sexes, by a young girl of thirteen, who in the opinion of some of the judges, gives signs of all the natural talent of the sisters Milanello. One of the two second prizes, too, was won by a young lady. The whole list of prizes fills four columns in the Moniteur.

I witnessed for one hour the competition in Grand Opera. Entering the broad courtyard of the Conservatoire, at every door of which, as at all public entrances, a soldier stood on guard, the ear was at once saluted by a babel of loud sounds from cornets, trombones, clarinets, &c., from earnest students in the different wings. It reminded one of the description in "Charles Auchester" of his ideal musical nursery and bee-hive somewhere in Germany. Finding the entrance to the Salle or Theatre, I sought in vain for seat or standing place save in the highest corridors, outside, where one could only hear, not see. The hearing of a succession of well-worn arias and trios from La Favorite, Il Trovatore, and the like, sung by strangers of whom you could not even learn the names, was not so much the point of curiosity; to see the place, the people and the way they manage things, was much more to our purpose. Wearied with the perpetual response of il n'y a pas de place (not a single seat) from the ancient goddesses who sat and watched at every entrance, I lingered awhile in the corridor surrounding the first tier of boxes, when spying a door ajar, I silently pulled it open, and stepping in behind its occupants, commanded a full view of the handsome little theatre. It was a lively scene; parterre and circles were densely packed with the beauty and the fashion of la belle France. On the stage, in costume, sang a succession of debutants, mostly in well-known trios for soprano, tenor, and bass or baritone. We noticed two or three remarkably fine voices, while the method, vocalization and expression of the most spoke quite well for their training and their own ambition, and the dramatic action seldom lacked abandon or correct conception. A pianoforte was the only accompaniment. Opposite the stage sat the judges, some eight or ten in number; and a goodly collection it was of fine-looking, intellectual heads. Among them you saw Auber, (now director in chief of the Conservatoire), Halevy, Ambroise Thomas, Panzeron, and younger magnates of the monde musicale of Paris. But the vivacious aspect of the audience, the eager interest, the intense enthusiasm, the murmurs of delight when a good point was made, the insatiable rounds of applause after each happy debut—that was indeed a sight to see, and feel too, for the moment. It was thoroughly French. And their were anxious faces, also; we met them in the corridors, as blushing and excited maidens, whose turns were just come or just past, came rushing round to seek the comfort or congratulation of their friends.

Certainly the imperial Conservatoire is the centre of a vast amount of educational activity in music. Of its real benefit to music as an Art, it would not do to judge from such mere outside glimpses as we had at it. The same little theatre is also the scene of the famous orchestral concerts of the Conservatoire; of course, with less than a thousand seats, access to these is somewhat difficult. They are only in the winter; and we hope in due time to hear one when we shall be able to compare it with those of the Gewandhaus at Leipzig.

Before leaving the subject of the Conservatoire let me mention a little book of some importance to the history of music, which has recently appeared here: "L'Histoire de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, par M. Elwart." A few extracts will interest our lovers of classical music.

"On St. Cecilia's day, in the year 1826, Habeneck the celebrated orchestra leader, had assembled at his house some twenty of his friends. They were mostly musicians, and, in compliance with the request of their Amphitryon, had brought their instruments. The pretext of the invitation was a breakfast; but its real object was the execution of the Heroic Symphony of Beethoven, then as much unknown in Paris as its illustrious author was ill appreciated.

"At the first hearing, the performers (among whom were Vogt, Brod, and MM. Tulou, Tilmant, &c.) manifested their astonishment; they repeated the thing several times, and at the end their enthusiasm was unanimous.

"Habeneck had formed a whole orchestra of adepts and was able from that time to undertake to reveal Beethoven and his gigantic work in France.

"M. de Larochefoucauld, then minister of the king, authorized, by a decree of Feb. 15, 1828, the foundation of the Concerts of the Conservatoire.

"The concerts were, as a rule, to be six each year, and M. de Larochefoucauld gave the society a grant (allocation) of 2,000 francs by way of encouragement.

"The hall of the Conservatoire was designated as the fittest place for the concerts. This hall contain 956 places, including those in the coulis. Chaptal laid its first stone on the 14th of August, 1801, and it was finished in 1806 by the architect Delannois.

"Here are the prices from the time of the foundation, compared with the tariff now in force:

The programmes of all the concerts of the society occupy a large place in M. Elwart's work. By a comparison of his figures we may measure the degree of favor which certain composers and certain works have enjoyed in Paris:

BEETHOVEN has figured on the programme 402 times.
(Heroic Symphony, 25 times. Pastoral Symphony 51 times, Symphony in A major, 52 times. Symphony in C minor, 53 times. Overture to Fidelio, 7 times. Fragments of "Christ at the Mount of Olives," 23 times, &c.)

HAYDN..... 142 times.
(Symphonies, 58 performances. The "Creation," twice. "Seasons," twice. Quartets, 27 times. Religious pieces, 26 times, &c.)

Rich in the aggregate; yet the proportions are somewhat peculiar; and the selection does not show an appreciation so many-sided as we have right to look for in the famed Conservatoire of Paris. The list of our own little Boston, for the same period, is richer; for we have had, what the Parisians have yet to come, the symphonies of Schumann; we have had more of Schubert; more of Mendelssohn, much more of Handel.

My experience of music in the churches of Paris, during the summer fortnight, was not profitable. Such as I heard was not so good as that at Rouen. Mass at the Madeleine one morning was mere empty expectation. A tedious length of barren ceremonial, with loud parading round of most portentous looking beadle (Swiss), the herald of repeated onslaughts on the purse; at length, out of much muttering and murmuring, with crossing and with genuflexion, and bell-ringing tinkling, is born something like a tone, a deep, rough, sacerdotal bass tone, which prolongs itself into a vast feat of monotony, exciting hope of music, and presently is echoed in shrill counter, chanting an incredible length of sentences still on one note; and then beginneth the side organ, and a priestly choir of basses, supported by the basest of bass ophicleids, and for what seems the space of half an hour repeats a sing-song unison, a period forever re-begun but never finished, upon verse after verse of text; monotony more dull and dreary than to be out in the middle of the dull grey ocean under a leaden sky. At last came harmony; the pleasant sounds of boy soprano and of tenors, with some movement and some interweaving on the organ, united in the Kyrie and Gloria, and other movements of a Mass. A mass somewhat in the Haydn style, not strikingly beautiful or expressive, but a great relief on such a background of monotony, such as cost Haydn only a few bars in his elaborate tone-sketch of Chaos. During the Crucifixus portion, the great organ over the entrance gave some specimens of skilful sentimental execution, but savoring more of the Italian opera than of pious Bach or Handel. The singing of the movements of the mass was more than respectable; but even this relief was blurred by the exceeding reverberation of the place. Nor did the architectural perfection thereof assist the mind. The Madeleine is a most satisfying and pure reproduction of the Greek temple style externally. The interior is also very beautiful, and very richly and elaborately Grecian, but by no means religious in its invitation. Its whole effect is to depress, and not to lift the mind. How different from that heartfelt, upward-soaring of the sublime Gothic of the church of St. Ouen at Rouen! There the breath of music quickened its own form in the clustered shafts and springing arches, and aspiration was the sense of all that spoke to eye or ear. D.

CARL ZERRAHN.—We take pleasure in calling the attention of those of our readers in need of such instruction to Mr. Zerrahn's advertisement in another column. This sort of instruction is of great value to advanced pianists—to cultivate the habit of playing in concert with others. Mr. Z. is one of the best flutists we have ever heard here, a well educated musician, an accomplished teacher and a gentleman, whom we are glad to recommend if recommendation indeed be necessary in Boston or its vicinity.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association opened their exhibition at Faneuil Hall on Wednesday. The rooms are well filled with many objects of interest. The manufacturers of musical instruments of all sorts contribute largely and well. We shall have occasion to notice this feature, more at length at some future time.

At the Museum, Bourcicault's new play, The Colleen Bawn, draws full houses, and will be played for some time longer.

THE DRAYTONS began a new series of their entertainments at the Melodeon on Monday of this week. On Tuesday the performances were interrupted by an injunction served upon Mr. Drayton by the proprietors of the Academy of Music. The latter owned the Melodeon property, and upon disposing of to Hon. Charles Francis Adams, they secured an obligation that the place should not be used for "dramatic, operatic, or theatrical entertainments" (we are not sure of the exact language) for a term of ten years. Considering that the representation of the "Lyric Proverbs" of Mr. and Mrs. Henri Drayton constituted an infringement of the contract, an injunction was served yesterday. Mr. Ordway, the lessee, did not receive his notification until 6 P. M., however, and Mr. Adams having gone to Quincy, it was impossible to raise the injunction temporarily until the morrow, and a suspension of the evening's performance was of course unavoidable. A large and fashionable audience assembled, as usual—no tickets were sold, those visiting the hall being informed at the outset of the affair, and those who stayed remaining entirely out of curiosity to witness the "developments,"—and after a fine overture from the orchestra, Mr. Drayton appeared upon the floor and stated, in a pleasant humorous way why he was prevented from taking his usual place upon the stage above. He read the injunction—he expressed his regrets, &c.—he assured them (his patrons) that the legal incubus under which Mrs. Drayton and himself were now so unexpectedly suffering would be raised in season to permit of a resuscitation of their entertainments on this (Wednesday) evening. The incident reminded him of a story told him in his youth. A boy asked his mamma what the big fishes eat when they were hungry. The maternal parent replied that they breakfasted, dined and supped upon the little members of the finny tribe. Now the Academy of Music appeared to him (Drayton) to be a big fish, and his esteemed wife and himself to be little fishes. Whether the aforesaid "Academy" would be troubled with indigestion in consequence of its feast, or not, he did not pretend to predict; neither would he say that the lawyers were likely to be the biggest fishes of all in this case. He thanked those present for their kind attendance, and retired amid applause which seemed to express sympathy. The result of all this will undoubtedly be a greater rush than ever for "Drayton tickets."—Boston Post.

At the hearing upon a motion to dissolve the injunction, after hearing the evidence of Mr. Drayton, BROW, C. J. decided that the entertainment was a theatrical one, and as such within the terms of the contract, and therefore the motion was not allowed.

We are indebted to the Boston Musical Times for the following account of what we are to expect of the Opera season:

The Cortesi Opera troupe will commence a season of two weeks at the Boston Theatre, on or about the first of October. We think it possible that Mr. Servadio makes a mistake to come so early in the season—before people have become wearied with their own homes, after a return from the watering places—but, nevertheless, we always joyfully announce promises of good musical entertainments. The feature of the season to which we allude will be the American debut of Signor Amodio frère, for which Bostonians may feel grateful, since no efforts have been spared by the Directors of the New York Academy of Music to induce Servadio to announce the debut in that city. His voice is said to be deeper and fuller than that of the fat baritone, whose organ has challenged universal admiration since his first coming among us. Amodio frère has already arrived in New York.

An arrangement has also been made, by which it is probable that Signor Brignoli will sing here with this troupe. Stigelli, Muviani, Cortesi, Adelaide Phillippe, and other favorites are also promised. It is the intention of the management to produce "Medea," the great work of Pacini, for which the chorus have already commenced preparations. A new prima donna and contralto have been engaged in Europe, by Signor Servadio, for the present year, whose debut will be made in Boston; but whether in this first season or later, we are not informed.

The fidelity of the management of this troupe to their promises, is well known by pleasant experience; and their claims upon the patronage of the public cannot be disputed. Musically, we have no doubt of the brilliancy of the approaching season; pecuniarily, we hope for the best.

THE CENSUS AND THE ORGAN GRINDERS.—The figures elected give some curious information. It appears that a community of organ grinders dwell in a low court diverging from Seventh street. They comprise more than forty individuals, male and female. Nearly thirty hand-organs belong to the property, and fourteen Barbary monkeys are nightly denizens.

Some of these organ grinders—and they are all Italians—are not the poverty-stricken characters they appear to be; for they foot up a considerable amount of personal property.

There were several children connected with this nomadic tribe; some of the larger boys constitute the boot blacks who infest the hotels upon Chestnut streets.

There are many bright-eyed fellows, with all the passion and playfulness of the modern Roman, reminding us much of the impulsive Donatello, in the Romance of Monte Beni. It was of old a custom with these Italian women to hire out their babes for begging purposes, that the charities of the benevolent might be elicited. Mayor Conrad's police put an end to that nefarious trade. Some of the females with whom the Marshal conversed exhibited traces of yet lingering beauty. They are all dark-eyed and sun-bronzed. In their quarters were all kinds of hurdy-gurdies, harps, flageolets and tamborines. They go regularly out at the dawn and on moonlight nights haunt the broader avenues until late hours.

The bright-eyed girls collect the pennies which are dropped reluctantly into the tamborine. Most of the singing misses, who have of late made wretched vocalization of popular ballads, belong to this party.

The Italians answered the Marshal's interrogation without evasion and displayed much good humor.

At home they would constitute a part of the miserable lazzaroni; here they are generally regarded as vagabonds; but if our streets were altogether destitute of their rude music, we might look back with regret to the period of their departure. They are unobtrusive personages; and it may be that in many of them exists that untutored love of song which burned in the bosom of the nomadic blind bard of Greece.—Phil. Bulletin.

CHRIST CHURCH CHIME, INDIANAPOLIS.—The chime of bells for Christ Church has arrived. The bells are nine in number, and are from the manufactory of Menecey's Sons, Troy, New York.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Théâtre Lyrique is preparing to commence its next campaign on the 1st of September. Several novelties are in hand. In the first place, there is Crispin Rival de son maître, a comedy of Lesage, which has been sliced into two acts, by M. Henri Berthoud, and wedded to music by M. Sellenick. Two comic operas in one act are also ready, viz.: Une bonne Nuit, composed by M. Aristide Hignard, and Asturoth, the music whereof is by M. Debillemont. Besides these are to follow two grand works, one by MM. Scribe and Clapisson, the other by MM. Cormon and Aimé Maillart before mentioned. Mad. Viardot remains a member of the company at a salary of 3000 francs per month (£120). She will appear again in Orphée, and it is intended to get up another opera of Gluck's for her, either Alceste or Iphigénie.

Besides the fortunate author and composer whom I have just mentioned as having received the decoration of the Legion of Honour, a complete batch of literary and musical celebrities (more or less) has been enrolled in that swiftest of mobs. In this motley list M. Reviel, professor of singing at the Conservatoire, and M. Martin, secretary of the Imperial Opera, and M. Delaporte, the luckless Garibaldi of the Orpheonist invasion, figure cheek by jowl with Léon Laya, the distinguished author of Duc Job, and with Gevaert, the very clever (Belgian) composer of Quentin Durward and the Billet de Marguerite. M. Paul de Saint Victor shines also as an homme de lettres in this, for the most part, ragged regiment, with which Falstaff would most certainly have refused to march through Coventry, and which in the present state of the French press, although "food for powder," have no chance of being, as they deserve to be, "well peppered."

To pass to another distribution of honors, the Conservatorium of Music in Vienna has just awarded its annual prizes. The number of pupils who studied in this institution during the year was 336. Of these twenty-one obtained prizes, seventy-two were honorably mentioned, and seven had silver medals allotted to them. With so large a number of competitors it may be imagined that the struggle for distinction was proportionally arduous. Connected with the same subject of well-earned distinctions is the presentation, by the Lieder-Tafel of Mayence, of a diploma of honorary membership to Stockhausen the baritone.

My correspondent at Baden informs me that Hector Berlioz is busy preparing his festival performances which constitute the next exciting occasion to which the mob of pleasure-seekers there are eagerly looking. I have just received also a programme of a concert lately given at the Kursaal, at Hamburg, for the benefit of the local charities. Vieuxtemps, who possesses a chateau villa near this gamblers' paradise, was among the artists, as was also M. A. Jacell, the pianist, and Mad. Cambardi, who sang the cavatins from Norma and the Travatore.

I told you of a new opera which had been sent in to the Opéra Comique by MM. Roqueplan and Sardon, under the title of La Villa Médicis, concerning which it was rumored that M. Roqueplan's name stood for that of an actress of the Théâtre Français. M. Battu, the father of the late Léon Battu, now comes forward to claim as his son's, if not the piece itself, the title, which, he says, was that of an opera offered by Léon Battu to M. Roqueplan when he was director of the Opéra Comique. M. Battu admits that the MS. of his son's work was duly returned to him, but merely calls on the ex-manager not to use his son's title to avoid all suspicion of plagiarism. If it be a mere question of using a title, which has nothing very remarkable or original about it, there was scarcely any ground for this paternal interference. If, however, there has been unfair play, it is another matter altogether, and in that case we shall hear more about it.—London Musical World, August 25.

RETIREMENT OF DAVID.—I am not sure that the announcement of David's retirement from public life will occasion any very intense excitement in New Orleans, particularly toward the end of August, when this letter may be reasonably expected to reach the Crescent City, and will doubtless find it still under the influence of the "heated term." Would you take the trouble to inquire who the deuce David may be, and from what the dickens sort of public life he contemplates withdrawing? Such a question argues a deplorable degree of innocence for which "we" were not prepared to reproach "our" whilom colony on the banks of the Mississippi. Well, then, David is not the eminent painter of that name, resuscitated for no other purpose than to furnish "Touchstone" a paragraph, at a moment when paragraphs are scarce. This David is another David, and a mighty potentate, to boot. He is no other than the reigning "Emperor of the Romans," which is the designation applied in Parisian literary and artistic circles, to the claqué of the French Opera and the chief of that national institution. All the Paris theatres have a claqué, except the Italian Opera, which is not a French theatre. It is the business of the claqué to "do" the applause; and you can, consequently, understand the importance of that body. In a theatre, applause is everything. It encourages the actors and makes a bad play go down the public throat with surprising ease, particularly when that public is mostly composed, as is always the case here, of strangers, who do not, for the most part, know anything about the claqué, and imagine that, as a large body of the audience is strongly approving of the "Sanguinary Cordwainer," why, the "Sanguinary Cordwainer" must be a clever thing, despite appearances to the contrary. An attempt was made some years ago to suppress the claqué, which is, really, an intolerable nuisance. All the theaters, from the Opera down to the Funambules, agreed to exclude the "Romans of the parterre," from that moment forward. The reform lasted two days. At the end of that time, the actors, who had been playing to audiences as undemonstrative and immovable as tombstones, declared that they would burn their maillots and go into the lobster trade, if the claqué were not restored. It was restored, and has since reigned triumphant. Of course, that of the Opera stands first, as the most numerous, the best organized, and "attached" to the principal government establishment. Of this claqué David has been, for many years, the commander-in-chief, and so far a place has he managed to make it, that, what with the douceurs of composers, ballet masters, librettists, singers, dancers, and all the long list of people eager for public "encouragement and approbation," he has succeeded in accumulating a fortune, estimated at over a hundred thousand dollars, and now you can understand why David thinks of retiring from the parterre, to enjoy the sweets of repose, and perhaps look down upon his former subjects, from a private box, next the Emperor's!—New Orleans Picayune.

LEIPZIG.—A monster concert has just been given in honor of the well-known song-composer, Carl Zöllner. It was got up by all the Männergesangvereine, comprising 500 members. It was highly successful, and the attendance very numerous. The Hymn for a chorus of male voices (words by Herr Müller von der Werra, composed by Ernest H., Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha) was enthusiastically encored. It is intended to purchase, with the proceeds of the concert, a present, long since deserved, for Zöllner who is now absent from here.—Ibid.

FRANKFURT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The starring engagement of the tenor, Herr Niemann, who sang in Tannhäuser, the Prophète, and the part of Max in Der Freischütz; the performances of the Italian Operatic Company, under Herr Merelli; and, lastly, the admirable pianoforte playing of Herr Aloys Schmitt, Capellmeister at the Court of Mecklenburg, infused into our town an amount of musical life, which even the fine summer-weather was incapable of interrupting.—Ibid.

STOCKHOLM.—Mad. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt arrived here on the 17th of June, by the steamer Svea, with her husband and two children. It is her intention to spend the summer at a villa in the environs. A large number of her admirers gave her a most enthusiastic welcome.—Ibid.

Mad. Viardot is about to turn her genius, experience, and science to account by assisting to edit a selection of the best classical vocal music of the Italian, German, and French schools, with directions as to style, accentuations, coloring, &c.—Ibid.

CLEVELAND, (O.)—Flotow's opera of Alessandro Stradella has been performed here recently, by the Cleveland Gesangverein. The opera has been presented there before by the same Society, but never in so excellent a manner. The chorus numbered about fifty performers, who were perfect in time and tune. The leading characters, both in singing and action, left nothing to be desired. Miss Bimeler, as Leonore, in appearance, acting and singing, was all that could be wished. Abel, as Stradella, was admirable. The two Langsdorffs and Quedenfeld were excellent in both singing and acting.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Dearer and nearer. Ballad. C. W. Glover. 25

A very pleasing sentimental ballad.

My love for thee. Song. Geo. Barker. 25

A beautiful melody which will impress itself easily upon musical ears. There is something quite charming about these plaintive notes which the composer of "I'm leaving thee in sorrow, Annie" knows so well how to sound.

It is the hour for music. Duettino. H. Furmer. 35

For two Ladies' voices. Light and pretty, and not at all difficult.

Mother dear. Solo and Chorus. J. Falkenstein. 25

A capital new Minstrel Song, the solo very effective for a high tenor voice.

O the merry May. Song. A. Mattacks. 25

Never mind. A. Nish. 26

Clever songs, which will prove entertaining.

Annie Lisle. With guitar accompaniment.

Thompson. 25

Thompson's—of Lilly Dale celebrity—latest popular Song, with an easy guitar part by Dorn.

Instrumental Music.

Linda di Chamouni. Easy Potpourri. F. Nava. 35

Will prove vastly agreeable to young players. It forms one of the set of "Operatic Favorites."

Chimes Polka. Henry Furmer. 15

Four in hand Galop. " 15

Olga Waltz. " 15

The first number of a set got up expressly for the little folks, and called a "Juvenile Library of Dance Music." Young pianists will be delighted to get such charming pieces for lessons.

Zouave Polka. Harley Newcomb. 25

Pleasing and not difficult.

La Juive. Bouquet of melodies. Beyer. 50

To those who wish to recall the striking and grand melodies of this masterwork of Halévy's, performed last winter in New York with Fabbri and Stigelli, this arrangement will prove a treasure. Those to whom the opera is unknown will derive from it a vivid idea of its beauties.

Mountain Dews. Nocturne. Handel Pond. 25

A graceful composition,

Books.

THE CLASSIC GLEE BOOK. A collection of standard Glee, Madrigals, &c., from the works of Calcott, Horsley, Webbe, Stafford, Smith, Attwood, Danby, and other celebrated composers, ancient and modern. 50

This compilation has been made from the works of the most eminent composers. The music has not suffered from the mutilating spirit of this progressive age, when every novice recognizes in himself the embodiment of all musical art, and undertakes to polish sunbeams and paint lilies. In this collection it is pure, unaltered, and such as its composer intended it should be; and will doubtless be duly appreciated by admirers of the genial, hearty melodies of Old England.

Nearness of "The Departed."

By JOHN S. ADAMS.

The sea of life sends forth tumultuous waves:
And suddenly, beneath the trees, we count
Another sacred spot among the graves:

Another from the friendly circle gone,
One hand the less to greet us with its grasp,
And we, like Rachel, comfortless do mourn.

Soon, in the twilight, as night-blooming flowers
Begin to shed their perfume, close we feel
The beating of another heart than ours:

And with our finer sense another Mind
Flood waves of thought ecstatic o'er our own,
As though within our very soul entwined.

And as we con these inner lessons o'er,
We learn that those we call "departed" hold
A nearness to ourselves unknown before.

And then we muse, and question where is heaven
Whose golden streets our best beloved walk,
And unto which our purest thoughts are given.

On distant stars we fix our longing gaze,
Our aspirations wing to farthest goals,
Striving to find the land of love and praise.

In vain our thoughts far mystic realms explore,
Where'er our heart is, there to us, is heaven,
And all our treasures lie upon its shore.

Pianoforte Instruction to be Solid.

A WORD "TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN."

It is not unfrequently happens that parents, from a desire of seeing their children advance in piano playing, as rapidly as possible, ask the teacher not to be too profound, too thorough, in his teaching. In their imperfect knowledge of the matter they believe that the more hurriedly, or superficially the pupil is instructed, the sooner he or she will have overcome the difficulties of our art and be a fine player. It is true that instruction may be given slower or faster; that is, with loss of time or with the saving of it. An intelligent, experienced and energetic teacher, by dint of his brief and clear method, may teach in half an hour more than another, able though he be, in double the time. The former will avoid anything not tending directly to his object, while the latter may dwell on points that have little to do with it; or it may be (a mistake frequently made) that he labors to impart knowledge, which to his pupil is of no value, because too premature. "Go straight on!" These words the teacher should not forget a moment while he is teaching; but in that, which should be taught, let him by all means be as thorough as possible, for so much the surer and quicker will be the pupil's progress. It is an old saying that a little learned well is a hundred times better than a great deal learned badly. How much is this the case in music, this subtle compound, if I may say so, of euphony and expression; ere the slightest too-much or too-little causes the balance to be disturbed and gives a blow to the ear or the taste! Therefore, the teacher should persist, from the beginning, in making his pupil do everything as perfectly as possible; but should remember that many things require time to ripen, and that by force and impetuosity nothing is to be gained. The necessary qualities for a good player are a fine touch, power of execution, strict time, correct phrasing, and finally, to crown all, expression. But all this is based on profound and patient instruction, while the pupil should cheerfully follow the teacher's directions and conscientiously perform the tasks assigned for private practice. A hurried course, on the contrary, will only tend to multiply that sort of pianists who play, not to the enjoyment, but to the torment of sensible listeners. If I now say that years of careful study are required to play finely, and that even then few can gain the pinnacle, it must deter no one from learning this beautiful art, who has a taste for it and means to be industrious. It is not necessary to glory in the conquest of difficulties; an easy piece delivered well gives the same satisfaction as a difficult one, provided it is a good composition; not to mention that the difficulties of a piece should disappear beneath the ease and grace of the performance and not be shown by effort or struggle. We may consider it a sign of the divine origin of music that whatever its utterance be, single or complicate, it is ever pleasing. And so the instruction, likewise, affords pleasure in every stage, if only what is to be learned is learned thoroughly. Besides, it should be remembered that music as taught on the pianoforte is a most efficient mental discipline, not merely because it cultivates the ear and ennobles the mind, suppressing the more savage impulses in our nature and calling forth the gentler, sweeter ones; but it also develops many other faculties, the cultivation of which is included in common education. The memory, for instance; the power of concentrating all our thoughts on one point, which is about equal to presence of mind; also, the arithmetical sense, and the sense of order, as it may be called, by which the manifold rhythmical figures of a measure are to be dissolved into the original beats or counts underlying the measure,—these and others are continually kept in exercise. A player, instructed by a good teacher, may be prevented from ever touching the instrument again, and yet have no cause to regret the time and labor bestowed on it; how many of us remember the lessons we were obliged to learn at school; but shall we say that our labor was spent in vain?

The teachers should let no opportunity escape of enlightening their friends on these points; it will be for their own advantage no less than that of the public in general. Cases are still frequent where persons commence taking lessons with the expectation of being perfect players in a few quarters. Possessed of common sense, as many are, if they are told the truth they will cheerfully relinquish such vain hopes for the improvement and satisfaction to be derived from a proper course, a course at once thorough and pleasant. To flatter prejudice in this respect is dangerous to art and artists. If you make the public believe that to play the piano well is as easily acquired as the art of grinding a barrel-organ, they are likely to consider your profession on the same scale with that of the "wearers of the velvet breeches," and may come to think your art not worth their money. Therefore, give them pure wine, and be assured we shall fare better by it; at least they will demand no longer of us to produce players as fast as if they were turned out by steam. Yours, &c., BENDA.

Scudo on Wagner.

In the April number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, is a long article by Scudo on Richard Wagner and his music, in which the "music of the future" is criticised severely. The opinions expressed are so thoughtfully elucidated, and come from a man so generally acknowledged to be clear-headed and of long experience, that we translate a portion of them for the perusal of those who are interested in the welfare of musical schools. The great length of the article precludes our publishing it entire.

"M. Wagner pretends to bring dramatic music back to the absolute truth of nature; to cause it to express, not only the profound sentiments and dominant passions of the personages who appear in the drama selected by the author, but he wishes even to reproduce, by the means which are peculiar to the language of sound, by the hundred colorings of the orchestra, and the infinite combinations of harmony, the moral physiognomy of the fable, as well as the different phases of action; without forgetting the accidents of light and landscape, which indicate the hour, the epoch, and the space where the event takes place. He wishes, in a word, to transform the opera of the past, which is merely the fictitious frame around a common event quite conventional, to suppress those arias, those duets, those concerted pieces rendered arbitrarily distinct by the rhetoric of the piece, and forming so many isolated pictures in the general picture, whose truthfulness they impair; he wishes to transform all those worn-out combinations into a living grand drama, where the music accompanies the action, characterizes the personages by invariable traits, expresses the passions which excite them, and follows imperturbably the course of the poetry, as Dante follows Virgil in the city of tears, without preoccupying himself with anything else than the logical truth, which ought to be the supreme law of the dramatic composer. Such, in a few words, and disengaged from germanic pathos, is the theory of M. Wagner, which is no other than the old theory of Gluck, of Gretry, which was that of Lessing, of Diderot, and of all the naturalists. Under the first empire this theory was particularly advanced in France by Lesueur, a celebrated composer, the author of La Caverne and the Bardes.

"As to the theories and principles put forth by the creative artist, we are well agreed, and willingly accord all the liberty of action asked of us. We agree on this with M. Wagner: criticism has not the right to impose its arbitrary and absolute law upon the genius which desires to give utterance to its inner life; it cannot oppose its rigid precepts to the indefinite liberty of individual inspiration. Let the artist move then, in his strength and independence,—let him sing, let him paint nature as he sees it, let him evoke, as he conceives it, that ideal which presses upon his soul or smiles upon his imagination; we wish that he should be entirely free to reveal himself as he feels himself, and let the earth and the heaven be open to him. There is, however, a limit to this indefinable liberty of genius. There is a point, beyond which criticism may say to the individual inspiration of the artist, as the God of the Bible has said to the sea, 'Ne plus ultra!' This fatal limit, which the artist cannot pass without falling, like Icarus, into the void of space, is the law of the human mind itself—the form in which all genius must mould its creations. I leave you free to say all that you wish, to write, to compose, or paint the most comprehensive poems, provided that you use a language accessible to me, and that you make use of a form that definitely expresses your idea. If a being superior to human nature wished to communicate with mortals he would be forced to submit to the limits of our intelligence; for God himself is known to us only by the world which he has created, and which reveals to us his omnipotence.

"It results from this that a work of art is always composed of two elements, the inspiration of genius, and the form which it takes partly from tradition; that is to say, of liberty and a necessary order imposed upon it by human intelligence. Form in art is the work of all and belongs to no particular genius exclusively. It is not Malherbe, Boileau, Corneille, Racine, Pascal, who have created the French language;—it is the genius of the nation, throughout twelve ages of history. Dante did not call forth the Italian language from chaos, as some say sometimes in the excess of admiration, but he impressed upon it the seal of his soul, and elevated it to the level of his intelligence. Did Michael Angelo alone invent sculpture and statuary? Did not Raphael purify, with his divine pencil, the hieratic types transmitted by the tradition of the Byzantine school? The symphony, that great noble poem of instrumental music, emerged from the sonata, whose different parts became the divisions of the symphonies of Haydn, who first gave to this already existing form a regular beauty. Mozart scarce changes the internal economy of Haydn's symphony, but he pours therein the treasures of his living soul, the tears and enchanting smiles of his melodic genius. Beethoven enlarges all the parts of this symphonic poem, multiplies the episodes, fills them with a new and noble life, which sometimes outstrips the measure. The same remarks are applicable to opera, which, from Monteverde to Gluck, from Gluck to Mozart, from Mozart to Rossini, is continually changing on a persistent basis, which is the work of time and of the human mind. It is thus that the variety of geniuses harmonize upon a common foundation of idea, and that the liberty of individual inspiration adapts itself to a necessary order, without which art cannot exist.

"The object of art," says M. Cousin, in his work, Du Vrai, du Beau, et du Bien, 'is the expression of moral beauty, by the aid of physical beauty.' Mozart, whose supreme taste was worthy of his genius, has expressed the same thought in the following manner: 'Music should always be music, even in the most horrible dramatic situations.' It is a profound truth, recognized by the masters of every age and country. Music is, with sculpture, perhaps, that one of all the arts where beauty of form is most necessary to the intelligence of moral beauty. Composed of three elements, melody, rhythm, and harmony, music cannot dispense with elegance and beauty to produce its greatest effects. The melody traversed by the rhythm, which gives it character, is the primordial and essential element, without which music cannot exist. Harmony is only the completion of the melody, and is that part of music which does not contain in itself its own solution. Music has existed for ages without harmony, and there live yet on the globe millions of men who know nothing of it. Harmony cannot live a day without a melodic idea to support it, and which explains its meaning. As soon as harmony forms itself in regular successions, it disengages from the mass of its chords a melodic line, more or less defined, as an electric flash separates itself from the action of the pile. Harmony, a modern element in the musical art, is the coloring of the idea, which is and can only be, the melody. The verbiage of rhetoricians and sophists cannot destroy the nature of things.

"Whatever be your thought, the profundity of your genius, the vast conception you desire to manifest, you cannot reach my soul, move it, penetrate it with the breath of your inspiration, except through the medium of my senses, which are the first judges of the art. It is in vain for you to invent foolish theories, and disclaim everything which is not up to the level of your pretended spiritual aberrations. Man perceives the truth only through his senses, which are the doors through which his inner nature is reached; and the senses do not readily admit the truth unless it be dressed in beauty, and in a form which delights. I know that this is an old heathen doctrine, at which modern reformers smile and pretend to address themselves to the spirit; but this doctrine, old as man, will endure as long as he."

After thus examining the theory of the "music of the future," M. Scudo goes on to criticize in detail some of his compositions; and we shall select portions to translate in another number of our journal. CAROLUS.

The N. Y. Albion on the Academy of Music.

Come now, Messieurs, the Directors of the Academy of Music, let us reason together. In the very dog-days of the summer, so suddenly vanished, when we were less able than we should have been at any other time to bear the infliction, you saw fit to pile upon us a mighty advertisement setting forth what you were to do in the operatic campaign of the Fall. You irritated us by flaunting in our faces a gaudy banner inscribed with bombastic words of promise. You dragged into your placard poor old Æschylus and Euripides; you hopelessly involved yourselves in a discourse upon the Greek tragedies, and when you found yourselves beyond your depth—you lost bottom very soon, I notice—you awkwardly enough paddled off upon the fashionable tailor, milliner, hairdresser, and furnisher, declaring that the high mission of the opera is to stimulate the trade in gloves and Eau de Cologne, and mildly to excite the innocuous brain of the young man of American "Society." When you had floundered upon this very dry bit of land, you evidently felt that some apology was due to the spectators; so you proceeded thus:—"This exordium has been considered proper in view of the fact that the Directors of the Academy of Music have made for the coming season arrangements of the most important and elaborate character." I really don't perceive why this "fact" rendered it necessary or proper for the English language to suffer martyrdom at your hands; but never mind. You further said, referring to yourselves in the third person, "They have learned by experience, the best and dearest of teachers, that in order to command success, they must deserve it by presenting artistic talent of the highest order, a perfect ensemble in all its details, orchestra, chorus, and scenic effects, variety and novelty in the repertoire," &c.

Your "efforts to elevate the standard of musical taste in this country"—which is one of your own modest and truthful phrases—for the season of 1860-61 have now been going on for two weeks. You have given us artistic talent of a high order—this all honest critics will cheerfully admit; but as to the tautological promise of a "perfect ensemble in all its details, orchestra, chorus, and scenic effects," allow me to say, with feelings of the deepest consideration, that it was a sham—a word authorized by Worcester, not frowned upon by Webster, and, when moderately translated, meaning "an illusory pretext." You have given us a good orchestra, a tolerable, though scanty chorus, but no perfection of scenic effects whatever. You seldom do give us this. We always find a certain amount of well painted scenery, as theatrical scenery goes, but it stands alone on an ill furnished and utterly barren stage. We don't expect marvels of chronological or geographical consistency, but we have a right to ask that scenes brought into conjunction shall not represent maddening impossibilities of vegetation, or styles of architecture separated by more than a century of time, or by distance greater than one-third of the earth's circumference. You know that anachronisms and inconsistencies as glaring as those here implied are made every night under your direction. We have had nothing new in the way of stage furniture; the familiar stock has been lugged on in the same ridiculous manner as of old; that cheap cloth has been, as always, put upon the same aged table which has served generations of operas; and that dreary pair of chairs has nightly been forced to do duty alike in banquet hall, drawing-room, or bed-chambers. You have tried, as they sometimes say, with a degree of perseverance worthy of a better cause, to destroy every shred of illusion your representations of opera may have produced, and you know that the opera, in its best modern manner, is chiefly successful in presenting an accurate picture of what can by no possibility happen in real life.

Then, as to the "variety and novelty in the repertoire." You have given us "La Sonnambula," "Lucia," "Il Poliuto," "Il Trovatore," "Il Barbiere," "I Puritani," "Martha;" we should have had "La Traviata," except for the sickness of Mme. Cortesi; we are promised the "Sicilian Vespers," "Linda di Chamounix," and heaven preserve us—"Norma." Here is novelty and variety indeed! These are some of the "important and elaborate" arrangements you have made for the season! You must have been kept out of your beds for many weary nights while planning such a brilliant succession of new things.

But you will say—for I know your tricks—you will say, with a shrug of your shoulders, and with much turning up of the palms of your hands, that you are giving the public a greater variety of good performances than they could have for the same money anywhere abroad, and you will glibly repeat the scale of prices at Her Majesty's Theatre, and other transatlantic places of amusement; then, with an expression of mingled sadness and commiseration, you will walk off to the box-office and rack your brains over a fresh advertisement. To this we reply, True, O Directors! the people of England and France do pay more than we, and sometimes they have no more novelty. But be pleased to remember that they are not stunned by the noisy blowing of managerial trumpets before each season commences. We probably should not complain that we hear only the old operas, if you had not, with such a gratuitous display of bombast and balderdash, expressly told us that we were to have quite a different state of things. You are continually crying, not only wolf, but a whole menagerie of strange and wonderful beasts, and you have so often deluded us, that we have a right to feel affronted. Perhaps we were green to believe your announcement; but, really, you did it so ingeniously this time, with your Greek tragedies, your hair dressers, and your fashionable young men, that we quite forgot your natural propensities, and thought we should see something like what you talked about. Then, too, as to your argument drawn from the English and French opera, be pleased to bear in mind that even the old pieces there represented are put upon the stage with a real splendor which would dazzle you into perpetual blindness if it appeared on the boards of your Academy. Every detail of the stage furniture, scenery and equipments is perfect, and more money is expended on one of these operas than would pay for the whole of your stage-worn, shop-worn paraphernalia.

Since you are ever prating about novelties, why do you not essay a really new thing and surprise us all? Just engage a stage manager who shall manage the stage; let as much care be given to the minor details of your pieces as would be given to a blood and thunderous drama in the Bowery, as much as you bestow upon your stupid advertisements; scrub up your antique furniture, if you cannot or will not afford that which is new; let your scene shifters be content to show the audience the results of their labor without so generously displaying themselves as they run out the wings; let your supernumeraries cease their aimless and idiotic walking about the stage whenever they appear, and endeavor to drive into their heads the half or quarter of an idea of what they are supposed to be or to represent; make it an especial point, in dressing your armies, or your lords and ladies, or your peasants, that the large people shall not get all the small people's clothes, and vice versa. Finally, throw away your pens and ink, treat the public less as if it were composed of idiots and dotards, and show by your acts that you are worthy of an enlightened patronage.

I suppose I ought to apologise to my readers for making before them this serious talk with the men who want their money. But they are really crowding us, as the Western people say.

There has been very little in the performances of the week to call for notice. There has been one change of programme, and some contradictory announcements, and it appears as though the parts of the grand combination do not coalesce. All the houses in theatrical phrase, have been "sly;" that of Wednesday night, when Patti sang in "I Puritani," was the best of the week. Susini being taken sick, Barili supplied his place; the same artist also appeared as Figaro in "Il Barbiere," on Monday night. If exertion would make a good singer, he would stand high in the profession. "Il Trovatore" was repeated—by special request—on Tuesday. This special or general request is one of the stalest humbugs of the opera. Musiani's ut de poitrine makes too prominent an appearance in the bill, and does not wear well.

It would amuse the man who believes in the enthusiasm he sees and hears at the opera, if he would walk about the lobby during the evening, and mark how regularly the numerous young men and lads, attaches of the box office and the house, rush to the doors of the parquette, smite together their hands, and cry "bravo," whenever the least applause from within gives them the cue. It would also amuse the same man to see in what a business like manner the number of calls before the curtain is arranged in advance of each evening's performance.

On Thursday evening a small transparency at the door made known the fact that the opera was postponed. An inquiry produced the reply that Madame Cortesi was "very sick." We hope she will soon recover, do we not? Singers cannot be too careful; they sometimes take cold from a strong draught at the treasury; sometimes they are chilled by the public; occasionally they are really ill. Let us be Christians and hope that the last is not the case with Mme. Cortesi.

MUSIC.

Among those recreations which are proper, as well as pleasant, the cultivation of musical ability takes high rank.

We say musical ability—for it is not everybody who possesses the necessary qualifications to enjoy true music. There are some people who find no pleasure in music. We do not believe that this is because they cannot, at any time, feel its charms, but because their sense of music has been allowed to remain in a condition of inactivity; and, consequently, they have no relish for "sweet sounds."

Properly to appreciate a painting or sculpture requires an educated eye. Rightly to value a musical composition requires an educated ear. Without there is some natural defect in the physical organization, we believe that the ear and the eye are both capable of education; and that all, or nearly all, can appreciate music and painting, if they will.

Music is the poetry of sound. It embraces harmony, concord, and melody. It moves on velvet wings, waded so gently and gracefully, that naught but onward motion is known or felt. Whatever sound produces the charm of melody in the soul, wakes up all its Æolian strings to breathing symphonies within, unheard, but felt like the spirit-notes of a rapt vision, is music. Whatever sounds, or succession of sounds, make us forget that we are dwellers of earth, and lifts us, for the time being, into a world of living harmonies, which come and go, entrance and bewilder, captivate, and hold in trembling delight our minds—like the electric color-dances of the aurora borealis—is real music. It is a thing to be felt, not described. It is not sound simply—for all sound is not music. It is a peculiar, indescribable running together, or blending of certain smooth sounds of different heights, like the gliding together of the different colors of the rainbow. Its presence is tested only by the charm wrought in the soul.

When the soul is in ecstasy, occasioned by a succession of sounds, we may know that musical numbers are flowing. When a soft sound starts a tear in the eye, we may know that the spirit of music is there. Oh, the rapturous charm of Music! What power it has to soften, melt, enchain, in its spirit chords of subduing harmony! Truly, there is power in music—an almost omnipotent power. It will tyrannize over the soul. It will force it to bow down and worship, it will wring adoration from it, and compel the heart to yield its treasures of love. Every emotion, from the most reverent devotion to the wildest gushes of frolicsome joy, it holds subject to its imperative will. It calls the religious devotee to worship, the patriot to his country's altar, the philanthropist to his generous work, the freeman to the temple of liberty, the friend to the altar of friendship, the lover to the side of his beloved. It elevates, empowers, and strengthens them all. The human soul is a mighty harp, and all its strings vibrate to the gush of music. Yet all souls are not the same harp, nor are all affected alike by its power. Some will listen to the most exquisite music with only an agreeable pleasure, while others are carried heavenwards in a whirlwind of bewildering joy.

Different nations have different habits, customs, manners, modes of expression, and different words and languages to convey their thoughts and feelings. But music is felt alike by them all. A stirring strain will touch the well-strung souls of every nation alike. All will dance to a note of joy; all will weep at one of sadness. A lofty strain will bear all to heaven; a jarring discord lower them again to earth. The same masters have made the same music in Norway, Germany, Italy, France, England, America, and all have bowed before it like reeds before the wind. A beautiful proof is this of the kindred nature of all souls, of the existence of a mysterious link of spiritual union, that binds them all together. And the beauty of this proof is heightened, when we remember that music is the voice of love, and is closely allied to the infinite. Love speaks in tones of music. Love breathes musical airs. Love delights to pour itself out in song. The worshiper chants his praises in strains of lofty music. The lover of freedom speaks his love in song. The lover of beauty sings its praises. The lover of humanity softly breathes his love-notes in strains of sweetest music. Then how beautiful is this universality! The love of which it is the voice is equally universal. All souls have love within them. It is the all-pervading soul of the universe. Its voice is music. It is breathed in the harmony of the spheres, in the anthem of universal nature.

It has been beautifully said, that "Music is the voice of God, and poetry His language." It seems to bear an affinity to Deity. An eloquent writer, in speaking of the impression made on her mind by a musical performance says: "It expressed to me more of the infinite than I ever saw, or heard, or dreamed of, in the realms of nature, art, or imagination." And, again: "Music is the soprano, the feminine principle, the heart of the universe. Because it is the voice of Love, because it is the highest type and aggregate expression of attraction, therefore it is infinite—therefore it pervades all space and transcends all being, like a divine influx. What the tone is to the word, what expression is to the form, what affection is to thought, what the heart is to the head, what intuition is to argument, what insight is to policy, what religion is to philosophy, what holiness is to heroism, what moral influence is to power, what woman is to man, is music to the universe. Flexible, graceful, and free, it pervades all things, and is limited by none. It is not poetry, but it is the soul of poetry; it is not mathematics, but it is in numbers, like harmonious proportions in cast-iron; it is not in painting, but it shines through colors, and gives them their tone; * * * it is not in architecture, but the stones take their place in harmony with its voice, and stand in 'petrified music.'" In the words of Betina: "Every art is the body of music, which is the soul of every art; and so is music to the soul of love, which also answers not for its workings; for it is the contact of divine with human."

The human voice is the most perfect musical instrument ever made; and well it might be, for it had the most skillful Maker. That voice should be cultivated so as to sing the tones of love to man and to God. Around the fireside, in the social circle, it should sing the voice of love; and at the altar of God, it should pour forth melodious praise.

Who does not know the softening power of music, especially the music of the human voice? It is like the angel whisperings of kind words in the hour of trouble. Who can be angry when the voice of love speaks in music? Who hears the harsh voice of selfishness, and brutalizing passion, when music gathers up her pearly love-notes, to salute the ear with a stray song of paradise? Sing to the wicked man, sing to the disconsolate, sing to the sufferer, sing to the old, and sing to children, for music will inspire them all.

To all youth, we would say: Cultivate well the powers of music in your souls, for amply will you be repaid. You who possess the gift for music, shall it be unproductive within you for want of use? Shall the gem never be burnished? Shall you never present it shining to its Giver in a song of praise and worship. It is due to Him that it should be cultivated. How early should children be taught to sing; for what is sweeter than the songs of innocent childhood—so refining, so refreshing, so suggestive of a better world? Music sweetens the cup of bitterness, softens the hand of want, lightens the burdens of life, makes the heart courageous, and the soul cheerfully devout. Into the soul of childhood and youth, it pours a tide of redeeming influence. Its first and direct effect is to mentalize the musical performer; not to give him knowledge, more wisdom in the practical, business affairs of life, but to stir his mental being into activity, to awaken strong emotions, to move among the powers within as a common electrifier, touching here with tenderness, there with energy, now with holy aspiration, and anon with the inspiring thrill of beauty. It breathes like a miracle of inspiration through the soul, to elevate, refine, and spiritualize. No lethargy can exist in the soul that is pouring forth a tide of musical numbers. Its very recesses are all astir. Everything within becomes active; the perceptions acute, the affections warm, the moral sensibilities quick and sensitive. When we think how much the world wants awakening, we can think of no power better calculated to do it than that which dwells in the mysterious melodies of music.

But it not only gives an additional warmth, fervor, and vigor to the powers within, it gives refinement. It is opposed to the gross, the low, and the vulgar. Music never suggests vulgarity and baseness—never tends to the coarse and low; but to the shame of humanity be it said, that it has been prostituted to administer to base passions and vile feelings. And so has religion, and reason, and love. But not more are these directly opposed to the vile and coarse than in music. When musical numbers take hold of the mental man, with their powerful and vigorous sway, and raise it to that point of activity and fervor scarcely ever attained by any other means, the whole tendency is to the pure, the refined, and the perfect. It is true, the increased and cultivated sensibility of musical performers makes them so alive to discord, opposition, harshness, that at times they become much like that sensitive plant called "touch-me-not;" but this is rather the result of outward discord than of inward tendency to irritability. The outward world is not in harmony with their inward world. It is too gross and rough—too discordant and perplexing.

It is to be expected that the sensibility which music cultivates will influence the passionate as well as the moral nature of man; and will, at times, make anger more acute as well as love. It gives an increased activity to the whole being. And this would show the importance of cultivating all the mental powers in harmony with the musical talent. Much as we prize the influences of music—holy and enrapturing as we believe them to be—we would not press its claims beyond its proper limits. Harmony of mental development should be the grand object of life. The real and all-glorious influences of music are known and felt only when the whole mind is truly and properly cultivated. Then its charm is perfect; then its heaven is created. Music should be an essential part of education. It should be cultivated with numbers, with science, with literature, and poetry; for it is intimately blended with all these: is the spiritual expression of them all. It should begin ere words are lisped by the infant tongue, and be continued through the whole educational course—yea through life. On account of its mentalizing tendency, it assists rather than retards the educational progress. It renders more active all the mental powers; so that the whole educational work is promoted by the vitalizing power of the musical faculties. An education can be acquired more quickly and more effectually with, than without, the cultivation of the musical talent. The time given to that augments as rapidly as time spent in any other way.

the strength of the mental powers; while it relaxes, unbends, recreates, and strengthens them, and thus gives more time to the real work of education. Then let all youth be wise, and educate their talents for good music.

Piano-Forte Composers.

John Field, who resided for many years at St. Petersburg—as indolent as Dussek and as eccentric as Steibelt or Woelfl—wrote some concertos, a few sonatas, and a vast number of less important works. These, though exhibiting a certain smoothness of character and graceful peculiarity of trait, or passage admirably suited to the finished manner of playing which eminently distinguished their author (a disciple—we cannot think otherwise, although Field being an Englishman,* we should rejoice to proclaim him original—of Cramer) are not remarkable either for depth or variety of invention. Field deserves mention, nevertheless, if only for the extensive influence produced both by his playing (his many accomplished pupils—among whom, like Dussek, he boasted his Prince Ferdinande—to wit) and his music, sufficiently meritorious in its way, on a vast number of contemporaries.

CIPRIANI POTTER,† another Englishman, and one far more illustrious than Field, has distinguished himself in every branch of composition; and to his influence as a master must be chiefly, if not wholly, attributed the remarkable progress which this country has made of late years in musical intelligence. But, although Mr. Potter has left nothing untouched, and nothing, we may surely say, “unadorned,” especially in the department of instrumental music, it is of his pianoforte music alone that we have at present to speak. Mr. Potter is as thorough a master of the sonata form as Mozart himself, with a power of development no doubt derived from the great Beethoven, who, struck with his quickness and feeling, did not disdain to afford him his invaluable counsels. The specimens Mr. Potter has given us of the sonata for pianoforte solus (at least the printed ones) are not numerous, and are only published in Germany. Yet they are of such a solid kind, that, although sometimes wanting in fancy, they may with safety be constituted as models. Mr. Potter's Studies (two books) are justly esteemed among the very best of elementary works. Of his concertos, although, we believe, he has composed many, not being printed we are unable to speak advisedly; but some rare occasions of hearing them performed by the composer have unfolded their merits so plainly as to make us the more regret the impossibility of possessing them.

From men so gifted and so thoughtful we must take a great leap to descend upon such a level flat of commonplace as that occupied by FREDERIC KALKBRENNER, whom we notice simply because, as a pianist and a professor of the pianoforte, he has exercised considerable influence. His studies, possessing little musical merit, are decidedly useful; besides which, they facilitate certain mechanical peculiarities that, in the present age of executive wonders, are almost indispensable. As a composer Kalkbrenner had neither originality nor learning. His style, if style it may be termed, was a melée of the exuberances of Dussek and his contemporaries, the unmeaning extravaganzas of some of the modern fantasia-mongers, and the brilliant scale-passages of Henri Herz. We can find no vestige in the entire catalogue of Kalkbrenner's work, either of individual thought or musical ingenuity. True, some of his pieces attained an ephemeral popularity; but, of them, the variations on “Rule Britannia”—which are not so ingenious and scarcely more brilliant than those of Dussek—constitute a prominent example. We need hardly say, that such compositions cannot possibly have any influence on the progress of the art. Kalkbrenner essayed his talents in concertos and sonatas; of the former we need not speak—they are not worth the pains; of the latter we have a better opinion. We are acquainted with three of them:—that in A flat, generally known as the “Left-handed Sonata;” that in A minor, dedicated to Cherubini (!); and that in F minor. The first and second are the best by many degrees, and have some really beautiful passages, besides being, for Kalkbrenner, wonderfully symmetrical. The last, except a slow movement in C major, fantastically styled “The Song of the Quail,” contains nothing above mediocrity. Yet, as Kalkbrenner is unanimously admitted amongst the most notable persons who at a recent period devoted themselves to the progress of the pianoforte, we have necessarily included him in our catalogue raisonné.

Of HENRI HERZ, who still lives and belongs to our immediate times, we need say little. Singular, as it may appear, he adopted the Fall of Paris, of Moscheles, not only as a model for a single piece, but as a foundation of a new school, which he developed as far as it could go. But Herz brought with him a lively fancy, an inexhaustible facility in the invention of graceful, elegant, and natural passages, and a knowledge of music by no means contemptible. How popular this writer has been (and is)—what a fortune he has proved to the music publishers—what a boon to young ladies in the drawing-room, and what a torture to their visitors—what an invaluable stock of display for pianoforte teachers incapable of executing better music—and what a universal favorite with all, musicians as well as amateurs—everybody knows. To say more of Henri Herz would be superfluous; to say less would have been unjust. Nor should we quit him so soon but that, as far as our knowledge goes, he has not written one sonata for piano solus, nor do his concertos evidence any extensive acquaintance with, or profound attachment to, the sonata form—the great test for all composers. Before leaving him, however, we must say one thing in favor of Henri Herz, which is wholly apart from the influence, good or bad, his music has exercised, or continues to exercise, on pianists and composers for the piano. Out of the large number of works he has written we do not remember a single instance of enuni produced by the execution of one of them, great or small. As much cannot be said of many composers. Although compelled to deny him a place among the really great men who have benefitted and advanced the art, we cannot, with any show of justice, number Herz among those whose ignorance renders them pitiable while their assumption makes them intolerable.

CZERNY, the most voluminous writer for the pianoforte of whom the whole history of the art makes mention,‡ must be content with this distinction, as the only one that has induced us to introduce his name here. He was a musician of some acquirement, and a professor of acknowledged merit. He lived a cotemporary of Henri Herz, and has written a great many pieces in imitation of that original, which by some might be accepted without suspicion as the compositions of Herz himself. He was a resident at Vienna while Beethoven flourished, with whom he was on intimate terms of acquaintance, and has written a great many pieces in imitation of that original, which nobody would, under the most difficult circumstances, accept as the compositions of Beethoven. Czerny has imitated almost every cotemporary, almost every predecessor, and, had he the gift of foresight, in all probability, he would have imitated some composer yet unborn. Luckily for posterity he did not possess that gift. The sonatas of Czerny—which are frequently wound up into interminable fugues, based on interminable chromatic themes—are not sonatas, and, but for the title-page, no one would surmise the classical intentions of the composer. We are pleased to be able to say, that we neither know nor care whether Czerny has written any concertos, but we have heard more than three hundred of his miscellaneous pieces, and we have no desire at present of seeking to hear any more.

CHARLES MAYER and PIXIS may be classed together, the first as a very good, the last as a very bad composer of pianoforte music. Mayer, we believe, lives in Russia; Pixis is dead many years. The influence of Mayer, who cannot boast of as much originality as musical knowledge, has been to improve the taste of his hearers, and the music of his cotemporaries; that of Pixis, who can boast of quite as little originality as musical knowledge, has been to spoil one and the other. We know of no sonatas by either; but we know of some very excellent studies (good music to boot) by the first, and we know of some exceedingly poor fantasias (bad music to boot) by the latter. Both are cited by competent authorities as men of note in what chiefly regards the art of composing and playing on the pianoforte. The former we accept without hesitation; the latter we have named only to question his right to the distinction.—London Musical World, August 25.

* John Field—“Russian Field,” as he was nick-named—was, we believe, born in Ireland.

† Chief for many years of the Royal Academy of Music—master of Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mr. G. A. Macfarren, and other eminent musicians.

‡ It may be noted here that Kalkbrenner in his Pianoforte Tutor, while attempting to undervalue, betrays most extraordinary ignorance of the works of this great composer—speaking of his “Consolation” (a short theme with variations in B flat), as his most remarkable work!

§ We believe—thank heaven we have no practical experience of the fact—that the works of Czerny pass Op. 1100!!

Garibaldi.

While the world is ringing with the great deeds of the Liberator of Italy, it is not unpleasant to find that he has good claims for honorable mention in a Journal of Music. While we give all honor to the patriot, let us consider his merits as a critic and a singer.

An Englishman who made the voyage from Messina with Garibaldi, on board the transport Amaran, gives this account of his appearance and manner.

“Panting and sweltering all of us were, idle and listless enough; but the General moved among the various groups upon deck with a kind and apt word for each of them, evincing that readiness of recognition, that perfect accuracy of recollection, that memory of men and things and circumstances, however trifling, which are ranked among the innate privileges of royalty. He had on his usual dictatorial suit, consisting of the unfailing flannel shirt, with a silk handkerchief thrown loosely and widely round the neck by way of a scarf, light gray trousers, and the modern wide-awake hat with the turn-up brim.

“The prodigious breadth of the General's shoulders, his colossal chest, and the natural dignity and lion-like majesty of his countenance, again and again incline a beholder to overrate his real stature, which is certainly not above the middle size. You must go near him, and measure him by the standards of common men, before you recover from the error into which awe for that commanding figure leads you. The hair, on a nearer inspection, is dark hazel, almost black, darker by far than the beard, which is tawny or reddish. He wears the hair rather long. The beard is full, and relieves the length of the oval face, which might otherwise be thought excessive. The temples are somewhat compressed about the region of the eyes, and a very strong oblique depression is observable about the eyebrows. The cheek bones are high, and the nose comes down between them in a perfectly straight long line, even with the slightly slanting forehead. The complexion of the small part of the face which is not hidden by the beard is not merely bronzed or sunburnt—it has a peculiar sanguine hue, thickly studded with endless freckles. This remarkable tint, the features, the color of the beard, joined to the calm, but deep expression of the dark eye, all contribute to give his countenance that unmatched character which won for Garibaldi the appellation of the ‘Lionface.’

Towards noon the General had been engaged in a long conversation with Turr, when his attention was attracted by the sound of merry voices in the fore part of the steamer. He walked up to his companions, who had got up a kind of volunteer concert; walked nearer and nearer, till he first stood, then sat, in the midst of the delighted group. All the unsuccessful attempts at national songs, hymns, or melodies, which rose into ephemeral existence during the successful political commotions of 1831, 1848 and 1849 were tried with indifferent success. Garibaldi lamented that Italy alone, of all countries under the sun—Italy, which was great in nothing, if not in music—had nothing like a national air or anthem to boast of. “I could,” he said, with a slight touch of bitterness which has been felt by many an Italian patriot, “sing you the war-songs of ten barbaric and even savage nations, but I could not quote three notes to thrill the heart of an Italian as those of the Marsellaise strike to the soul of every Frenchman, or ‘God Save the Queen’ sink home to the heart of an Englishman. He made the trial of one of the many Italian failures, nevertheless, and his deep-throated mellow voice; mellow in singing, as it is rather sharp-ringing in conversation when raised above the ordinary pitch; his voice rose above the chorus of his old comrades, as they sang the ditty which seemed among the many to have most taken the hero's fancy. I took note of the lines as I was perfectly unacquainted with them, and write them down here as remarkable for being a melody in which Garibaldi sang first. It is Italy who is made to speak to her children:

“Via toglietevi del capo “La corona delle spine;
“Che una volta almen sul crine “Splenda il serto del valor.

“Many other songs more or less of a warlike or patriotic character were tried, mostly with indifferent success. We had three ladies on board, who had all joined the group, and to whom Garibaldi paid easy, affable attentions. There is no gall in the milk of this man's composition, or one would wonder how, after Como, he can bear to look a woman in the face. Two of these female passengers belonged to a professional singer from Messina, and the latter was, after a little pressing, induced to favor the company with some more cultivated strains. Garibaldi had sat down on a water-butt, resting his feet on the chain-cable, with his elbows on his knees, and his chin on both his hands, with an upturned face, listening to civilized music with the attention of a man fitted by nature to appreciate the beautiful whenever it falls in his way. One of his companions, a draughtsman, was ready with paper and pencil to catch the attitude and the group. The moment was sublime, for the unconscious General had put on an ineffably calm and delighted expression. Presently the roughs again took up the strain, and the concert assumed that wild and desultory character which belongs to such extempore performances. There arose loud peals of laughter, in which it did a man's heart good to see Garibaldi take a hearty share—Garibaldi, the man on whose shoulders weigh at this moment the destinies of Italy. Accustomed as they must be to the exhibition of such unaffected cordiality, Garibaldi's companions were as fully charmed to see their chieftain in such high good humor as a comparative stranger might be. The love and devotion of all men who ever draw near Garibaldi are something that passes all understanding. He loves all, and is loved by all; yet there is none with whom his supreme authority is ever shared, none who is ever intimately taken into his councils. It is only his heart that is open to all. His mind is exclusively his own, and his will admits no doubt or dispute."

The Boston Chime.

Under this head, the Transcript has a communication, giving the following facts relating to the chime of Christ Church, Boston, "which were obtained," he says, from some old papers found in the church sometime since:—

The church is furnished with a chime of eight bells, the cost of which was £560: the other charges for wheels, dorking and putting up were £93, exclusive of the freight from England which was generously given by John Rowe, Esq.

Weight of the Bells.—1st. 1,545 lbs.; 2d. 1,183 lbs.; 3d. 948 lbs.; 4th. 833 lbs.; 5th. 818 lbs.; 6th. 703 lbs.; 7th. 622 lbs.; 8th. 620 lbs.

Devices and Mottos on the Bells.—Tenor, 1st. This peal of eight is the gift of a number of generous persons to Christ Church in Boston, New England, Anno 1744.

2d. This church was founded in the year 1723. Timothy Cutter, Doctor in Divinity, the first rector 1745.

3d. We are the first ring of bells cast for the British Empire in North America. 1744.

4th. God preserve the Church of England. 1744.

5th. William Shirley, Esq., governor of the Mass Bay in N. E. Anno 1744.

6th. The subscriptions for these bells were begun by John Hammock and Robert Temple, Churchwardens, Anno 1743, completed by Rob't. Jenkins and Ion Gould, Church wardens, Anno 1744.

7th. Since generosity has opened our mouths, our tongues shall ring aloud its praise. 1744.

8th. Abel Rudhall of Gloucester cast us all. Anno 1743.

The chime though over a century old, is still perfect in every respect, and is regarded by competent judges as the best in this country.

Till within a few years, the bells were not "chimed," as at present, but eight men were trained to "ring changes," a custom which is still preserved in many villages in England; they were not rung "all at once," until none could be found capable of ringing them in the old way. The good old custom of ringing for Christmas and New Years is still kept up.

The number of Psalm tunes which can, at present, be played upon this chime, by the accomplished ringers, William Jewell, is almost incredible."

The rétrés of Mad. Tedesco will take place in the rôle of Fidès in the Prophète, to be performed Sept. 9, for the benefit of the pension list.

M. Calzado is introducing the new diapason into the orchestra of the Italian opera. In a fortnight all the new instruments will be ready. The diapason of this theatre was one of the highest of all the theatres of Paris. This measure, of which the director assumes all the expense, will be very favorable to the singers.

Editorial Correspondence.

IV.

PARIS, August 10, 1860.

My short visit to Paris is in the unmusical season of the year; a mere lingering to make what may be seen and hear what may be heard on the way through to other countries. Brushing quickly past the gay flowers, and chiefly occupied in seeing, I had not thought to gather musical honey for these letters. But I have seemed to meet on all sides symptoms of a new musical impulse in France. Certainly the French have not borne hitherto the highest musical reputation; the French taste, even the French ear has not been reported very true to concert pitch; and the French as a people have been proverbially famed for singing out of tune. This is a slander so far as my small experience of the past fortnight goes. In the churches at Rouen, in the operas, the cafés chantants, the Conservatoire, and above all the singing classes of "the million," in Paris, one could not but be struck by the very opposite, by just that same exactness in regard to tune and time, which makes the whole every day movement of this most orderly and military nation. Here every thing goes in procession; all partakes of the controlling military rhythm; and with whatever latent discontent there is (doubtless not a little) under the purest despotism, there is still a certain lyric sense of glory and of pride in power, in art, in order and in beauty which goes well with music. There is a great educational work in progress over all France in respect to music. The people are becoming singers, in a more real and substantial sense (I cannot help thinking) than we are wont to boast of with our swarms of money-making singing masters and "professors" in New England. Here a great musical movement, real and sincere, seems to have sprung up in the people, and to have a living soul in it. It enjoys the fostering care of government. The empire, which styles itself "Peace," is shrewd enough at least to show that it is also Art, and also Music. And it does look as if that power, which, while it turns Paris into a camp, at the same time unites the Louvre with the Tuileries, builds noble palaces and boulevards and bridges, redeems to sight the beautiful old tower of St. Jacques, long hidden in a dirty mass of buildings, restores and renovates the glorious old cathedrals, and other monuments of Gothic architecture throughout France,—doing in fact everywhere a great æsthetic work and cultivating the artistic glory of the land,—was at the same time quickening a new musical impulse and preparing a new musical era in its people.

What I witnessed last Sunday was significant. "Orphéon" is the collective name of a great system of popular singing societies, for both sexes and all ages, within a few years organized, and still spreading out its branches over all France. The reports are still fresh of the impression which a delegation of some thousands of the male Orphéonists made on their visit to the Crystal Palace in England some weeks since. It was my good fortune to receive an invitation in company with an intelligent amateur of our town, to what was styled a Séance Solennelle of the Orphéon (Ville de Paris), held in the vast round of the Cirque Napoleon, at 2 P. M., on Sunday, August 5th. This "solemn session" was a free grand concert; there were no tickets sold; it was the people's own affair and open to the people, subject only to the limitation, for the sake of comfort and of order, (for here the rule is absolute and universal, in theatres, in cars, in omnibuses, never to admit one person over and above the actual number of seats) of invitations dated from the Prefecture of the Seine.

The assembly was immense. There could not have been fewer than five thousand guests; and these ranged in circle above circle (to the number of twenty circles), from the spacious area below to half way up the richly decorated walls of the great circus, made a most brilliant and lively spectacle, in itself enough to occupy the hour we were kept waiting. All classes were assembled, but chiefly of the people; mechanics with their wives and daughters, a vast brilliant flower bed of kaleidoscopic colors; here and there an actual blue blouse, or the picturesque Arabic costume of the Zouave. A wide section of the ground, from top to bottom, was filled or filling with the singers, numbering one thousand or twelve hundred voices in all. Above, on one side, sat the basses and the tenors, and below them the women. On the other side, the boys and girls. At the foot of all a patch of the tenderest plants, silvery-voiced youngest girls, found room upon the central area. The rest of this was occupied by dignitaries and distinguished guests in stately arm-chairs, such as Auber, who moved about a sort of oracle among them, and others of the musical celebrities of France; M. le Préfet also, whose entrance was unanimously greeted, as was that of several others; all scrupulously dressed, too, as if it were indeed a great occasion, and as if in solemn honor to what they recognized as a great cause.

Here and there among the younger singers stood their teachers, to reflect the hints of tempo and expression from the conductor, who stood below, upon their immediate neighborhood. There was much affectionate enthusiasm manifested towards some of these among the boys. For everything spoke out there; the scene was thoroughly French; and what a noise there was! what an infinite babblement of animated tongues, over the whole space, but especially among the boy singers as they came rushing down into their seats, and "thought aloud" of everything that passed before the call to order. They were bright-looking, handsome, intelligent boys for the most part; the handsomer for carrying so much of the air of cheerful discipline in their faces and in all their movements; lively, happy, noisy, but not rude; one is pleasantly struck by the faces and the manners of the boys in all the streets of Paris. If I could only sketch that quaint old figure of a teacher who stands up there on my left, answering the laughing, eager questions of a dozen tip-toe boys at once! He was a subject for a Cruickshank. With his back turned he seems the very image of a Scotch or Yankee country schoolmaster; but when he turns round the face is one of those picturesque oddities you only find in Europe; very tall and lank and bony; an old man with bushy grey hair and long grey moustache, a fabulously long beaked nose, and very high retreating forehead; face red, and full at once of routine, discipline and good-natured humor and that enthusiasm in a good work which preserves youth; altogether a picturesque, quaint specimen! I think it was he, who, when the moment for commencing was announced, stepped downward a few steps, and placing a wreath of immortelles upon a bust, said in a clear voice: A la memoire de WILHELM! he being the patron saint as it were of the Orphéon, since of Wilhelm's singing classes for the million (now imitated by Mainzer in England) this Orphéon is the natural fruit. There was the clapping of hands and the enthusiasm, immense of course, after the French way; they always have a sentiment.

The conductor of the first part, M. BAZIN, a remarkably intelligent and wholesome looking man, gave the sign, when all rose, and the few chords of the brief introductory Domine saluum instantly revealed a wonderfully pure, sonorous, musical ensemble of tone. The pieces were all unaccompanied. No. 1 was for the whole choir, Veni Creator, by Besozzi, a dignified composition in contrapuntal church style, and was sung perfectly, as regards purity of intonation, precision of outline in the coming in of different sets of voices, light and shade, and all the qualities of good choral singing. The parts of the harmony were nicely balanced, and all voices told. We do not think we ever heard so large a mass of vocal tone that was so pure, so fresh, so vivid; the molten mass ran bright and without dross. No. 2 was humorous, a fable of Fontaine, set very happily to music by M. Bazin, in Opéra Comique style, about the two physicians, Dr. Tant-pis and Dr. Tant-mieux (so-much-the-better and so-much-the-worse.) It was rendered with most delicate esprit.

No. 3. L'Angelus, by Papin, was a chorus of children's voices; a sweet religious strain, flowing in upon an accompaniment of boy contralti, imitating church bells. The quality of tone was lovely, especially where the tender, silver soprano of these youngest girls took up the strain by itself, and the boy voices did not shout and blurt in that offensive, overwhelming manner which has been a fault in our musical school festivals in Boston. Insatiable applause, especially on the part of the grown up singers, compelled a repetition of this. Then the men took their turn and sang, in four parts, a delightful little staccato chorus from Grétry; La garde passe, representing the watch going the round of the streets at midnight, and warning everybody to go into the house and keep silence. The lightly marked, distinct pianissimo tramp of footsteps in the beginning was most perfect. The sense of near approach, conveyed by the crescendo, from verse to verse, equally so; and the retreat. Machinery could not do the thing so nicely as those five hundred voices. The children then returned the compliment of clapping, backed by the whole audience. No. 4 was a respectable church piece, short, in contrapuntal style, by M. Auber. No. 6, for full chorus, by Halévy, and in his most characteristic and dramatic style, full of modulations, interminglings and responses, had essentially the same poetic subject with the piece by Grétry, and was called Le Courre-feu:—very effective and completely rendered. It is a chorus from his Juif errant, an opera which he produced while the interest in Eugene Sue's novel was yet fresh, but which had not at all the same success as La Juive.

Part second was conducted by a plump, little, bustling, blonde individual, full of gesticulation, yet efficient, M. PASDELOUP, and opened with a clever composition of his own, a Prayer, for all the voices. Next came a "Spring Song," being one of those sweet and rather sentimental German-Italian part-songs for male voices, by de Call. But to our mind the freshest, happiest and most interesting morceau in the day's selection was a vintage song (Les Vendanges) from old Orlando Lasso, to which very pretty and poetic French rhymes had been adapted. There is a rare touch of fine, imaginative, graceful play in the music, which many would not expect from that "learned," "scientific" old fellow, that pioneer in contrapuntal art; and it was beautifully sung. So was the next piece, No. 10, one of a very different character and perhaps the next most interesting in the programme, by a living French composer, Gounod: a chorus for male voices from M. Faust, martial, stirring, grandiose in style, startling in modulations, and laid out evidently upon large orchestral background. The unaided voices made the most of it. A Cantique by Haydn, one of his elegant and faultless common-places, followed, and the seance closed with an enthusiastic Vive l'Empereur! vigorously composed by Gounod, and sung apparently with a will, to words which couple the occasion and the whole artistic impulse of the land with his name:

C'est l'élu de la France;
Il fut son sauveur.
Il ouvre un temple à l'industrie,
Aux beaux-arts il rend leur splendeur,
A nos drapeaux leur vœu honneur;
A la France il rend son génie (!)

And so ended one of the most interesting and exciting musical occasions at which I ever have been present. Of course it is a greater thing to hear greater compositions. But one could not hear that singing, and feel that audience, without feeling also that it has a future in it; that the Orphéon really is a sound, live, vigorous musical movement, springing out of the life of the people and destined to identify itself with all that people's enthusiasms. It is pregnant with a great musical activity, hereafter; and whether it is to call forth composers of the true imaginative, creative stamp or not, it is at least moulding the ear and the soul of the French nation to a fine appreciation and a deep love of the art of music. There is more of Future in that, we fancy, than in all the theoretic products of the Wagners, Liszts and Berliozes; and we are far from thinking that the Art owes nothing to those men, especially the first named. PARISOL. Morceau de genre pour le piano par Theodor Hagen, 30 cents, New York. Published by Theo. Hagen.

"PRAISE TO GOD." A Choral and Instrumental work, composed by Geo. Fred. Bristow. Bound in cloth, uniform in style with Ditson & Co.'s edition of Oratorios and Cantatas. Price, $2.00.

Some of Mr. Bristow's instrumental compositions were performed here some years ago, and made a quite favorable impression. "Praise to God" is a sort of oratorio, composed to the words of the "Te Deum Laudamus" and so far as one can judge it in this form would be quite effective and pleasing in performance. It is well worth the attention of oratorio societies. It is beautifully printed and bound.

THE HOME CIRCLE. A collection of Marches, Waltzes, Polkas, Schottisches, Redows, Quadrilles, Contra Dances, &c. For the Harp. Price $1.50; cloth, $2.

THE SNOW OF PEARLS. A collection of duets, &c., (uniform with the above.)

To the oft repeated question, "what shall I buy to give to a friend," when we do not know anything about the friend or the musical attainments of the friend, we always recommend these collections. Not to real students of music, but to the people who "play on the piano a little and sing a little." But there are many gems of real music in them, beside the lighter pieces.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

At the Grand Opera, Robert le Diable has been given with Mad. Vandenhuevel and Mlle. Marie Sax, both receiving most enthusiastic applause. The Opéra Comique has revived the Cutd, with Madame Ugalda in the principal part which she has made famous and her own.

The Théâtre Lyrique reopened September 1st., and promises a new opera Odine by Genet. Gounod also is about finishing a new opera for this theatre, la Reine Balkis.

Duprez gives an annual concert for the benefit of the poor of the commune of Valmondois, of which he is mayor. His daughter Mad. Vandenhuevel Duprez carried away the honors of the one given recently. She was assisted by Mlle. Marie Brunetti, Godfrend, and Leon Duprez, her brother. The master of these artists took his part also in the performance.

The Parisians are making great preparation for the winter season. The Grand Opera recently sold ten thousand costumes and twenty-five chandeliers, to clear the costume store-room, and has ordered new costumes for M. Auber's old opera, "Le Philtre," which is still attractive, and which is to be played with the new ballet Mlle. Taglioni composed, and M. Offenbach has set to music. Mlle. Livry is to be chief danseuse in it, and which is to see the footlights the latter part of this month. M. Wagner has given Mlle. Sax the part of Elizabeth, in "Tannhauser." It was she who, seeing Mons. Berliot superintend the rehearsals of Gluck's "Orpheus," as she had seen masters superintend their operas, cried out to him for some explanation, calling him "Monsieur Gluck"! She was discovered in some café concert in the Champs Elysees. The Opéra Impériale has had given two representations of "Semiramis," and the 426th of "Robert le Diable." A grand performance was to be given there for the benefit of the Christian sufferers in Syria. Mme. Vandenhuevel-Duprez is to repeat the role of Marguerite, in the "Huguenots," and Mlle. Sax in that of Rachel, in "La Juive." "La Petit Chaperon Rouge" has been revived at the Opéra Comique. "Le Roi Barbe" is the title of the new opera libretto by M. Scribe, announced for early production. Mme. Ugalda has quitted the Théâtre-Lyrique, and accepted a permanent engagement at the Opéra Comique. A new piece in three acts had been accepted at the Opéra Comique, entitled "La Villa Medici," by MM. Roqueplan and Sardon.

The young and pretty Polish pianiste, Mlle. Hedwige Brezowska, has just married the Count Mélen, consular general of France at New Orleans.

BADEN.—Berlioz has just given his annual concert here, which for four years has been the event of the season. It took place in the grand salle de la Conversation and Roger, Vieuxtemps, Jacquard, with Mad. Viardot and Mad. Carvalho took part in the performances. The orchestra, and chorus, were made up from the artists of Baden, Carlsruhe and Strasbourg. Berlioz gave his overture to the Frances jugs and a fragment of the Damnation de Faust, the solos being sung by Mad. Eberius and Eberhoffer of the chapel of Carlsruhe. These fine works were given with good effect. The success of Mad. Viardot in two fragments from Orphee was immense.

WIESBADEN.—Litolff gave a grand concert here, attended by an enormous audience, and this celebrated artist showed himself superior even to his great reputation. He played his fourth symphonic concerto with the power, vigor and expression that characterize him. He directed the execution of his overture to Maximilian Robespierre and a fragment of his opera Rodrigo von Toledo, which was sung by artists famous in Germany, Mlle. Schmidt, Carl Fornes and M. Schneider. The music produced a great effect. A young Hungarian violinist named Auer, fourteen years of age appeared with great success.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The hundredth anniversary of the birth of Cherubini was celebrated here on the 8th of September, on which occasion his opera Funiska was given, written by him at Vienna, in 1805, where it was represented February 6th in the following year.

PROFESSIONAL SINGING IN CHURCHES.—We have reason to know that the following letter has been addressed by the Lord Bishop of the diocese to an incumbent, in consequence of his Lordship's attention having been directed to an advertisement which stated that at the re-opening services of a church in the diocese, on Sunday last, a Miss W— had been engaged to sing select pieces of music:

"THE PALACE, RIFON, AUG. 9, 1860.

"MY DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the form of notice in which the sermons to be preached at the re-opening of — church, on Sunday last, the 5th inst., were publicly announced. I allude particularly to the advertisement that a professional singer, Miss W—, had been engaged to sing select pieces of music during the service. I consider such an announcement as this highly objectionable, nor can I refrain from marking my strong disapproval of it. The church of God is not the place to which crowds of persons ought to be attracted to hear professional singing. Performances of this kind belong to other places altogether, and it is a profanation of a church to convert it into a place of attraction for the lovers of fine music to attend for the purpose of hearing select pieces of music by eminent musical performers. I delight in good music. I often hear in the churches of the diocese congregational singing which is scarcely equaled in any other portion of the kingdom; but the talent for music and the love of singing which are so peculiar to the West Riding, only render it the less necessary to invoke any foreign aid in the conduct of this portion of our public worship. I object to all singing in churches in which the congregation in general cannot take part, and, above all, I object to the announcement of any musical performers by way of inducement to the public to attend a particular service. The eminence or skill of the performer only makes such an announcement more objectionable. I trust, therefore, that I shall not again have the pain of observing any notice similar to the one which has made it my duty to write this letter.

"I am aware that you have been suffering of late from severe illness, and on this account it is more than probable that you were not consulted upon the form of advertisement, and are entirely free from any blame in the matter. At the same time you are the only person with whom I can officially communicate upon the subject, because in point of law the incumbent of any parish is the only responsible person for the mode in which divine service is conducted in the church which he serves.

"I will thank you, therefore, in future to use your authority to prevent any repetition of the circumstance to which this letter refers. I doubt not you entirely agree with me in the belief that to attempt to swell a congregation by an advertisement of professional singing may succeed to attract a crowd together, but it is a course wholly unworthy of a minister of Christ, and very ill-adapted to promote the glory of God, or the spiritual edification of the people.

I am, my dear sir, very faithfully yours,
R. RIFON.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Draytons have been during the past week at the Boston Theatre, since the injunction against the Melodeon; the controversy being one between the proprietors of the two estates to determine their respective rights, and not in any way directed against Mr. Drayton.

At the Howard Mr. Booth has continued a successful engagement.... The Colleen Bawn, by Bourciault, continues to draw immense audiences, literally filling the Museum, every evening and Wednesday and Saturday afternoons.

We learn that the new hall in Bumstead Place, at which some concerts and the Artists' Receptions were given last winter has at last received a name, and is to be known by the appropriate designation of Allston Hall.

The Mechanics Fair is still open and attractive as ever and crowded as ever. In Section No. 1, occupying the armory floor above Faneuil Hall, are the Musical Instruments, from the following contributors viz.:

Messrs. Chickering & Sons, A. W. Ladd & Co., Hallet & Cumston, T. Gilbert & Co., Mason & Hamlin, W. P. Emerson, N. M. Lowe, A. G. Miller & Co., William Bourne, C. A. Adams, J. W. Brackett, W. P. Marvin, J. E. McNeil.

William H. Schultze, the violinist, who is so well appreciated as an artist and universally esteemed as a man, and, from his connection with the old Germania Musical Society, counts numbers of friends all over the country, was married to Miss Maria Fehmer, a young German lady of this city. On the evening before, according to the German custom, the friends of the couple assembled at the residence of the lady's mother, and celebrated the coming event by speeches serious and comic, short scenes in character, tableaux vivants, &c., all of which had reference to the object of the meeting. Perhaps the most noticeable, because the most absurdly comic part of the performances was a negro-burlesque, executed by gentlemen mostly well-known in musical circles, under the leadership of Carl Zerrahn (uncle of the bride). In the course of the evening the Orpheus Glee Club made their appearance at the door and sang a couple of their choicest pieces. Upon invitation they finished their programme in-doors. Somewhat later the full Germania Band serenaded. The good wishes uttered and the sweet sounds discoursed during the evening will long linger pleasantly in the memory of the young couple who have now entered upon their honeymoon.

NEW ORLEANS.—THE NEW OPERA HOUSE.—The enterprising and intelligent manager of this popular establishment, Mr. Bondouquie, has almost completed his arrangements for the coming operatic season, and, judging from what we know of the aforesaid arrangements, we are warranted in predicting to the musical public of our city a most brilliant and varied succession of stars and novelties.

Prominent amongst the late engagements made by Mr. Bondouquie stand those of Mme. Faure-Briere, first chanteuse legere, and of Mlle. Lacombe, mezzo-soprano, for the grand opera. The reputation which these accomplished artists have already achieved in Europe is such that they need fear no comparisons with their predecessors upon the same boards. Mlle. Lacombe has sustained the leading characters in Meyerbeer's and Rossini's masterpieces in all the large French and Belgian theatres with great talent and success, and will doubtless meet here with quite as warm a reception as in the scenes of her former triumphs. Of Mme. Faure-Briere, the light soprano of the new company, we will merely say that she has run through the gamut of three successive engagements at the Grand Opera and the Lyrique Theatre of Paris, and that she has just closed a most brilliant and lucrative engagement in London, where her brilliant vocalization and faultless style have elicited the most flattering notices from the press and the public.

With Mlle. Lacombe in the grand and Mme. Faure-Briere in comic opera, our musical friends need entertain no fear of having a dull prospect before them.

In addition to the above gifted artists, Mr. Bondouquie has also secured the services of Mme. Haquette as jeune premiere role in the drama and vauville, and Mons. Gennetier as premier amoureux. The lady is said to be a most accomplished actress of the Parisian type, her histrionic apprenticeship having been made entirely upon the boards of that great metropolis of taste and fashion. Report speaks most highly of her dramatic abilities, as well as of those of Mr. Gennetier.—N. O. Delta.

ITALIAN OPERA.—We are pleased to learn that the Orleans theatre has been leased by the Italian Opera Company, and will open its doors early in November next.—N. O. Picayune.

Mad. Czillag, the celebrated cantatrice, says the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris, has been engaged on the most brilliant terms for the next year by M. Ullman, director of the opera at New York.

COMPLIMENT TO BUFFALO MUSICIANS.—On the occasion of the excursion of the Prince and suite, by the Rescue, on Georgian Bay from Collingswood, on Monday last, Poppenberg's Band accompanied them. After the Band had performed a few pieces, His Royal Highness remarked to one of his attendants: "This is the best band I have heard since I left England;" and he forthwith deputed one of the Lords to wait upon Mr. Poppenberg. His Lordship said to Mr. P.: "His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales wishes me to express to you his utmost satisfaction with your performance." Mr. Poppenberg answered assuring the Royal messenger that he "should endeavor to deserve so high a compliment;" after which the Prince arose, lifted his hat and saluted Mr. Poppenberg and each member of the Band.

It should be very gratifying to the citizens of Buffalo and the Pappenbergs to know they gave such satisfaction as musicians, when there were twenty other bands present to compete with them.

The Prince subsequently enquired where the band was from; and on being informed again expressed satisfaction and surprise.

THE END OF SUNDAY THEATRICALS IN NEW YORK.—We are happy to record the general subjection of the Sunday theatre proprietors to the laws of the State. A single notorious offender still resists public sentiment and defies the authorities; but a little experience of the penalties of violated law, so soon as the indictments hanging over his head can be reached, may teach him a valuable lesson. We understand that Eustachi's Volks theatre has passed into new and better hands—the Sunday performances have been abandoned. The Stadt theatre—after a parting growl at the "Sunday fanatics," through the Staats Zeitung, for interrupting its Sunday profits, which formerly equaled those of the entire week, takes out a new license, and foregoes Sunday exhibitions. The Volks Garten did not fancy the suits of the "House of Refuge," for $500 penalty for its Sunday "sacred concerts," and give up playing. The Broadway establishments early gave in to the law, and some of them have been compelled to apply for regular theatrical license. On the whole, a more general submission to the theatre and Sunday laws has been secured than has been known for twenty years.—N. Y. Times.

FAIRHAVEN.—Mr. S. Lasar gave an organ concert at this place recently, at which he gave the following programme:

1. Grand Chorus—"Hallelujah," from the Messiah.... Handel
2. Coronation March—From "The Prophet"..... Meyerbeer
3. Serenade—"Oh! Summer Night"..... Donizetti
4. Organ Fantasia—"God Save the Queen"..... Lasar

CHRIST CHURCH CHIME, INDIANAPOLIS.—The chime of bells for Christ Church has arrived. The bells are nine in number, and are from the manufactory of Meneeley's Sons, Troy, New York.

The following shows the musical scale of the bells, and the weight of each:

No. 1, F sharp.....	1617 lb.
No. 2, G sharp.....	1182 lb.
No. 3, A sharp.....	793 lb.
No. 4, B natural.....	624 lb.
No. 5, C sharp.....	506 lb.
No. 6, D sharp.....	388 lb.
No. 7, E natural.....	304 lb.
No. 8, F sharp.....	206 lb.
No. 9, G sharp.....	228 lb.

THE HUMAN VOICE.—The most beautiful and touching instrument, which man has received from the hands of his benevolent Maker, is the voice.—Through words he can impart life and signification to his melodies; he can call forth the most secret feelings of the heart, awaken every passion into living reality, and powerfully vibrate all the chords of the soul. What joyful sensations cannot the simple song of the shepherdess of Alps inspire! If such be the case, how great must be the effect produced by a cultivated singer, if his song be enlivened by art and a well regulated fancy; for how often do even experienced singers, betrayed by vanity or affectation, overstep the limits marked out by nature. And yet how much more frequently are the most excellent gifts, instead of being consecrated to the services of the art, perverted to a mere mechanical and unintellectual means of making a livelihood.—Bentley.

Concerning Spohr's rudeness The Athenæum tells this anecdote: For a reception made to honor him in the house of a great German musician resident in London, three artist-ladies—all singers of European reputation, and whose hours were worth so many gold pieces—had conspired to prepare the trio (one of Spohr's happiest inspirations) from "Zemire und Azor." The leading voice had hardly begun to sing this, when out of the small London room, and across the pianoforte, and through the three admiring gentle women, strode Spohr (and he was large, and bovine, and tall), calling to his wife, "Come let us go; it is too hot here."

The Italian journals are filled with accounts of the successes of a new musical star, Madame Galotti, who, from all descriptions, appears to be the genuine successor of Pasta and Malibran. Her voice is said to possess an unusual power of reaching the feelings, while her acting is incomparable. Her last character at Brescia was Norma, which is described by the papers as creating an enthusiasm quite unprecedented in that musical city since the days of Pasta. After the opera, her health was drunk in the principal cafés as the Prima Norma del Mondo! Making due allowance for the exuberance of Italian superlatives, there appears no doubt that Madame Galetti is really a great singer and actress. She is engaged for the next season at La Scala.

William Mason was some time since giving a concert in Newark, there was in one of the front seats a white-haired, respectable looking old gentleman. Mason had just finished a magnificent duet for two pianos with one of his pupils, young James Brown. "Well," says the old gent, "that Brown must be a mighty fine player; for they say that Mason is the best in the country, and there they played a long piece—as much as twenty pages—and Brown didn't come out hardly a second behind. If he can keep up that close, he'll beat soon."

MUSIC AND PEACE.—Music is the language of harmony. It is the highest mode of articulate expression, and the true voice ever speaks for peace and love. The devil has taken possession of all the best tunes, said an old divine, once upon a time, and he might have added that he had hired all the poets, too. But it is one of the hopeful signs of this transition age that not only poetry and music, but the general arts, are returning to their legitimate offices of advancing the general harmony and elevating the general virtue. The poets whom Horace stigmatized as cowards and humble laudators of the deeds they were disqualified to perform, now stand like Lamartine, and Victor Hugo, and John Bowring, and Bryant, and Longfellow, in the van of liberty, and have brave oppression and wrong; and painters whose grandest tableaux were of battles, now present to the eyes of the people, like Edwin Landseer, the beauties of peace beside the horrors of war. Music, when attuned to the harmonies of nature, always subdues and softens the soul. Thibaut, the celebrated professor of law in Heidelberg, relates that a young man—his guest—who had listened to the performance of a composition of Lotti, exclaimed, when he left his house—"O, this evening I could do no harm to my greatest enemy." Zwingle, the Swiss reformer, when reproached by Faber, afterwards Bishop of Vienna, for cultivating music, said—"Thou dost not know, my dear Faber, what music is. I love to play a little upon the lute, the violin and other instruments. Ah, if thou couldst only feel the tones of the celestial lute, the evil spirit of ambition and the love of riches which possesses thee would then quickly depart from thee." When the child upon its mother's knee is weeping, she soothes it with a song. "The ancients pretended," says Madame de Staël, "that nations were civilized by music; and this allegory has a deep meaning; for we must always suppose that the bond of society was formed by sympathy or interest, and certainly the first origin is more noble than the second." Amongst the instrumentalities of peace and love, surely there can be no sweeter, softer, more effective voice than that of gentle peace breathing music.

THE BLIND BLACK BOY PIANIST.—Our readers will remember a recent news item giving an account of a musical prodigy, in the shape of a blind negro boy, "owned" by a Mr. Oliver, of Georgia, which (the property) plays the piano intuitively, with surprising power. A friend who knows Mr. Oliver (and is well known also to the public) writes the following enthusiastic account of his performance.

"The boy is an ugly little nigger till he touches the piano—then the little black phiz is turned upwards—it sways to and fro. The sightless eye-balls seem to be searching in the stars, and the great opera ear seems to be catching harmony from celestial spheres. I never heard such power, such emphasis, such marvellous fingering and sweetness, from the touch of Thalberg, Hertz, De Meyer, or Gottschalk, and yet this is an ugly little cornfield nigger of Georgia. 'Tom' does not know—never learned—a note of music; and played as well the first time, at midnight, in the plantation parlor, where he astonished and entranced the Misses Oliver, his young mistresses, as he does now. He plays two tunes at the same time, and during the performance, will laugh and talk with his master. A professor of music from Baltimore was present when I attended. He had come to test the prodigy. Tom accompanied him in a difficult piece—a new composition never played before. They changed positions; the professor changed the time, and otherwise rendered the execution difficult, but still the marvellous little darkey accompanied him without a false note. The professor raised up in his seat in excitement; his fingers flew with the rapidity of a humming-bird's wings—Tom with him. At last in despair, the professor struck out a crash on an octave, and sprang up; and blind Tom struck, and sprang sympathetically and simultaneously with him. What will you make out of this. Tom not only imitates immediately the most difficult and beautiful performances, but improvises sweet, celestial melodies. He speaks a language on the piano, his little dark soul never learned on the plantation."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Love's sweet summer. Romance. A. Mellon. 25
The Rose, the Zephyr, and the Dewdrop. Song. Lover. 25

Pretty melodies to charming words.

- Jamie. Ballad. F. Wallerstein. 25
A smooth, flowing ballad, moderately difficult.

- Home of love. Song. J. H. McNaughton. 25

A pretty little fireside song, not unlike the same composer's "When there's love at home"

- Barney O'Shea. Irish Ballad. S. Lovv. 25

Lover's Irish songs are so well known and so fully appreciated as far as the English language is spoken that a new one will at once command the attention of singers. The above is very striking.

- Ever of thee. Quartet. Arranged by T. Bissell. 25

This is a very singable and effective arrangement of the most popular song of the day.

- Our hands have met, but not our hearts. Wilson. 25

The latest ballad of the day, sung with great applause at Morris Brothers' entertainments.

- Home Delight. (With Guitar accomp.) Ordway. 25

- Moss grown dell. " " " 25

The guitar part presents no difficulty to tolerably good players. The songs have long been favorites.

Instrumental Music.

- St. James Galop. C. D'Albert. 30

A dashing galop, with a portrait of the Prince of Wales on the title page, representing him in the uniform of a Colonel in the army. The portrait is an accurate likeness.

- Galop and Introduction from "Rigoletto." Violin and Piano.. Case. 25

- E il sol dell'anima, from "Rigoletto." Violin and Piano. Case. 25

- Quesia o quella, from from "Rigoletto." Violin and Piano. Case. 25

- Bella figlia, from "Rigoletto." Violin and Piano. Case. 25

Quite invaluable as parlor amusements for amateurs. Neither part is difficult.

- Gloria from Mozart's 12th Mass, arr. by Rimbauld, 15

- Marvellous Works. " " 15

- Vital spark of heavenly flame. " " 15

Sabbath strains, easily arranged. They can be performed on the Melodeon also.

Books.

- THE OPERATIO BOUQUET. A collection of Quartets, Choruses and Concerted Pieces, from the Most Favorite Operas. Arranged for Choirs, Classes, Societies and Social Gatherings. By Edwin Bruce. 2,00

This is a volume of superior merit in every particular;—its contents are exceedingly attractive, and in typographical execution it is unexceptionable. As a collection of good pieces for the profitable practice of Choirs and Societies and as a repertoire of excellent compositions for public performance it has no equal. Judging from the many inquiries that have been made for the book since it has been in press it will prove one of the most popular issues of the season.

The Coureur des Bois.

BY FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

The autumn storms are scarcely past;
The twilight is cloudy and overcast,
And through the forest, far and fast,
Tramps the Coureur des bois.

Round him shudder dark hemlock boughs,
Gloomy shadow the cedar throws,
Gold-brown, ruddy, the maple glows
Beside the Coureur des bois.

He sees the moose-deer stalking nigh,
He hears the distant panther's cry,
Wild-geese, in wedge-like phalanx, fly
South, o'er the Coureur des bois.

He knows, by the rapids heightened roar,
And by the snow-clouds, gathering lower,
The night will be wild, and travel sore—
Wary Coureur des bois!

Long has he travelled, and fast, and far,
Under sun, and under star;
Short rests, and weary marches, are
The lot of a Coureur des bois.

But his word is given, his will is bent
To reach the scanty settlement
Before this very night be spent;
Tireless Coureur des bois!

The untaught instinct of savage race,
Something of supple southern grace,
Doth character the manly face
Of the Coureur des bois.

A forest wildness seems round him hung,
An out-door freedom about him flung;
As north-wind keen, the eye, the tongue
Of the Coureur des bois.

At length, the plain about him lies,
Faint lighted by the late moon-rise,
And by the early snow that flies
On, with the Coureur des bois.

What is that sound, on the wind away?
The mighty cry of bird of prey?
Or wood-cat's scream? or wild dog's bay,
Behind the Coureur des bois?

He pauses; he listens with head thrown back;
He whistles; he shoulders more tightly his pack;
He knows the wolves are on his track—
Lonely Coureur des bois!

And now he hurries with might and main,
The wild pack darkens the edge of the plain,
Shall a man by such beasts be ta'en?
God help the Coureur des bois!

Nearer, nearer, over the heath,
Ruthless fangs, and hungry breath;
He shudders to think of such a death,
The fearless Coureur des bois!

He looens in haste his heavy pack,
Then drops it on the snowy track;
Snuffing, the greedy brutes hang back;
On file, the Coureur des bois.

Once more the wolves upon him gain,
And yet before him three miles of plain!
Now doth he nerve and muscle strain,
The weary Coureur des bois.

His strength is almost spent and done;
He turns; he loads and levels his gun,
And now, of twenty bullets, not one
Is left to the Coureur des bois.

Then, whether thinking his hour had come,
And that a man should meet his doom
With all the courage he could assume—
Brave-hearted Coureur des bois,

Or whether—sharp and sore beset—
Some hopeless hope seemed lingering yet,—
Out he took his clarionette,
Staunch-hearted Coureur des bois,

A jovial air that well he knew,
Old French—"Mes belles, amusez-vous,"
With mellow tone he boldly blew,
Gay-hearted Coureur des bois!

And how they gape! how fades each eye!
How wag their rough tails, pleasurably!
Lo, down like tamed lambs, they lie
About the Coureur des bois!

And now he plays a wilder strain,—
Strong Spanish rhythm; and over the plain,
Close followed by his wolfish train,
Marches the Coureur des bois.

Piping "Bonne Jeanne de Lisle," "Listen, my love," and "We'll beat them still;"— Ne'er had he played with such good will,
The hopeful Coureur des bois!

Welcome the ruined Indian mound!
The log-huts, sparsely scattered round!
Food, fire, friends, welcome! safe and sound
Is the Coureur des bois!

When, after the pack, as parting meed,
Some shots the settlers prepare to speed,—
"Down with your guns! 'twere a dastard deed!"
Shouts the Coureur des bois.

"Of wolfish natures, what judges we?
Something good in the brutes must be;
They're better ears, at least, than ye,
Trust a Coureur des bois!"

Orpheus, Chiron, Amphion,
Timotheus, Gallus, Arion,
Which of the tuneful legion
Rivals the Coureur des bois?

Thoughts on the Theatre Italien and the History of Music.

Translated from the French of P. Scudo, "L'Année Musicale."

The "Theatre Italien" is one of the ornaments of Parisian life. If it did not exist, it would be necessary to invent it, in order to maintain in the public and among artists a taste for that true vocal music of which Italy is still the most abundant source. Without any desire to speak ill of the age in which I have the happiness to live, and whose spirit of liberty and justice I prefer to all the false grandeurs of the age of Louis XIV. I am not deceiving myself, nevertheless as to the tendencies which are bearing us on to a world made up of positive interests, far from the sweet fictions of the ideal, and far from the simple and native beauty of art and nature. We are disposed to look with indulgence upon all forms that reveal ingenuity of mind, all that bear testimony to the power of labor and of the human will, and this easy admiration in an order of things in which the excellent alone is of any account, conducts us to an indifference for things simply beautiful that are presented to us, such as light, or the flower of the field.

Grimm, whose esprit was of more value than his character, has well said of that easy admiration which, even in his time, was among the signs of a great alteration in the public taste, "When one is in a state to feel beauty and to seize the character of it, one is frankly, no longer content with mediocrity, and what is bad makes you really suffer and torments you in proportion as you are enchanted with the beautiful. It is false, then, to say that one must not have an exclusive taste, if by that is to be understood, that we must endure mediocrity in works of Art, and even draw something from the bad. These people who are so happily constituted, have never had the happiness of feeling the enthusiasm that is inspired by the chefs d'œuvre of great geniuses, and it is not for such that Homer, Sophocles, Raphael and Pergolèse have labored. If ever this indulgence for poets, painters and musicians becomes general in the public, it is a sign that taste is absolutely lost. * * People who so easily admire bad things, are in no condition to feel beautiful things." Never have these words that fell from Grimm in the midst of the eighteenth century been more true than in our own day. Where is the man of courage, with firmly founded doctrines, who knows how to resist the current of a factitious success, and who at his own risk and peril, dares apply to works of mediocrity that excite the transports of the multitude, a severe criticism, deduced from immutable principles? Do we not see, on the contrary, rare minds that have attained full maturity of talent and all the honors that they can pretend to claim, making base concessions to this degenerate youth which has risen around us, and has already produced a literature worthy of its morals and of the ideal to which it aspires? Courtiers of power and success, these ingenious sophists, who have analyzed everything, have lost, in this microscopic anatomy of infinitely small things, the sense of true beauty and the courage to defend it, when they perceive it in the modest works that are not recommended to them by the favor of the public or of power. It is not esprit that is wanting to our time, but moral courage, and intrepidity of conscience. Now, there can no more be criticism without an ardent and exclusive love for objects of beauty than there can be justice among soft and timorous souls who draw back from the application of strict rules of law. Doubtless it is easier to judge correctly of arts which come under the moral law than it is to classify and appreciate with equity works of intelligence that are addressed to the taste. In Music especially nothing is more rare than a sound judgment upon contemporary works. We seem to be maintaining a paradox when we say that the musical art is that which exacts the greatest amount of real knowledge and delicacy of sentiment on the part of the critic who makes it a point not to give his individual impressions as a deliberate judgment. The processes of the art are very complicated in music and have a very considerable influence upon the merit and the length of a composition that seems to be the spontaneous product of an immaculate conception. Finally, in no department of criticism is it so necessary or so difficult to know the origins and the monuments that have preceded and prepared the way for contemporary works, so that it is especially in the musical art that we should say with Bacon: Veritas filia temporis, non auctoritatis; which may signify that musical beauty is the daughter of tradition, much more than people are generally disposed to believe.

Composers may be divided into two great families, in which may be included more or less closely all the masters whose names have been preserved by history. The one comprises the five or six geniuses of the first order, such as Sebastian Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Rossini, in whom the musical fluid, if I may so speak, is in a pure state, in whom it makes a part of their being, circulating like the blood in the veins, raying out like light, and scattered abundantly and without effort upon the smallest objects upon which it falls. They are because they are, they sing as they breathe, and whatever may be the original differences of their inspiration or of the particular character of their finished works, these predestined geniuses have this in common, that music is the voice of their souls, their essence, and they alone can say with the Psalmist, "Exsurge, gloria mea, exsurge, psalterium et cithara." In the other family are ranged the dramatic composers such as Handel, Gluck, Weber, Spontini, Meyerbeer and their fellows, vigorous singers of human passions, the complications of which they love, but with whom, music properly speaking, is only a subordinate element of dramatic genius. Aside from the contrasts of situation that excite their fancy in the absence of the characters who pose before them, and whose lineaments they please themselves in fixing, these essentially dramatic geniuses of whom we have spoken, lose a great part of their musical virtuality, and like Anteus, their inspiration diminishes in leaving the soil of reality. There are doubtless intermediate points between these two great families of composers, and I do not pretend to assert that those geniuses in whom the musical fluid superabounds are unfit for the painting of the passions: Mozart and Rossini have largely proved the contrary; so, we may point out among essentially dramatic composers, geniuses more or less abundant, who, by certain lyric qualities border closely on the family of pure musicians—Weber, for example. And Nature is so fertile in her combinations that it is always rash to limit her powers of creation.

The French school has produced little but some more or less prolific dramatic composers, among whom may be distinguished Méhul, M. Auber, and, above all Hérold, who, by an inspiration most rich and elevated in its manifestations, approaches both Weber and Rossini. Italy, more richly endowed than France, has however only given birth to melodious interpreters of the sentiments of the heart, to amiable and sweet geniuses who have made use of words and dramatic fable as a theme for their divine songs. The three greatest musicians of the land of Dante and Ariosto are Palestrina, Jomelli and Rossini, of whom the last alone, belongs to the great family of the pure geniuses,

"Che spande di cantar si largo fiume."

To Germany belong the sovereign creators of musical poesy, and no country can dispute superiority with her who has borne Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Sebastian Bach, and later, Weber and Mendelssohn. We see, by this rapid incursion into the domain of history that we have some choice among the elect of eternal beauty; but it is not enough to pronounce these names, if we do not thoroughly know the works to which they are attached, and it is precisely the works of the musical art which it is most difficult to appreciate through the dead letter of a complicated text. I maintain further that we can have a full intelligence of a man of genius only by ascending to the source of his traditions which is not always simple and like a flower, lying at your feet. Rossini, for example, proceeds at once from Cimarosa, Haydn and Mozart; Beethoven from Mozart and Haydn. Mozart is the son of the father of the symphony and of the Italian school, whatever the Germans may say about it. Haydn proceeds from Emanuel Bach, according to his own avowal and from the old Samartini, whose name is scarcely known; the great Sebastian condenses in his great work the labors of the organists and obscure masters of his country, such as Jean Eccard, Stobæus, Henri Albert, pupil of Henri Schütz, etc., etc., whose ideas he recasts and, with these elements elaborated by his mighty hand he prepares the golden age of the great musicians of Germany. In the art of Mozart and Rossini, Gluck and Meyerbeer, the inspiration of genius is not, as we can see, a mere isolated fact of their time and of the schools which have prepared its birth.

One of those fine talkers who treat music just as they treat women, thinking that the younger she is, the more she is worth, attacked us one day with a smile on his lips. "Good day, philosopher," he says to us with a charming ease, how are music and the musicians, to-day, whom you treat so badly?"—"Music is well enough, said I, but the musicians are very well, and there is little fear, now-a-days, that they will die of misery or from any excess of modesty."—"So much the better, monbleu, every body must live and live well, and modesty is just as much out of fashion as the music of Mozart, whom you are reproached with admiring too much.—Mozart, said I, is worth suffering a little martyrdom for in defending his glorious memory, and one can afford to disdain the attacks of those who are not worthy to comprehend him.—La, la, says he, laughing, don't think now that I am talking seriously, and that I share the opinion of your contraditors, but where I do agree with them somewhat is in this, that you are a little too severe in your judgments and that, for a man of mind you do wrong to allow yourself to be vexed at mere songs. Why the deuce can't you let them give you false notes, just as they give you bad wine. France and Europe will be none the worse for it.—And the public? I answered timidly.—The public is an abstraction, he replied, as ungrateful and as vain as a republic.—But Art, what will become of that?—Another abstraction of the German philosophy. I know only composers and artists who execute their music, beyond that, all is a chimera. Serve the maestri and the singers, who will be grateful to you, and leave vain disputes of the schools to the professors of the Conservatoire who can not do anything better.—Do you know, said I, calmly, what your name was two thousand years ago?—I do not care, said he, to look so far back for my origin; my kingdom is in this world, and that is the reason why I love the song that you despise so much. You were called Georgies. And you, said he, what was your name in that age of innocence which I am unworthy to know?—I do not know exactly, said I, for I was probably lost among the obscure listeners who admired the strong and penetrating logic with which Socrates combatted the sophists and disentangled from their wretched fallacies the eternal principles of truth, justice and beauty; this doubtless is the reason that makes me so love Mozart, Weber, Rossini and so many other musicians of genius who fill the history of Art."

Spontini.

Towards the end of July 1831, there was a rehearsal, in the concert-room of the Theatre Royal, Berlin, of Marschner's opera Der Tempeler und die Jüdin, which was to be given on the 3rd of August, the birthday of the late king. The principal artists, the chorus, and the band were all assembled, and the worthy G. A. Schneider was the conductor. Among the small number of persons present as audience, was the amiable and estimable Prince Anton Radziwill, a clever artist and friend of art. The rehearsal had commenced some considerable time, when a peculiarly distinguished individual appeared in the room, and, advancing with a light silent step towards the Prince, held out his hand to greet him. Although by no means tall, the slim aristocratic figure of the new-comer seemed to exceed the ordinary height. Prince Radziwill cordially shook hands with the gentleman, who was a stranger to us, and who wore white trousers, a white waistcoat, and a white cravat, a rather light-blue dress-coat, decorated with orders, shoes and gaiters. A person connected with the theatre, to whom we were indebted for our admission, informed us that the individual who had just entered was Spontini. We should much sooner have supposed him to be an old French nobleman of the Faubourg St. Germain, an Italian Colonel in private clothes, the Spanish Ambassador, or the President of the Cortes, than a musician. After we had an opportunity of observing him more nearly, we recollected that, a considerable time previously, we had seen a portrait, which represented the author of the Vestalin, as a young man of some twenty odd years. The likeness between the picture and the original before our eyes was certainly not striking, but still there was a faint resemblance in some of the features.

Of all the portraits of Spontini, a Parisian lithograph by Grevedon is the best known, and is still to be found in the possession of many of the celebrated composer's admirers. Grevedon has, however, so idealised the head, that he may be said to have overstepped the right of the portrait-painter to treat his subject as favorably as possible. Spontini had a peculiar, imposing, and intellectual, but by no means a handsome face; his form was thin, but his carriage noble and aristocratic, while his manners were pleasing, though not, properly speaking, affectionate and engaging.

Neither he nor his wife, formerly a Mlle. Erard of Paris, by whom he never had any children, and whose conduct, like his own, was most exemplary, ever felt at home during a residence of more than two decades in Berlin. With regard to the German language, each of them learned just enough to speak on those matters which more especially concerned his or her position.

Spontini himself knew about sufficient German to say the most indispensable things, when he was perfectly calm, at rehearsal; but, as soon as he became excited—which he very easily did—he spoke French, and Möser, who, when the General Music-Director conducted the performance, always acted as leader, or the operatic stage manager, Carl Blum, was obliged to undertake the task of dragoman.

Of "Madame Spontini"—Spontini never called his wife otherwise—it is related that, in the course of twenty years she hardly managed to pick up a hundred German words, all relating to household matters, and the fact that she had all her own body linen, as well as that of her husband, washed in Paris and not in Berlin, excited among the matrons of the latter city who heard of it the greatest astonishment. It must, however, be admitted that Spontini's linen was always incomparably white and fresh, while his invariably white cravats, and more especially the so-called "father-murderers" (vatermörder)* reaching up to a level with the nostrils, and which, as we remember hearing from his own lips, he wore of this size "for the sake of warmth," attained a certain comical celebrity in Berlin. He produced the impression of a Grand Seigneur from the Faubourg St. Germain, and we are inclined to doubt that, even had he made himself perfectly master of the German language, he would ever have succeeded in becoming popular and sought after in the musical and social circles of Berlin. In the first place, he was really a man of too great intellect to be understood by the majority of those persons who, from the time he entered on his duties, thought they must attack him "in the interest of German art," and in the next place, he was, with justice, too proud to descend to an intimacy with individuals of merely moderate abilities, and flatter those whom he thoroughly despised.

If we are not mistaken, Spontini first came to Berlin in 1819. Among the persons who approached him with admiration and attached themselves to him was the genial E. T. A. Hoffmann, Kammergerichts-rath, who died, we think, in 1823—greatly to Spontini's disadvantage—and, consequently, could not protect him from the storms which one after another broke over his head. The circle of Spontini's intimate friends was a very limited one, particularly in a musical point of view. It was only with such persons as were masters of French that he could discourse freely without assistance; consequently, with one person who in purely Berlin musical and social circles was a most important and leading man, we mean old Zelter, an intimacy, such as should exist between colleagues, was completely out of the question.

Zelter was a very long-headed and practical man. Even his rudeness, since proverbial, was mostly cunning calculation. There was scarcely another person in the city so well acquainted with, and so able to form an opinion on, the social and artistic affairs of Berlin as he was. Had it been possible to establish between him and Spontini friendly relations such as became two colleagues, he would have found means to protect the General Music-Director against all the storms and plagues prepared for him by envy, falsehood, and calumny.

Two younger men, as musicians towering far above Zelter, Bernhard Klein and Ludwig Berger, were not on a more intimate footing with Spontini: nay, the former, equally worthy of respect, both as an artist and a man, was after the production of his opera, Dido, the small success of which was put down to the account of the General Music-Director, placed in a very painful position towards the latter. Neither Spontini nor Bernhard Klein, a thoroughly noble-minded man, was to blame for this misunderstanding, but solely and wholly some of Klein's friends, who pushed the just admiration they entertained for his musical capabilities—in many respects very considerable and highly cultivated—to the conviction, totally destitute of any foundation, that he must, in addition to everything else, necessarily be a great operatic composer.

Among Spontini's most intimate associates—and this is a characteristic fact—there never was any pre-eminent Berlin artist; there were only two or three musical dilettanti, ready to expire with endless admiration—either real or affected—for him. These persons, seated at his well-served table, used to regale him with the coarsest flattery, and think proper to deceive him continually as to the real feelings and opinions of the musical public in Berlin. After one of the most absurd pieces of calumny, namely, that Spontini had not composed Die Vestalin himself, had found credit, it was an easy task to sow other lies about him among the people, and these lies fell upon equally good ground. Some of them were, for instance, to the effect that he, being a foreigner, either excluded all the operas by German composers from the repertory, or when, despite his great power, he could not prevent the production of one now and then, that he knew how to arrange matters so that the work should have no success.—London Musical World, August 18.

Piano-Forte Composers.

We have omitted TOMASCHKE, WORSICKE, BEGER, and a host of other pianoforte writers from our catalogue raisonnée, of the epoch immediately preceding our own, for the same reason that we have not spoken of LOUIS ADAM and some other composers of the time of Dussek. Though clever men, and the authors of a large variety of works, some of which have unquestionable merit, we cannot find that they have had much influence on their contemporaries; nor have any of them left examples of the sonata, to show their acquaintance with, and attachment to, that grand form of musical composition. But there is one, who, though we name latest, merits perhaps the very first place among all those who were his contemporaries,—we mean CARL MARIA VON WEBER, one of the greatest geniuses and one of the most original and distinguished musicians of all time. The gifted author of Der Freischütz, as our readers well know, ranked among the remarkable pianists of his age. He wrote a great number of works for the pianoforte in many of which the peculiar characteristics of his genius are prominently displayed. Perhaps the most generally popular concert piece ever written is the fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra in E, denominated Concert-stück. This morceau has been for many years the cheval de bataille of numberless players, from Mad. Pleyel, Liszt, and Litoff, to Alexandre Billet and Arabella Goddard. We have heard almost every pianist of fame execute the Concert-stück; Thalberg alone excepted. Weber also wrote a grand concerto in E flat, a brilliant effort, in which, besides a number of passages entirely new, there are orchestral effects of great originality and excellence. The variations and miscellaneous pieces of Weber are well known, as are his quartet in B flat, and other compositions for the chamber—the latter not by any means his best works, while the former are in their way incomparable. But after the Concert-stück, the most highly esteemed of Weber's productions are the four grand sonatas for piano solos in C major, D minor, A flat and E minor. All of these contain movements as remarkable for their freshness as for their ingenuity—as, for example, the rondo finale ("moto continuo") of the first, the andante with variations of the second, and the allegretto and finale (tarentella) of the fourth. But most perfect of all in many respects is the third, in A flat, a work of romantic loveliness—a masterpiece which every pianist who loves his art should know and profit by. The fault of Weber's sonatas—we say it with deference—is a certain diffuseness which damages the regularity of their form, and an occasional monotony arising from the too frequent employment of passages strong resembling each other in character. But the movements we have specialized are almost free from them, while in the sonata in A flat, from the exquisite grain of the principal themes and the captivating luxuriance of the subordinate passages, they become an absolute beauty. Weber, as everybody knows, has had numberless imitators, but few copyists of his pianoforte works than of his dramatic compositions and orchestral overtures, to which, and above all to his Der Freischütz, he owes his universal popularity. He may, therefore, be placed apart, like Beethoven—a lesser star, perhaps, but still of the first magnitude.

OF MENDELSSOHN we may say, as of Beethoven, that he shines apart from the rest of his contemporaries. He was, beyond comparison, the greatest genius and the most learned musician of the age in which he lived, and which he has undoubtedly influenced more than any other individual, Spohr not excepted. The number of Mendelssohn's imitators are legion; the shelves of the music publishers groan under the heavy weight of their productions; you cannot see a new catalogue without observing at least fifty compositions which you may safely swear, without once looking at them, are little better than parodies of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte (the most popular type), or of something else equally his and equally not theirs. But these copyists of a great original, like the other copyists of another great original—Dussek—have chiefly occupied themselves with his mannerisms, being, as we have already said, wholly incompetent to emulate his beauties or his scientific acquirements. The best of them are those who began to write before Mendelssohn, and were afterwards carried away in the vortex of his fascinating style. The most eminent of these, and justly so, are FERDINAND, HELLER, and TAUBERT. Whether either of these wrote sonatas we are unable to say; we have seen many specimens of their works, but not a single sonata—although some stringed quartets a pianoforte quintet, and a few orchestral essays of Heller, who is a very admirable musician, show that he had cultivated the form, however inclined to develop it with undue exuberance. Heller, nevertheless, chiefly owes his influence to his Etudes, which have been assiduously practised by pianists, and have facilitated several peculiarities of mechanism. Most of Taubert's pieces which we have had the opportunity of perusing are caprices, fantasias, et hoc genus omne.

It is unnecessary here to enter into details about the composers of our own time. Nearly the whole may be dismissed as followers, more or less successful, of Mendelssohn, Thalberg, Henri Herz, or Liszt, according to their respective tastes and styles. Of Mendelssohn we need say no more; of Henri Herz we have said enough. Of Thalberg and Liszt we may speak in a separate review, since neither having revealed any tendency to the development of the sonata form, it is not requisite to introduce them now, and our future task will be merely to discuss the influence they have exercised upon the pianoforte as the original of particular schools,—schools of execution rather than of composition. Chopin, Stephen Heller, Sterndale Bennett—the three most distinguished composers for the pianoforte of our own times, with the single exception of Mendelssohn—of course demand a special consideration, and on more important grounds. Hence it, and a crowd of others, romantic, unromantic, and "middling," may also come in for their share of attention. Macfarren, Reber, and other thoughtful writers, whose pianoforte compositions, highly as they must be rated, only occupy a subordinate position to their other works, can hardly be ranked in the same category.

The Sonata.

The noblest form that instrumental music can assume, appears to be going out of date. So much the worse for the art. Let the Sonata be once entirely laid aside, as antiquated, and music will rapidly fall from the high place it now occupies as a beautiful and intellectual pursuit. Sonatas continue to be written, it is true; the German and French catalogues of new music, the latter more rarely than the former, and the English still more rarely than the latter, occasionally announce a new sonata, by some unknown composer; but few of the tried and acknowledged writers ever venture on producing, certainly not on publishing, a work of this gravity and importance. A young musician not seldom begins his career with "a grand sonata," with all the four movements unusually long, which, for want of encouragement, he prints at his own expense. Finding that it does not sell, and that, excepting the few he may have presented to his friends, who do not thank him, the fifty or hundred copies originally issued remain a dead weight upon the shelves of his publisher, he abandons all idea of composing a second sonata, and at once sets to work upon capriccios, fantasias, romances, sketches, songs without words, and whatever he may consider the most marketable commodity. If he be ambitious, and a lover of his art, he will not descend to the variations, rondos, sketches à la valse, &c., with which our pianofortes are covered by those who are neither; he follows, however, in the train of his contemporaries, and gives birth to a series of short movements in the capriccio form—that is in no form whatever—which he dignifies by names borrowed from others, or names of his own coinage, having no intelligible connection with the works to which they are applied. Whether from all this farrago of the fancy, anything clear and symmetrical will arise, to induce us to regret the sonata no longer, it is for some commanding genius to prove. Mendelssohn invented a beautiful form, in the Lieder ohne Worte; but he exhausted it himself. To him it was but an exercise of the fancy, an easing of his continually inventive brain from some of the ideas with which it was overstocked, and which he did not find convertible to loftier purposes; but his imitators—for the most part unblest with one idea in a twelvemonth, destitute of fancy and invention—attempting to emulate him, have only demonstrated their incompetency. Their Lieder ohne Worte are little better than an empty figure of accompaniment to which a meagre and passionless tune has been made to fit, with infinite and unprofitable labor. So true is this, that the title of Songs without Words—in German, French, or English—affixed to a piece of new music, predisposes us against the author, and takes away all the inclination we might otherwise have felt to look at his work. To Mendelssohn, also, may be traced the endless forms which the capriccio, or caprice, has assumed within the last twenty years. But his imitators—who include, we may almost say, the entire race of modern composers for the piano—Independently of the barrenness of their invention, have altogether overlooked that element which in Mendelssohn's smallest efforts is never absent—the symmetry and consequence of form which ally them more or less to the sonata.

The fantasia used to be regarded, among the old writers, as a sort of improvisation, and was an exception, not a rule. But what would Mozart have thought, had he lived now, and found nine works out of ten devoted to the pianoforte and other instruments, fantasias—long or short—in other words improvisations, without plan or order—unmeaning jumbles of themes, good or bad, which might belong to anything else than that in which they appear, with quite as much or quite as little propriety? Mozart would not have believed his ears. The ingenious development, for working out, of a theme—which was wont to signalise, not merely fantasias, but actual improvisations—he would have sought in vain; much more in vain the elaborate fugue, demonstrating the the composer's facility in counterpoint, that lent interest to the fantasias of the elder masters.

Some will have it that Beethoven completely exhausted the sonata. But this is a manifest error. Beethoven rather showed, by the infinite variety he imparted to it, that the sonata was inexhaustible. He was aware of all the latest resources of the art—as may be well supposed, since he had so large a share in their invention; but he could find no better or more convenient field for their development than this particular one, which already existed, and already, if constant use can wear, had been worn threadbare by Mozart and Haydn—to say nothing of Dussek, a composer too often disregarded by superficial writers, in considering the history and progress of the art. But Beethoven came to the sonata with a world of new ideas; in his hands it was as fresh, and vigorous, and young, as when it first issued from the prolific brain of Haydn, who by right of this one invention enjoys the undisputed title of "Father of Instrumental Music."

The numberless and prodigious inspirations of Beethoven still filling the world with new delight and wonder, it was an impossible task for any instrumental writer immediately coming after him to take him as a model, without becoming his slavish imitator. This shows Mendelssohn and Spohr, the two original composers of instrumental music in our day, in a worthier light. What they accomplished, when it is considered how near they were to Beethoven, must be admitted to be extraordinary. In their symphonies, quartets, and other productions of the kind, while adhering to the plan of Haydn, which cannot be profitably neglected, they revealed new thoughts, new means of development, and entirely new styles. There is not a shadow of resemblance in the writings of either of them to those of Haydn, Mozart, or Beethoven. Spohr, the elder of the two, may be said to have completely fulfilled his mission, while Mendelssohn, the younger, was unhappily cut off in his prime. Happily he lived to complete the oratorio of Elijah, the greatest masterpiece of modern art. Wholly original as are the manners of these great men, they emulated their predecessors—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven,—in their reverent adherence to the one true form—that of THE SONATA.

Scientific Music and Congregational Singing.

We contend for the feasibility of congregational singing only conditionally. We would not advocate its adoption by any church that is not willing to use the means requisite for its highest success. These are three:

1. The service of a competent leader or precentor.*
2. Stated and frequent meetings for practice by the congregation.
3. Suitable books, in which both hymn and tune are brought under the eye at once, and which shall be in the hands of all the worshippers.

The expense, thus incurred, would doubtless, to a considerable extent be borne by individual worshippers. Still, "the poor ye have with you always." Some there will be who will need aid; and the church should see to it that such provision be made as will enable any and all who are willing to do their duty, to qualify themselves for doing it to edification. Especially should every facility be furnished to the children, and vigorous effort be put forth to induce them to make the best improvement of their opportunities.

In concluding these observations, we should like to enlist the conscience of the reader in the matter of direct effort for the cultivation of the musical powers. It surely cannot be obligatory on us to participate personally in the songs of Zion, without it being our duty to qualify ourselves for doing this the most happily.

Music, like every science, forms a department of God's truth. As such, it has its laws no less fixed and unalterable than those of any other science. These laws have been ascertained and systematized, just as in the other sciences. As in chemistry, it is found, by experiment, that certain gases, combining in certain definite proportions, form water, so in music, experiment shows that to produce a given effect, sounds must follow each other according to a regular scale, in which the notes are separated from each other by intervals, some longer, some shorter, but so mathematically exact, that notes struck together in certain combinations, invariably produce harmony, while, sounded together in other combinations, they always produce discord. Only as these laws are observed, can sounds give pleasure, or awaken any specific emotion. The same sounds given out regardless of these laws, annoy the ear, and may even cause exquisite pain. Now, as one may have considerable practical knowledge of chemistry, without being a scientific chemist, so nature, practice, and observation, may have given one considerable acquaintance with music, who has never been taught it scientifically. Still, it is only as the natural musician really, however unconsciously, conforms to the principles enunciated by science, that he can produce any desired effect. Now, since the science of music embraces all that nature and experiment have taught all men in all time hitherto about this branch of truth, it is presmable there is no one so gifted as not to be capable of increasing his skill, by availing himself of instruction. The more nearly the praises of God's house are conformed to the true teachings of musical science, the more likely, other things being equal, their design will be accomplished.

There seems to be in the minds of many of the advocates of congregational singing, a repugnance to the idea of church music being scientific. But does not this spring from a misapprehension of the term? Any music that is music must be scientific. All that science does is to teach how the Creator has constituted things; and how, according to that constitution, certain effects are to be produced. Scientific is not opposed to simple and appropriate. The peculiarities of different occasions are not overlooked. Science, truly so called, will prescribe a very different style of music for the house of God, from that with which the sensibilities are plied in the temples of folly. But none the less will she aim at freedom from every violation of melody and harmony, and at bringing out as fully as possible every resource for expressing naturally and truly the sentiment sung, and for enhancing its impression on the heart. While, therefore, no one is to wait until he has made himself a scientific musician, before joining in singing, it is not still the manifest duty of every one to fit himself, so far as his means will admit, for serving God in this delightful and elevating exercise the best he can—on scientific principles?—Rev. J. R. Scott.

Jullien.

Poor Jullien!—whenever the bill is first beheld of the new enterprise in Covent Garden, this will be the exclamation of every candid lover of music. Now he is gone we can do him justice. Remoteness seems to be essentially a condition of just criticism. Not but that M. Jullien managed, in the twenty years he was among us, very effectually to live down the solemn sneering he first encountered. There was a traditional dullness in our orchestras, which had so long been considered dignity, that when the little Frenchman presumed to outrage it in his appearance and vivacity, as a matter of course, he was called a quack. There was also something so strange and irregular in the novel resources he employed to give character and vigor to some of his dance music—his pistol-shots and whip-crackings, his gongs and orchestral shoutings—when his musicians seemed to grow envious of the glory of their instruments, and suddenly break in for a share, that among the dignified and somnolent of our musical cognoscenti, he was a charlatan forthwith. But all this was so much smoke—thin and transparent enough, it is true—that was sent up wreathing, to excite attention. People soon began to see that under it was flame! It was discovered after a time that this much scoffed at entrepreneur was not merely a being composed of a white waistcoat, striking gestures, startling pistol-shots and gongs, and a rather poetic style of literature. Year by year the fact came out that he had a purpose in him and a growth. As he found a public, he furnished music. He fed taste, he did not deprave it. He began by simply giving the world a round of polkas and quadrilles; he ended by presenting it with nights devoted to Beethoven and Mozart. He commenced with attacking the senses, he finished with entering the soul. His whole career had a progressive character, that gives us fair grounds to suppose he contemplated from the first a gradual improvement of the public taste. His very outset seems to show this. He started with giving expansion to the conception of Musard. With the latter arose the notion of addressing music to the million, which, however light and exciting, should be enjoyed for itself alone. With the former this idea expanded into a scheme for elevating the music, till at length it was of a character to refine as well as delight. That M. Jullien, in carrying it out, sensibly aided in the spread of a musical taste among us, it would be perfectly futile to deny. The art history of our time cannot fail to acknowledge the service rendered by such means as he presented, in its cheapness, excellence, and freedom, to the gradual diffusion of an improved taste among the million. We can look back, then, with respect to the career of our lost musician, and readily excuse his eccentricities in the presence of his achievements.—Weekly Dispatch.

Madame Lancia.

Of Mad. Lancia the readers of the Musical World have already heard something. In April, 1858, our own correspondent at Turin wrote us a flaming account of the debut of Mad. Lancia, an English lady,—then only seventeen years of age—in the Barbiere. Our correspondent wrote evidently under the influence of much excitement. It was certain, however, that the young lady had made a great hit. Mad. Lancia came to London the same summer, but did not create a profound sensation in the concert room. She then went on a starring tour to the provinces, and was very successful both in English and Italian opera. In Dublin and Edinburgh, more especially, she grew into high favor, and some of the local journals attempted to establish comparisons between her and Miss Louisa Pyne and Mlle. Piccolomini, all of which went to assert the superiority of Mad. Lancia. We believe the fair artist also performed last year in a series of operas at the Surrey Theatre. We have now heard Mlle. Lancia twice within the week in Norma, and can speak with some confidence as to her powers and capabilities. If style and method alone were to constitute a great singer, Mad. Lancia would, unquestionably, be one of the greatest before the public. Her mode of producing the voice is most admirable, and has evidently been derived from the best Italian teaching. Her voice, a real soprano, is neither particularly full nor round in quality, nor has it yet attained weight to adapt it to the performance of grand parts like Norma. It is, nevertheless, a most telling voice, extremely sympathetic, and always full of meaning. When we add that Mad. Lancia—at least as far as we were enabled to judge from two trying performances—invariably sings in tune, it will be acknowledged that the lady's vocal excellences are by no means inconsiderable. Of her merits as an actress we can speak with no less assurance. She is certainly deficient in largeness of style, and wants breadth and power for high tragic parts, as may be easily surmised, considering her youth and her size, which is somewhat petite. Her conception of the character, nevertheless, is wonderfully true to nature, is striking, and at times even powerful. Moreover, the lady has great earnestness and feeling, and is as graceful as a fawn. We saw nothing in the whole performance, indeed, which did not please us infinitely, and much which surprised no less than delighted us. Weighing the lady in the scale of our critical consideration, we have no hesitation in saying that she is the best dramatic vocalist we have had on the English stage since Adelaide Kemble. Mad. Lancia is extremely young, and has many things to learn, but that she is destined at this moment to become a great artist is our firm conviction.

A NEW SINGER.—N. P. Willis, in the Home Journal, gives us the first tidings of a new lady singer, Miss Kellogg. The poet is on board a yacht on the Hudson. He says:

Fair was the craft, but there was another craft, of which she bore the witchcraft unaware! We will tell of it in prose—if we can.

The guests of the gay admiral (Stebbins) were a gentleman and lady, and a problem with which their two lives had been entrusted—a daughter, with not only wondrous music in her voice, but with what music expresses in her soul. Mocking-bird-like many have the utterance, but few know the full burthen of what they utter. Miss Kellogg feels genius while she sings the song of it—the heart-cry and its echo both her own!

The reader will see that we have been "sung to." It is a wonderful singer of whom we write—a young girl of eighteen, who is to shine like a rainbow for the Many, with an inner rainbow visible to the Few. Our friend Stebbins (brother of the inspired sculptress of that name) is one of those who walk the world seeing the inner iris of things beautiful; and, chancing to fall in with this bright creature, he wished to share his wonder at her gifts. He brought her up to sing to us—and she sang! And we thank him for a foretaste of a witchery that is to tried upon the world.

Mr. Kellogg informs us that his daughter is to appear in public in the coming season. Her friends have urged it as the destiny for one who is too gifted for private life, and her studies have been, for a year past, preparatory to this. She is delicate, and it is a marvel with what power she sings; but the quality of her voice, and the intensity of expression with which her music is laden, constitute a charm which seems to us wholly peculiar. With her intensity and impassioned force, the physical powers will undoubtedly be perfected, but the enchantment will be in the genius of which it is the utterance. We shall look forward with exceeding interest to the interpreting of her music by the world!

A POET'S ADVICE TO POETS.—The New York Evening Post is edited by one of our most noted native bards, a fact which gives weight to the following article from its columns. As it is capable of general application, we copy it entire:

"I would the gods had made thee poetical," says Touchstone, in Shakspeare's "As you Like It," to the country lass, Audrey. We cannot adopt Touchstone's wish in addressing our correspondents. So many of them are poetical already that we have absolutely no room for half the reasonably good verses which are sent us. We pray such of our correspondents, therefore, as are of poetical turn, and as have sent us their poems for our columns, not to take it for granted that we think them unworthy of publication if they do not see them in print, but charitably to suppose, which is the fact, that we have more such matter than we can find room for. Moreover, should they see in our journal verses not quite so good as their own, while their own do not appear, we pray them to suppose that, in sending them, as we are obliged to do, very hastily, it is easy to make a wrong choice among so many.

The anxiety which poets feel for the fate of what they have taken a great deal of pains to produce is natural, even if we suppose that, as a class they entertain a modest idea of their own merit. It is impossible for us, however, to do what so many of them wish, that is to say, to return their manuscripts if we do not use them, or to answer by letter, or in the columns of our paper, the inquiries they make concerning them.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

From Spohr's Autobiography.

From Munich Spohr writes as follows (1815):

"Our sojourn here was replete with musical treats. On the very day after our arrival we attended an interesting concert, the first of a series of twelve, given every winter by the Royal orchestra. These concerts are very well attended and fully merit their success. The orchestra consists, beside reeds and brass, of twenty-four violins, eight violas, ten violoncellos and six contrabassi. The Violins and Basses are excellent, and the brass, horns excepted, the same. The programme always contains one entire symphony—which deserves the more praise since it is elsewhere sadly going out of fashion and the taste of the public for this noblest kind of instrumental music decaying, an overture, and two vocal and two instrumental solo-pieces. As the Munich Royal Orchestra still retained its old reputation as one of the best orchestras of the world, my expectations were raised very high; in spite of which I was greatly surprised by the manner in which Beethoven's C minor symphony was performed. I think it is hardly possible to execute this symphony with more energy, power, and at the same time, delicacy, with a stricter observance of all degrees of soft and loud, than it was played there. The composition proved under such hands more effective, than I ever thought it could be, although I had often heard it performed, even under the direction of its author, at Vienna. Still I saw no reason, to change my opinion of it. Notwithstanding many single beauties, it is deficient as a whole. Especially the theme of the first part is lacking that dignity, which to my mind, is essential to the beginning of a symphony. Setting this aside, however, this short, easily-remembered theme is well qualified for thematic treatment, and cleverly interwoven with the other principal ideas of the first part. The Adagio in A flat is partly very fine, only the same thing is said over again too often, which at last becomes tiresome, although the figure of the accompaniment grows richer and richer. The Scherzo is highly original and has a truly romantic coloring; the Trio however with its rattling contrabass-passages is too baroque for my taste. The last part with its hollow noise gives the least satisfaction. It is such a happy idea of Beethoven, here to introduce the Scherzo again, one might envy the composer for it. The effect is magnificent. What a pity that this good impression is so quickly dispersed by a renewal of the former noise."

It is hard to believe, that Spohr, admirer of Beethoven's genius as he professedly was, should not only so misunderstand the character of this symphony in 1815, as to misconstrue its veriest beauties into blemishes, but should never afterwards have corrected himself. It clearly shows how far the judgment of Spohr (and those inferior to him in musical knowledge and general education), can be trusted.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 20, 1860.

Editorial Correspondence.

V.

Freiburg, (en Suisse), August 20, 1860.

One does not come to Switzerland for music. There has been plenty of poetry about Alpine horns and ranz des vaches. But this was always music for the unmusical and sentimental, for the seekers of the picturesque and marvellous, a rude affair at the best. The slender material it has furnished has been long since used up and despoiled of all it had of nature by the genre painter tribe of musical composers or mere concert virtuosos. What one now hears of Alpine horns and Alpine melodists, among the Alps, is utterly demoralized to a poor trade, and all its artlessness is affectation. It has become one of the petty annoyances that everywhere disturb the traveller who loves nature, and which do their best to break the spell of mountains clad in everlasting snow, with green alps and matten clinging to their sides, and lovely valleys, sprinkled with pretty cottages and chalets and churches picturesque if humble, down into the very midst of which the icy glaciers creep, reflecting double sunshine on the little flower-enameled, green and happy spots, where human industries and habitations cluster. But first let us resume the thread which brought us here.

I wrote last from Paris. A railroad ride of a whole night and half the next day, through monotonous wide plains where rows of spindling poplars everywhere stand guard as thick as Paris soldiers and no other tree relieves the eye (a good country for a night ride)—through the wide vineyards of the Champagne, a crop interesting to the dry imagination, but not half so handsome as our Indian corn—then, as day broke, and the blue mountains of the Vosges loomed up in the horizon, through more interesting fields of grain, with men and women reaping—costumes beginning to grow more picturesque, and houses too,—still everywhere the everlasting poplars, ludicrous scare-crow apologies for trees—and finally the darker backs of the hills of the Black Forest, beyond the Rhine, in Baden—scenes more and more exciting in themselves and in the eager expectation—brought us in a bright morning (one of the few such in a season of almost unprecedented raininess) to the famous old Alsatian capital of Strasburg. Of course the attraction was the great Cathedral, which no one who has read Goethe would willingly fail to see. It was the crowning moment in my experience in the sublime and beautiful in architecture. It was more akin to the great Art in music, to Symphony and Fugue, than any work which ever won me and subdued me and at the same time gave me freedom through the sense of sight. The union of majestic, graceful outline and proportion in the general masses with the most delicate and lace-like detail carved in stone, both in its magnificently soaring tower and spire, the highest in Europe, and in the whole exterior and interior of the building, the perpetual revelation of unnoticed exquisite designs that seemed to grow and blossom out of the shade of pillars, walls and arches; the religious, unitary feeling of the whole, which reconciled and harmonized all this strange wealth of detail, even to the most grotesque freaks of fancy; the monuments which it contains, and the monument which it is, of Erwin of Steinbach, who designed it, and of his daughter who executed many of his designs, and whose statue at a side porch was to me as fine a monument to the inspired soul of woman as that of Joan of Arc; even the droll and pretty fancy which has placed Erwin himself in a little gallery beside the altar, leaning his chin on his hands and contemplating a beautiful pillar he had planned as one last touch of superabounding exquisite creativeness; the surroundings too of the great Dom, the quaint old houses in the square, with their steep, stair-notched gables, and their round port-hole windows thrusting themselves out all over the red and gray tiled roofs (a common feature in the town and of the region); particularly the house in which Erwin himself lived; then, too, the fine view from the platform of the tower, over the quaint city, over rich green plains, over the gleaming Rhine (my first sight of it! sing, Robert Franz! Den Rhein, den heiligen Strom!), a vast circle enclosed by the mountains of the Black Forest on the East and by those of the Alsace (the Vosges) on the West:—all this, and more which must be reserved for an especial chapter on cathedrals, made an evening and a morning at Strasburg one of the periods that can never fade out in the light of new experiences. The music which I chanced to hear in that cathedral was a droning chant of priests, at daily service; the organ-playing beastly bad.

That evening it was my rare good fortune (there and then so unexpected) to see RISTORI in the Italian version of Schiller's Maria Stuart. It was her only night in Strasburg: and the theatre a beautiful one, much like the Grand Opera in Paris, but finer and far more comfortable. The players were all Italian and all good. Ristori is noble in appearance, if not handsome. And what a soul animates her! what a high and true dramatic fire! Her voice is singularly rich and lends itself most musically to all the modulations and demands of feeling and of passion. I thought that human speech had never sounded to my ear so noble and so musical as in that large and sweet Italian utterance of Ristori. It was a luxury to find that, with but small experience in listening to Italian, I could understand her. She is truly a great actress; and without any of that chill, repulsive element which oftentimes disturbed the finest moments of Rachel.

The next evening placed me at the foot of another exquisitely beautiful cathedral, that of Freiburg in Baden, or as it is commonly called, Freiburg in the Breisgau. It is not so great as that at Strasburg, but it is remarkable as being almost the only finished design of that kind, which is preserved entire. It also hails from the Erwin family; some think from Erwin's master, whoever he may have been: the builders in these times were too great to take care of their own fame. Outside it is a form of perfect beauty; you can look at it forever. The inside is comparatively uninteresting. But the old town nestled round it, in that rich wide plain, with green, vine-clad hills, half mountains, rising sharp against it on one side; with its clean streets through which fresh rills of water run, and dainty sidewalks paved with a mosaic of smooth pebbles; and its queer old houses, and queerer costumes, seems to retain more of its primitive simplicity than most old European towns through which the travelling current passes. It is not yet grown too civilized and Baden-Badenized, like many of the sweet spots of Switzerland. In the morning, a lovely one, it was market day, and the square on three sides of the Cathedral swarmed with peasants, women chiefly, from the whole country round, all talking as fast as possible and faces full of sunshine, selling strawberries and cherries and all sorts of little fruits as well as homelier matters, and exhibiting the most picturesque and odd variety of costume, only to be equalled, we imagine, in the towns of Brittany and Normandy; some in clean white caps; some in scarlet handkerchiefs; some with a helmet-like contrivance of black silk or satin, with great broad vans flapping on each side; and some with exceedingly high stove-pipe hats, of the masculine city style, made of bright yellow glazed leather or canvas—singular objects these last. From the neighboring hill top, where we took a charming walk among the grape vines and blue harebells, we stood over against the beautiful cathedral spire, and looked through its lace-like open work, and down upon the parti-colored swarm about its base. Strains of rich music swelled up from the town; a fine regimental band, rehearsing evidently with severe fidelity; and the music was Beethoven's, the overture to Fidelio! And did it not do the solitary traveller good to hear it? Such things are to the wanderer in a changed world like the stars; he hails them as of the few outward presences which he still has in common with those from whom he has so lately parted in the other hemisphere.

Again along the Rhine, in comfortable railroad car, past vineyards, pretty houses and old ruined castles, into Basle; sombre, quaint, historical old place, without much for the passing visitor to see; yet something to reflect upon as he sat sipping tea under an arbor on the bridge above the rapid Rhine. It rained repeatedly, as it had done ever since I first saw land in Europe. It would not do to undertake the promised first walk through the Münsterthal; and so by railroad I must push on doubtfully to Zurich, past the old ruins of the cradle of the house of Hapsburg, and past many charming views both of the mountains of the Jura, and first glimpses also of snow mountains on the south. In Zurich it still rained although I got a sunset picture of its lovely lake, and a fine panorama of the distant mountains from its hohen Promenade. But rain was still the rule, the habit of the season, and sunshine the exception; and thus far had I experimentally ventured into Switzerland, to learn whether it would do to venture farther, and make the tour on foot of the Bernese Oberland and of Mt. Blanc. Providential perseverance! We will attempt at least the Rigi. Starting in fair weather, wrapped in cloud and rain in crossing the lake of Zug to Arth and Goldau, whence we were to ascend, we had the satisfaction of a clear sunset, and a splendid forenoon (although the sun rose in rain) for the complete enjoyment of that unrivalled view of lakes and mountains.

I shall not describe what has been so often described before; but only say that I was happy in coming just at the turning point of the weather. After a lovely day at Lucerne and passage of its enchanting lake, past the Tell scenes and monuments to Altorf, the foot-tramp up the St. Gotthard road, and over the Devil's Bridge, the Furca pass, the great glacier of the Rhone, the wild and dreary Grimsel, down, all day down, the beautiful, romantic Hasli-thal, to Meiringen, and past the blue glaciers of Rosenlauri and of Grindelwald, and again up, by the frowning sides of the great snow-topped giants, Wetterhorn, and Mittenhorn and Eiger to the summit of the Alp, where Jungfrau with her "silver horns" rose in all the splendor of her snowy purity immediately before us, and avalanches thundered down at harmless distance, and so down into the paradise of Lauterbrunnen and of Interlachen, was in eight days accomplished. Nearly two of these, however, kept us prisoners by rain; the rainy time had reached its climax, and the great flood of that Friday which kept me in the little village on the Gotthard road, while rocks and earth came tumbling from the mountain walls across the road, and while the village (in the Catholic canton of Uri) was in a state of apprehension and excitement, and the church bell was kept ringing, after the old traditional custom, as if to ward off danger, only made the following day more bright and lent life to the picturesque and grand scenes opening upon us everywhere, by creating innumerable streams and cascades, making it all "Lauter-brunnen"—fountains only. From that time the sun, and the good star of the traveller, have been victorious. Beautiful weather has become the rule; the first half of the long dreamed of Swiss tour is accomplished. Rich days they have been indeed, in many senses; but now there is no time to tell what they have yielded; we must hive and make the honey at more leisure; for still the flowers and the blue summer days invite to wander.

— So, after this digression, I must take another letter to say what little is to be said of the musical impression of Swiss life and nature, and of the famous Freiburg organ, and the fine one at Berne likewise. D.

Musical Chit-Chat.

ITALIAN OPERA.—We see by the daily papers that the Cortesi troupe commences a short season of opera at the Boston Theatre on Monday evening.

NIBLO'S THEATRE.—THE EXTEMPORIZED OPERA.—Last evening this theatre—imbedded in one hotel and opposite stacks of others, and hence so favorably situated that without malice prepense the travelling crowds who must go out after dark to find a substitute for distant firesides in the thirty-two States—not counting Territories—was well attended to wit, near the first representation of an opera troupe under the direction of Madame Cortesi, if a lady can direct an opera, which we doubt. At the appointed time the exceedingly keen vital, and somewhat American looking, Karl Anschutz took the highest chair of the orchestra, and the introduction to the opera began: the violins with "mutes" on emitted the stifled, consumptive wail of the Tragedy in perspective; and to this poetry of the composer—which has no ictus of rude health or superficial glare to commend it, but is as delicate as Arry Schaeffer's Christus Consolator—was added a delectable double shuffle of an accompaniment in the noises of the lobbies—there being out-of-doors-wise accommodations of this kind at Niblo's only second to the curbstones of the streets. When, however, the curtain rose, and the Brindisi, or demirep drinking-song—which is as much like a drinking-song as a burcarole is, and no more, but has a very striking melody—and the audience had something which marked the time, then the attention was perfect and the applause huge. Madame Cortesi, who did Violetta, is a soprano of dramatic vigor and power, and commands the plaudits of the audience. Signor Musiani, the tenor, has a great deal of force, but is wanting in dulcet tenderness of tone, though his intentions that way are good. Amodio, who it seems has a brother—is engaged with him at this establishment; and the public is promised a sight and hearing of both. If Amodio's brother can beat Amodio he will do more than any other baritone has achieved here.

The public were very well pleased last night. New York has so many artists of one sort or another that a second opera is possible; but with a thin orchestra and thinner chorus, and such scenery and decorations as an Apollo of infinite mercy vouchsafes. This is a free country for artists, and if they vibrate betwixt the Academy and the sacred concerts of lager beer saloons, it is nobody's business; but, we think, if the harmony of the muses can be transferred to the Academic treasurer's box, it would be better to have one establishment, for certain it is that two opera-houses are one too many, and sometimes two too many. "Birds in their little nests agree," but we believe the poet says nothing about their union ticket after they learn to sing.—N. Y. Tribune, Sept. 19.

Meanwhile, the Academy—that abode of Caryatides and Cantabiles—still flings wide its portals to a generous public. Madame Fabbri, the puissant soprano, is there; Mr. Brignoli, having exhausted Newport and recovered from his Canadian cough, is there; Madame Colson is there. In place of well-worn operas, we are to have—see advertisements—The Sicilian Vespers, which was played often enough last year to make the singers familiar with their parts. This is an opera of large meanings and elaborations, and should command a crowded attendance.—Ibid.

A WORD ABOUT ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.—A word to the wise is never out of place, and any useful hints that we throw out for the benefit of those who seek them, (may their numbers never grow less!) will, we are assured, be received in a thankful spirit, and with "exceeding great rejoicing." We have at various times and on various occasions (to be explicit) remarked that where so many branches in that divine art, music, are progressing, and cultivating a refined taste among our musical masses, the particular department of orchestra music in our theatres never rises above that dull niveau of mediocrity, and too often vulgarity, (excuse the word,) which never seeks to raise the audience to its standard of refining emotions, but would pander to the popular taste, which, for want of that artistic impulse, can never be brought to a knowledge of better things. We hope to be able to chronicle an improvement in this branch of the heavenly art. This is, indeed, an age of progress, although in some things the truth is very slow in coming to the minds of those that would seek it.—Fitzgerald's City Item.

It is pleasant to say that it is not so with us in Boston. A few evenings since we happened to drop in at the Museum, where Dion Bourcicault's Irish drama of the "Colleen Bawn" has been raging for nearly four weeks. Expecting to hear between the acts the usual arrangements of hacknied overtures and trashy folk-songs,—always strongly suggestive of half a dozen instruments which are permanently absent,—we were agreeably surprised to find the music not only adapted very cleverly to the limits of the instruments, (not in the hands of first-rate artists either,) but abounding in fine traits of happy characterization and bits of beautiful, genuine melody. This was the work of Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, the leader of the orchestra. It is remarkable how well the composer has improved his opportunities. We have no sympathy for the Potpourri-style which prevails in the Overture; but we admire some of the incidental music, for instance, the strain accompanying the entrance of Corregan into the death-chamber of the murderer, Mann, which comes as unexpectedly and falls as deliciously upon the senses as a genuine Van Dyck in a second-hand print-shop. It is only a pity that among, that multitude, who convert the most touching sentence, if Warren speaks it, into a joke, these good things are nearly, if not entirely lost.

FATHER HEINRICH, a venerable musician well known to all the elder musical people hereabouts, desires us to "honor the programmatic prospectus" which follows with an insertion in our columns. It certainly gives promise of good things. When shall we hear the performance?

THE COLUMBIAD, or
THE ROYAL EAGLE OF THE THURINGIAN FOREST, and the REPUBLICAN CONDOR OF AMERICA.

A free romantic Phantasy for full Orchestra, commemorative of a visit to Dortor List in Weimar.

PROGRAMME:

1. Introduzione volante: The eagle soars majestically in the lofty current of erudite Harmony.
2. Allegro canonicale: A Duetto Dance "scherzando, in Moto contrario," by the noble Birds.
3. Incantazione. A Tone-Picture "concertante," The Spirit Bond.
4. Fuga al Prestissimo agitato. The Parting.
5. Finale trionfante. The chivalrous Condor wings his return flight to Fredonia, the El Dorado of Hail Columbia and Yankee Doodle, as newly constructed with brilliant variations, and recently performed under the title of the Columbiad, with marked distinction, at the Author's Monster Concert in Prague.

A fragment of an artistic journey in Europe, and a humble contribution to the musical annals of both hemispheres, by Anthony Philip Heinrich, author of an heroic, vocal and instrumental oratorio: "The Ornithological Combat of Kings in the Air, or the Condor of the Andes and Eagle of the Cordilleras."

OPERATIC.—There should certainly be an opera written, taking the Tower of Babel for a theme; the polyglot company, now engaged at the Academy, could render the great scene when the confusion of tongues occurs, with uncommon effect. Fabbri, Stigelli and Muller might sing in German; Colson and Genibrel could take up their parts in French; Susini, Mrs. Strakosch, Brignoli and a few others would be ready to join in Italian; Patti, the American prima donna, as she is called, would proclaim her nationality in pure accents, and there certainly is an English woman in the chorus. Everybody remembers her. Sometimes, indeed, the artists appear to be rehearsing some such morceau as this: for instance, last week, when Genibrel sang John di Procidia in French, while the rest of the opera was performed in Italian.—N. Y. Express.

Mlle. LACOMBE.—A Paris paper says: "Foreign theatres continue to seduce away our best artists. Mlle. Lacombe, a singer of reputation and great talent, has been engaged upon splendid conditions, for the coming season, by Mr. Charles Boudousquie, the impresario of the New Orleans Opera, which is to reopen on the 1st of November next."

A PRIVATE OPERA HOUSE.—It is stated that Dr. Ward, the well known music amateur and composer, is about building a house on the Fifth Avenue, near Fortieth street, which is to have a front of 100 feet, and which will contain a private theatre for operatic representations.

GARIBALDI IN PESARO.—The Sardinian troops have taken the birthplace of Rossini. It is said that the mere proximity of Garibaldi has already awakened the people of the Roman States, and the town of Pesaro has the honor of inaugurating the liberating movement. Pesaro will long be remembered as the birthplace of that "Swan" whose music enchanted all Europe forty years ago, and who still leads a life of Epicurean ease at Paris. One would think that Rossini might ransack the treasures of his rich invention for something like a national air for his liberated country, and thus suppl. the want of which Garibaldi so feelingly complained the other day. "Every nation," said the Liberator, "has some song which: it once rouses the patriotic ardor of its sons. France has the 'Marseillaise,' England 'God save the Queen,' America 'Hail Columbia'; but we, who if we do not excel in music excel in nothing, have not a single patriotic strain." Strange it is that a nation so overflowing with musical genius as Italy should not have given birth to anything more national than "Viva Enrico, il nostro re"! We have often wondered why Rossini, Verdi, Puccini, Cimarosa, Pacini, and their compeers, have done nothing in the patriotic line.

SAN FRANCISCO.—The Squires Escott English opera troupe has commenced a second season at the Opera House, having added a number of new operas to its repertoire.

PHILADELPHIA.—Patti has been singing in The Barber and as Violetta in La Traviata. The Natali sisters are also singing here. Lucrezia Borgia was performed on Saturday last. The Bulletin says of the performance:

Miss Agnes Natali has not heretofore exhibited such extraordinary dramatic power, nor such vocal executive skill. In the cabaret to the opening air, which most prime donne are unable to sing, and therefore omit it, she showed great flexibility. But in the more dramatic situations she was magnificent, and excited immense enthusiasm. Her sister, Miss Fanny, was a good Orsini; Signor Barili did better than was expected of him, and Signor Brignoli exerted himself to an unusual degree. We are requested to contradict the report that this gentleman refused to sing with the Misses Natali at their debut in the Trovatore. On the contrary he wished to sing, and complained of having a rôle that he is fond of given to another artist. The most friendly feeling exists between him and the Misses Natali.

The season is to close with the Misses Natali in Norma, the part of the Druid priestess being one in which Miss Agnes is especially great, having sung it a dozen times in Havana, creating an enthusiasm surpassing that excited by any other artist that has ever sung it there, from Steffanono great days down to the present time. Signor Stigelli, the great tenor of last season, is to play Polliouo.

DEATH OF T. D. RICE.—Thomas D. Rice, the originator of negro musical and terpsichorean delinquencies, died in New York recently, in the 52d year of his age.

As an actor in his peculiar rôle he had no equal in his palmy days, attaining a world-wide reputation as "Jim Crow." That character was his forte; he never attempted any other, and his comicality in that part established for him a name and fame. As "Jim Crow" Rice could fill any metropolitan or provincial theatre to overflowing, and from the very simplicity of his performance, excited screams of laughter. He danced with the negro grace, and the finishing touches of his "breakdowns" even exceeded those of the laziest Virginia negro.

But Rice was not satisfied with mounting the ladder of fame in his profession, and scarcely had he reached the topmost round when he fell; not at one plunge, but bumping and catching upon the rounds as he descended.

For many years Rice has been the victim of unfortunate habits, lost to his profession and to that future which at one time gleamed so brightly before him. He died of disease of the heart, the undoubted effect of his frequent indulgence in liquor.

The fame which he won for himself, and the ideas that he originated, have been seized upon by others who have made from the small beginning of "Jim Crow," a profession distinct and honorable. He has died in the lap of poverty.—N. Y. Mercury.

Music Abroad.

VIENNA.—Mad. Czillag does not return to the Court Opera, as had been announced: this celebrated singer leaves for New York where she has an engagement for six months, it is said, at $2,000 per month. Mad. Rose Czillag made her first appearance in England in April last, as Leonora in Beethoven's Fidelio, making a greater impression in that part than any one has done since the illustrious Schroeder Devrient, whose mantle is thought to have fallen upon her shoulders. Czillag, whose name in her native Magyar language signifies "star," is indeed a star of the first magnitude. As an actress she resembles Schroeder Devrient and is equal to her. She resembles her in earnest simplicity of manner and the absence of the artificial conventionalities of the stage—in those delicate touches of nature and feeling which make her seem the very person she represents, and in that force and truth in the representation of passion which irresistibly commands the sympathy of the audience. In personal aspect she excels her great predecessor—her beauty is of a more refined and noble cast, and she has a finer voice than Devrient ever possessed. As a singer, she is a most accomplished artist, her style being more Italian than German, and her repertoire varied and extensive, one of them being Elvira in Don Giovanni, which it would be a treat to hear sung by a first rate artist.

Rubinstein's opera les Enfans des Landes, will be performed in the course of the month of November.

BERLIN.—The 28th of August, (Goethe's birthday,) the Court Opera company gave his Finst, with the music, composed in part by Prince Radziwill, and partly by Lindpaintner. The performance given for the monument to Goethe was preceded by an excellent prologue, written for the occasion by Adami and recited by Dessoir. His literary performance which will survive the occasion that inspired it, was received with thunders of applause.

NAPLES.—A new opera by Petrella, il Foletto di Gresy has met with remarkable success at the theatre del Fondo, exciting great enthusiasm. The composer was called out twenty times.

Paris.

Vivier, the eccentric and amiable musician, has obtained permission to locate his private apartments in the right hand tower of Notre Dame Cathedral, the same, which, according to Victor Hugo's fanciful story, served as a place of refuge for Esmeralda. This tower is never visited by sight-seers, who, however, when mounting the other, are much astonished at hearing the sound of a piano at such a height. This is Vivier's piano, whose owner is finishing a comic opera, to which Messrs. Scribe and Cormon have furnished the libretto. He has fled to this tower to escape his too troublesome friends. A few of them started for his haunt, but the stairs proved too much for them, and they turned back. The keeper always gets their names and marks the number of steps which they ascend before their courage fails them. Vivier calls this daybook of the keeper, his "Thermometer of friendship." "SIGNALE."

The performance at the Grand Opera for the benefit of the Christians of Syria realized 10,000 francs, which is the largest sum the house will yield at the usual prices. This will help to swell the general subscription for this object, which, notwithstanding the great show or sympathy made by the French press, does not progress very satisfactorily, or prove that the people at large are very deeply impressed with the sufferings of their Christian brethren, to whose succor the Emperor has rushed so eagerly. The Huguenots was given on Friday, with Mlle. Caroline Barbot in the part of Valentine, and Mad. Vandenhuevel Duprez in that of Marguerite. This second debut of Mad. Duprez was fully as successful as the first, and has quite borne out the favorable expectations of her friends. It is generally regarded that this lady's engagement is a valuable acquisition to the Opera.

I have also another programme to communicate, viz. that of M. Calazdo, the manager of the Italian Opera here. I need not trouble you with a list of the works to be produced; an enumeration of the artists to figure in his troop will be more acceptable. Here they are, then, alphabetically ordered to avoid nice points of precedences. Prima donne soprani, Mmes.

Battu and Penco; prime donne contralti, Mmes. Albani and Edenska; prime donne comprimarie, Mmes. Varoni and Vestri; primi tenori, MM. Gardoni, Mario, and Pancani; primi tenori comprimari, MM. Capello and Morey; primi baritoni, MM. Badiali and Graziani; primi bassi, MM. Angelini and Patriossi; primo buffo, M. Zucchini; seconde parte, Mad. Lava, MM. Cazaboni and Soldi. Direttore d'Orchestra, M. Bonetti; maestro alceballo, M. Uranio Fentana; maestro di cori, M. Chiaromonte.

I hear from Naples, that notwithstanding the troubled state of affairs there, the subvention paid to the San Carlo Theatre has been raised from 60,000 to 80,000 ducats; and it is now the most munificently supported theatre in Italy. It is said that great efforts are to be made to restore the school of dancing, for which Naples was once so famous, to its early splendor. It was the school of Naples which gave to the world Taglioni, Carlotta Grisi, and Fanny Cerito. Appropos of Italy, Camillo Sivori has just returned to Paris from Milan, where he has been giving a series of seventeen concerts in succession. Two of these were for the benefit of the poor, and three to advance the cause of Garibaldi, to whom Sivori was enabled to forward 15,000 f. (£600). This is a very creditable act on the part of the little-great violinist, and shows the influence of the Garibaldi enthusiasm in a very strong light. M. Braga is also returned to us from Milan, bringing with him a libretto, to which he is going to compose the music. The opera is intended for Mad. Borghi-Mamo during her engagements at Bologna and Milan.

There has been a concert at the Salle Pleyel in honor of the veteran Moscheles, the programme whereof consisted entirely of music of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, selected by M. Farrenc, well known for his antiquarian researches. In giving an account of the concert, a French critic informs the world that la grande fugue de Bach was executed on the organ by M. Georges Pfeiffer, as though old Sebastian's progeny, under that style, were limited to one. Yet France claims the first rank in the world in musical connoisseurship! This, too, with the Société Bach in full activity, who, by the way, have just published their ninth volume of the works of the great master. Prefixed to it is a curious notice on the construction of the harpsichord by the editor, M. Rust. I told you in a former letter that the Concerts Musard were about to close. I was misinformed; they are to continue open till the commencement of October. They are still very attractive, and they fully deserve their patronage by the capital way in which they are conducted. An ophicleide player, M. Moreau, is at present winning great favor by his solo performances.

The distribution of honors, à propos of the Imperial fêtes of August, still continues. It positively rains crosses of honor and medals. Let the most bombastic and jejune of scribblers but indite an ode on the "Imperial theme"—annexation—and let him annex it to the effusion of discord, herself turned maestro, and both author and composer will immediately receive an enormous medal, and be inscribed in the muster roll of the legion of honor.

Germany

VIENNA, August.—A singer in order to please the public, needs nothing, according to Rubini, but three little things, of which the first is voice, the second voice, and the third again voice. Of these three things Mr. WACHTEL, from Cassel, now playing here a star-engagement, has even to spare. He is the owner of a tenor voice, the like of which is not often heard. It is full and sonorous, and as much at home among the highest notes which a male chest is capable of producing as if the high C were mere children's play. Most tenors do not possess this precious note at all; a few serve it as a rare and racy dessert on solemn state-occasions, and are praised for it to the skies, every time. Not so Mr. Wachtel. He gives the high C with the soup, with the roast meats, or the pudding, just as often as you want to hear it, and with infinite pleasure, that is to say, with the greatest ease. Not only does he sing all the Cs in his part, but as this note has not been made use of by the composers often enough for the wants of Mr. Wachtel, he puts it into the score at odd times—ad majorem vocis gloriam.

Nothing else was wanted to take our public by storm, for the artistic education is here always the second consideration. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at, that Mr. W. was not only overwhelmed with applause; no, that would not be saying enough: he was received with frenzy. An Arnold, in "William Tell" who thinks his part, which is for himself, so much dreaded by his brethren-tenors on account of its great elevation, too low and piles on notes and passages ad libitum—such a singer is perfectly irresistible for the good Viennese.

Of course Mr. Wachtel knew very soon whence the wind blew, and sang with such a hearty good will, that one might really fear the consequences. Every singer who is richly endowed by nature is tempted to shine by the richness of his voice (which is very natural to a singer at the outset of his career, and pays him better for the time being), instead of also paying proper attention to the art of singing and acting. In this manner such singers remain naturalists for the term of their mortly short-lived popularity. We hope Mr. Wachtel will take warning from the sorry fate of some of his fellow-tenors and devote some time to proper training. Fame will be sure to come, and—to last.

"SIGNALS."

Note. Wachtel is engaged for eight months, at a salary of 16,000 florins, which is equal to about 8,000 dollars.

BERLIN.—They are celebrating the anniversary of Goethe's birthday. Theatrical representations were announced for four consecutive days, as thus:—The 27th, The Kings Lieutenant by Gutzkow and a military concert, conducted by M. Wieprecht; 28th, Frederick at Saengerling, operetta by Eberwein: Brother and Sister by Goethe; 29th, Goethe-Marsch by Liszt; Lover's Caprices by Goethe; Calm at Sea by Beethoven; Walpurgis Night by Mendelssohn; The Transfiguration, a fragment of Faust, by Schumann; the 30th, the Fair at Plundersweiler, by Goethe, concert. The receipts are to be appropriated to Goethe's monument. At Hanover, M. Steger, the same who failed last season at Her Majesty's Theatre, in Edgar, has been engaged to replace M. Niemann, at the Court Theatre. At Weimar M. Chelard's opera of Marbath is to be produced at the Court Theatre. I believe it was performed in England, at Her Majesty's Theatre, by a German company, under the direction of the composer himself. From Vienna I hear that M. Rubinstein has just completed a new opera, and has placed the score in the hands of the manager of the Court Theatre. The management of the Italian Theatre has definitively been granted to M. Salvi, who will commence his season in April and continue it to the end of July. The season at Spa is said, notwithstanding the cheerless weather, to be unexpectedly brilliant. A grand concert has just been given there by the Administration des Jeux, whereof the chief attraction was Vivier, the horn player.

ROTTERDAM.—Is about to present itself with a German opera, the wealthy burghers of that ilk have ing subscribed to that end 80,000 florins, the interest of which is to be received by M. Vries, the Amsterdam manager, in support of the undertaking, which he is to organise and direct.

STOCKHOLM.—Is overhauling its Academy of Music with a view to reform. Several new professorships have been instituted; among them one of history, one of esthetics, and one—though more humble, far more useful I suspect than these—of the art of tuning pianos. It would be well if the French Academy would follow this sensible example, for it is one of the points in which France is greatly deficient.

PESTH.—At the German theatre, Mehul's Joseph is given out for study. M. Borhowitz, the pianist, has just given a farewell concert here, the proceeds of which were to be devoted to the Szechenye monument.

MILAN.—Rejoices in the prospect of two new operas, one by Bottesini, the Assello di Firenze, which failed in Paris, when the composer was himself director of the orchestra, the other by the youthful maestro, Cianchir of Florence, composer of several successful works, and among them of Salvator Rosa. The sisters Ferni are here and have given a concert at the Carignano.

GENOA.—The San Carlo Felice is undergoing a thorough restoration, which is to render it one of the most richly adorned and elegant theatres in Europe. The ensuing season promises to be exceedingly brilliant.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Saw up and saw down. Child's Song.

L. Marshall. 25

A moral little song, teaching industry and perseverance, brought into rhymes for young folks to learn, by the Rev. Mr. Dyer, and provided with a suitable melody and very easy accompaniment by Mr. Marshall.

Do you think of the days that are gone, Jamie?

H. Smart. 25

Pleasing sentimental Ballad.

Gipsy Davy. Comic Song and Chorus.

25

One of those funny songs, by which Billy Morris, of the well-known Morris Minstrels, makes your "sides shake with laughter." It is in the Villikins-and-his-Dinah-style, only a good deal less lengthy.

I love you. Song.

M. W. Balfe. 25

Composed for and sung by Sims Reeves, England's greatest Tenor. It is a very sweet ballad.

Fairy dreams. Duet.

S. Glover. 25

A new duet for two mezzo-soprano voices, lively and graceful, in six-eight time.

Sister, since I met thee last.

Mrs. Bloede. 25

Words by Mrs. Hemans. The melody truly reflects the sentiment of the poetry; it is impressively passionate and a capital chance for a large voice.

The little maid. Comic Song. J. J. Hutchinson. 25

A little story told with good-natured drollery. Young people will like it, and soon sing it by heart.

Instrumental Music.

Flower Queen Polka.

C. A. Ingraham. 25

Pleasing and easy. An additional charm is the very pretty vignette on the title page.

Noble Signors. (From "Les Huguenots.") For Violin and Piano. Case. 25

No, casa equal. (From "Les Huguenots.") For Violin and Piano. Case. 25

The two celebrated songs of the Page, Capital parlor music for amateurs.

Une petite fleur. Waltz.

ETIQUETTE OF THE BALL ROOM: or the Dancer's Companion. 25

As the season of terpsichorean festivity approaches, the above handbook, giving, in a condensed and convenient form, the Rules of Ball Room Etiquette, will be eagerly sought for and prove of great value to all who are fortunate enough to possess it. All the minutiae relating to the management of public and private balls and parties is given, and a profuse number of Quadrilles, Cotillions, and Fancy Dances, including the celebrated "Lancer's Quadrille," and several others, equally popular.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Princess' Bath.

FROM THE GERMAN OF PRUTH.

When the moon in azure heavens at the midnight hour is beaming,
And the ripples softly murmur, as in quiet slumber dreaming,
Downward to the lonely sea-shore goes the Princess proud and fair
And with busy fingers looses all her wealth of golden hair;
From her bosom throws the vesture, and with thirsty, panting motion Drinketh deep the cooling breezes, blowing landward from the ocean.
Slowly lingering sinks her mantle, till in beauty unconcealed
Timid shrinking, sweetly blushing, the fair woman stands revealed.
Shyly first she wets her foot-tip, then her whole form boldly throwing,
Plunges deep and sudden downward where the warm still waves are flowing,
Till the water foams and sparkles, and in eager, sweet desire,
Nestles round her heaving bosom with its waves of lambent fire.
Then the sea begins to murmur, drawn by love's restless spell,
Toward the beach in mad excitement all the billows foam and swell;
And the dolphin gazes kindly, with his clear sagacious eyes,
For he feels his cold heart glowing with a tender, glad surprise.
Dost thou hear the sea complaining? Maiden, from its deepest caves
Hearst whispering, hear'st inviting, the wild pleading of the waves?
Maiden, thou hast fired the ocean, and the spirits from below Feel the magic of thy rosy lips, thy bosom's stainless snow!
'Tis the fair-haired knightly striplings, who in ages long gone by
From distant shores sailed hither in the flower of youth to die,
While the lute resounded merrily, and foamed the circling cup,
Till the Sea, the dread Insatiate, ships and voyagers swallowed up.
'Tis the grey-haired men and heroes, stout in deeds and great in story
Who met here in deadly sea-fight, all athirst for martial glory.
'Tis the fisher-boy with golden locks, whose song thou oft hath heard, Whom thy beauty's cruel power [to the fatal plunge hast stirred!
Ah, the sighing! Ah, the wailing! For they lie so long forsaken Buried deep in ghastly caverns with the hydra and the kraken!
From above them, from below them, floating dim on every side,
Shadowy forms of fairest women hurry onward with the tide,
And the flowery bliss they tasted in their days of youthful pleasure,
And the joyous warmth once throbbing in the young heart's eager measure,
All, if all comes back to taunt them in the dreamy magic spell,
Wish, and longing and desire,—but alas! no life as well!
Now the spectres pale, at midnight when the quiet stars are burning Hover upward from their icy depths in speechless bitter yearning.
Maiden, thou hast fired the ocean! And the spirits from the deep Long to rest upon thy bosom, long to kiss thy rosy lip!
A bright sea-flower, never fading thou shalt bloom for them below,
And the poor, dead, frozen bosoms pressed to thine, again shall glow.
From the sunken, stony eye-balls wild their longing glance is thrown,
"Come! oh, come! Soon strikes the hour; soon the sea will claim its own!"
But the fair and lofty Princess heareth not their whispered sighs;
Sees no shadowy phantoms watching with their spectral, eager eyes.
Slow she rises from the water, gliding swan-like to the land.
And her golden locks anointed, turns majestic from the strand;

Calmly moving, sweetly smiling, to the stolen garden meeting.
When her lover's life warm kisses wait to bring her happy greeting.
And the poor, sad, frozen spirits cast one glance of helpless pain.
Stretch their arms once more despairing—sink back to their depths again.—

Confessions of a Musical Soul.*

(From the posthumous papers of a Moravian Sister.)

My earliest impressions of music, after my entrance into the world of active thought, were derived from my father's performance of the simple airs of Mozart and Haydn.

How often did I listen with a deep exhilaration of feeling, bordering on rapture to these simple compositions, which, supplying all the wants of our musical nature, are never listened to without creating a longing to hear them again.

In moments of listlessness, "Nel cor non piu mi sento" was a favorite theme of his, and it was seldom played without being followed by variations either of his own invention or of some genial composer.

My parent was wont to give me critical explanations of his music, and as my own intellectual growth kept pace with my instinctive love of this fine art, I was early awakened to a comprehension of some of the more obnoxious principles of this species of philosophy. My elementary impressions of music were simply those of pleasure, and, previous to my father's questionings on this and kindred subjects, I have never thought of making any analysis of this pleasure; of what it was constituted or through what medium it acted upon the intellectual system; nor did I ever dream of its capabilities in the way of description or its powers of representation. I know music to be an art which at all times relaxes the jaded mind, fills up the vacant hours of life, and delights the soul in a way that is but feebly described; because the attempt to truthfully paint the various shades of feeling seems utterly ineffectual; or to say what feeling is, is so problematical, that no describer of our inner life may be said to have ever been successful. When I was questioned by my Mentor, therefore, what "nel cor non piu mi sento" presented to me in regard to the inner imaginings of a peaceful and quiet life, a state of happy, placid resignation, leaving out of the question all the word-poet had attached to the sounds of the tone-poet, and drawing my conclusions from those sounds and their combinations only, I was unable to say

In the female portrait which the poet has given us, he chiefly strives to show the various phases of progress from a worldly intellectual, to a purely religious and emotional life, without reference to the musical condition in which every Moravian sister may be supposed to live. I have, therefore, adapted that tone of sentiment, more consonant with her nature and capabilities, which disavows the highest intellectual cultivation as the end of our being, and have allowed her to illustrate her devotional autobiography with musical themes, which she regards, at the same time, as the hand-maid of her faith.

what I thought of his real intents. My parent had told me the piece described feeling; but then what is feeling?—What were the incidents in that ceaseless drama of life in which "we live and move and have our being," that gave rise to these feelings, whose portrayal was here signified? A still more mysterious question was involved in the form of composition which followed the theme, termed the variation. I felt deeply, sincerely in the theme, but I became yet more deeply drawn within the mazes of a delicious and indefinable tone-thought, when variation succeeded to variation, and when one complex idea was developed from the simple conception, and that was followed by one yet more complex, and by another always augmenting in beauty, intricacy, subtlety, elaboration.

I was instructed in the maxim that music was a necessity; a necessity in its simpler elements, as well as in its radiations into a myriad forms. Hence the variation was a natural sequence of the theme, and the variation in the variation came forth as irrepressibly as the corrosion of fire or the crystalization of the metals. "These are the representations of the phases of life," said he, "as it passes within us, without reference to the outward, the objective part of our being; all these combinations of melody, set together and multiplied upon each other by the weird art and productive fancy of the master, are revealed truths of the inner principle of man, which, coming forth in the shape of tone, strike me so forcibly with their melodious effects. The theme represents the subject, and all that ornamentation called the variation is but a further illustration of the same subject, on application of the laws of musical rhetoric to a species of emotional narration, similar to word-language when used to illustrate and render attractive any topic of human thought."

At a very tender age I had imbibed a passionate love of flowers, and in the numerous marked localities of these my artless friends of nature, in the colored productions themselves, in the very fragrance they breathed forth, in the characteristics of their form and fascinating types of loveliness and innocence, I found a medium through which I might chronicle my affections in a permanent record. Through this power of association, for the flower spake to me in no other language, I was at all times able to recall events of the past; these pretty creations of an hour as they sprung up out of the fertile spot of earth, in their well known abodes, became a fond medium of communication between myself of to day, and myself of years gone by. But when the language of tone, the poetry of sound, superseded that of the floral world, I found myself transported to a new and higher sense of enjoyment. Hence I embraced with avidity all my father's teachings on the subject of musical æsthetics; the theme was so pure, so devoid of all the grossness of materialistic thought, that I sought it and dwelt upon it, and chose it as an enfranchisement from the duller things of earth.

I might date my earliest discoveries in music at that epoch when the heart softens and leaps instinctively at the melody of the dance. The Italian, with that widely known and universal instrument of mechanism termed the hand-organ, fully met the necessity of my musical nature, by the popular pieces of tact-composition which springs out of the elements of our emotional being. In our youthful and early struggle for the utterance of tone, we seek the music of the dance; and although a later stage of culture modifies and tempers this inclination, the impressions of ballet music are never lost. It seems to act in concert with the beatings of the heart, and when heard in the street, amid the turmoil of life and the strife of humanity, where the millions are toiling for bread, it gladdens the soul and brings on an oblivion of care. This gaiety of heart represented by ballet music resides within us and forms a portion of the history of emotion; it dates its growth back to our earliest years and never forsakes us; it is an unflinching element in all popular composition; a ready material in the hands of the composer and never dies out of life, until morbid thought succeeds to that healthy tone which lives in the ballet and makes it the companion of buoyant and effervescent joy.

In the forms of worship to which I had been trained, the Moravian hymn was kept in daily practice, and I exercised myself in all its most beautiful accords. Emanating from early times, and belonging to a school in which Bach himself was reared, the music is deep and imperishable, and, as some of the German writers are wont to express it, it comes up out of the profoundest depths of the human heart. These sacred melodies were intermingled with all the avocations of our family life; they made the festival a joyous occasion; they threw an odor of sanctity over the pleasures of the Birth-day! they beautified the solemnities of the tomb. The tidings of every death in the village were announced in this peculiar language, and each sex had its appropriate death-song. The dirge was sung at the interment, and when the remains of this earthly habitation were deposited in the earth, the trombone was the instrument used, and its long drawn and sombre notes were the significant emblems of a life to come. Among the earlier people of our sect, the events and circumstances of life were so closely interwoven with this and other kindred music, that the whole year passed away in a round of melodious history, and as I grew up amidst these musical associations, I continued to enter more deeply within myself and retreat from the actualities of a commonplace existence. The sounds of the Moravian Chorale, in common with those of the old Lutheran school, to which they are nearly allied, though occasionally represented by words, in which their spirit and meaning are feebly set forth, are in themselves, without the aid of word poetry, the fullest exponent of all that the soul can imagine, portray or aspire after. They claim but little sympathy with secular music in this one marked circumstance, that they disclaim all the passions of our worldly nature; never swell into that unbridled emotion in which the Italian is wont to indulge, nor sink into that hopeless despondency into which Beethoven so frequently casts himself before allowing entrance of the sunshine of hope.

These old and exquisite chorales, therefore, became an indispensable portion of my early education; but in order to remain free of that morbid, sensitive, and overwrought emotional enthusiasm which usually invests an ultra religious nature, music in all its departments was sedulously cultivated among us. With exception of the practical ballet, for the theoretical ballet is found every where to a greater or less degree in tone poetry of a lyrical type, no species of musical composition was left untouched; and social life partaking of German conviviality and feeling, naïve and joyous in action and demeanor; simple in its tastes, profound in its thinkings, beautiful in its ideale, was fully adequate to all my wants.

From that cradle state of musical perception which leads to no other inference than that music is a mere combination of pleasing sounds, in which the ear loves to indulge, to the higher stage of an inner appreciation, my progress under a father's tutelage was easy and natural. He taught me that the inner life of music was like the inner life of poetry—that music was poetry itself, although conveyed to the mind through the medium of tone. There was no prose language in music, since all its imaginings, all its ethereal tone-figures, were the creations of a purely practical element within us, identical with that principle which treats all the objects of surrounding life and nature with the glow of emotion and impassioned description. In earlier times such masters as Haydn, Mozart and their whole school of disciples followed the natural graceful rhythm of the classic age of English poetry, and, like Pope and Dryden, they exhibit a flow of numbers natural to the workings of the human mind, under the influence of a simple desire to express, calmly, gracefully, cheerfully and felicitously, all that nature is awakening within us, previous to that new birth of transcendentalism which excessive intellectual education is apt to engender, and of which this modern age throws in our way so many unfortunate examples.

The English word-poets, therefore, and the German tone-poets of a nearly similar epoch were recommended to me, in my first studies of poesy in its universal form, in combination with a love of the visible creation and of the art of pictorial design, that begins with simple mimicry and ends with philosophy.

It was explained to me that musical history had passed through stages of development similar to those of written poetry; from the Homeric or sensual to the intellectual and spiritual. As in the earlier forms of the Epopée, nothing was ever attempted but outward description, with no reference to surrounding impressions on the mind, so in the earlier periods of modern music there was a more frequent imitative power at work in the representation of battles, storms, changes of seasons, the language of animals, and the whole visible machinery of nature. In its application to the uses of mimicry, music loses its true and higher attribute; that of utterance to the soul's pensive moods; yet, like in painting and written poetry, an inherent beauty, a faculty of captivation still remains. All poetry, be it ever so grossly misapplied or derogatory in its aims; all painting, even when made subservient to the worst of ends, still retains what some philosophers have termed the beauty of ugliness; and, by analogy, all music preserves, under every condition, portions of an ineffaceable charm.

As before observed, music of all grades was diligently cultivated in our village, and, besides the many who made it a means of support, no one who could devote himself to the pursuit omitted to take some instrument that accorded with his taste or was commensurate with his facilities.

In common with my female friends, I was addicted to the piano; some learned the guitar, some the harp, while others, whom nature had gifted with fine voices, took their places in the concert room, and, ranged in prim attire in front of the orchestra assisted in rendering to a select audience the classical compositions of Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Romberg, Neukomm, and a host of others, to whom the past century has given celebrity and who have received the apotheosis that is due to all the master spirits of the divine art.

Many of these works of the early masters of tone resemble the productions of the painter, in the enduring impressions they leave on the mind, and that inherent power of thought, which is constantly calling for study, analysis, criticism and repeated contemplation of their strong points.

A thousand passages are nothing more than the every day language of the soul, to which no utterance is ever given; leaving itself to be felt or recited by the imagination; a day-dream of hope aspiration, joy, tempered by fits of despondency and even temporary despair. To this latter phase of mental anguish the Zinzendorfian authors allowed no admission; all was forgiveness, love, gentleness; the Redeemer of mankind was a brother, a father, and, not unfrequently, a spouse. The poetry which flowed from this sacred fountain was eminent for its peculiarly anthropomorphic tone, and for these figures of heart language which bring God and man into such close companionship.

Thus our village education became strongly imbued with a love of that form of Art which has its outlet in tone: which, instead of offering its finest creations to the contemplation of the eye, enters the soul through the ear alone. All art is emotional, since poetry is applied to all its exhibitions, in whatever shape they appear, and wherein the culture of one village social life was so strongly tinctured with that kind of education, its whole tone became emotional. It is seldom that all behold the two faculties of music and painting united, since emotion in the same individual is not wont to exercise itself in these two different though fraternal modes; hence our chronicles have handed down to us the names of few painters, but a great number of musicians. Our isolation from general society, or, as it is termed, the world, furnished a much better opportunity for the growth of all that relates to an inner development than that contact with society which receives the impress of its follies and its weaknesses and is ever borrowing its standard of thought and action. Shut out in a great measure from such distractions, music invested our little secluded world with a halo of tranquil happiness, which it is pleasant to look back upon. For the repertoire from which we drew our musical recreations, every department of composition occupied a place. Our religious festivals were not only distinguished by the chorales to which I have referred, but choice extracts from Haydn and Mozart rendered our solemnities, occasions of sacred gladness, replete with chaste joys and heavenly imaginings. But divine love was not alone the subject of thought among us; the study of secular music brought with it, and communicated a fondness for, poesy in all its various forms.

We had the Nocturne, wherein our vocalists displayed their best talents in the service of that species of night song which devotes itself to all the poetical imagery that accompanies the romantic passions. Many and beautiful were the quartets sung by the Männerchöre, young and old, after the evening had sunk into its deep, still and impressive quiet.

In the concerts given by our Philharmonists every grade of music was introduced; the solemn, the gay, the sublime, the ludicrous; and it was listened to with due appreciation.

One of the most marked epochs of my life was my introduction to the spectacle of the opera. It was at that more mature stage of education and experience when judgment has fixed and settled the intellect, and the young imagination can no longer be led astray by the spacious glare of theatrical fictions. A chain of circumstances, which it would be superfluous to relate, brought me into this temptation, for as such I viewed it at the time, and the impressions induced thereby are not yet forgotten through the long years that supervened. In an animated struggle between the consciousness of doing wrong and the extreme delight of listening to such fascinating music, amid all the accessories of painting and poesy made visible, I sat and listened through that long evening of fear and joy.

The charming Italian song was melody in its bewitching form; fading quickly away, but always returning again in some new attractive colors; a succession of evanescent hues that leave no durable impression on the soul; yet as music in its absolute sense it was pure; but mixed with this purity came the alloy of worldly love, rendered hideous in my eyes by the contamination of licentiousness, crime, and the contending passions of man and woman. It is true, as a student of Beethoven, I had observed in some of his tone-fictions, a similar exhibition of purity and impurity; but then no visibility was given to the birth, triumph and fall of human passion; and being divested of all that material clothing which enables the melodrama to appeal to the senses of the multitude, human thought, though under the excitement of wildest passion and evil sentiment, comes up before us in the purity of form which characterizes all melody.

The origin of Art lies so deep, that it has never yet been clearly shown why and how it has become such an abiding necessity of our nature. Like many other abstract problems which engage the attention of the intellectual and the spiritually minded, its tendency is to divide and distract the judgments and opinions of its votaries, who can never agree as to whom it comes and whither it is tending.

This truth forced itself upon me when I studied that strange incongruity termed Opera. Such a beautiful fiction, so engaging, fascinating, so full of true poesy, and so much melody incorporated with and become a part of material life; active in its coldest forms, not even fit for the sculptor's uses, transformed into melody; all blended together by the skill of the master in so forcible a manner as to become perfectly reconcilable.

But opera retains an able argument in its favor in the perpetuation and the enduring hold it has obtained on the tastes and affections of races and ages; with all its incongruities and apparent untruthfulness, it still lives and spreads its sway wherever the love of tone is in the ascendant. Like all the heart poetry of our literature, it proves that the ebullitions of the heart presented in their simple rhythmical arrangements constitute the only true poetry, and the perennial freshness that always marks such compositions secures for them the worship and esteem of generations. But written poetry need not be drawn from those elements of corruption and moral rankness which are so often used to place beneath the superstructure of the finest musical creations, and when we shall have seen such an era of moral opera dawn upon us, as draws from these sources whence high Art is supposed to spring, we may hope it will have arrived at a realization of its true mission.

My father was fond of indulging in musical conversations with me, and as he was not ignorant of the rules which underlie the philosophy of the sister arts of poetry, painting and sculpture, he was led to draw comparisons between them and his favorite, the fine art of tone. He frequently discussed the question of imitation, and observed that although imitative in itself is a lower step in Art, yet it is sometimes subservient to the highest efforts of imagination, both in music and painting. "The painter," he said, "is often condemned for a servile imitation of nature and action, in which he aims at so close, minute, and perfect a mimicry of external objects, as to deceive the eye of the beholder and lead him into the belief that he is looking at the reality. But it were unjust to despise that grade of painting which arrives at a successful imitation, for the highest talent and even genius is elevated to such service, and complete success in works of that class is rare. There are masterpieces in this grade of composition as well as in every other, and when the pure gems of artistic talent are exhibited, we must admire them, even if the subject be material or sensuous.

Not only were many of the best works of modern painters founded on the laws of imitation and mimicry, but the "Creation" of Haydn, the "Pastoral Symphony" of Beethoven, and the Freischütz of Weber adapted these principles to the worthiest productions of all time. He held that although the subject of thought elevated the character of the composition, still many of the components of melody were never lost; that the most seducing harmony clung to the vilest tone pictures; as an exemplification of which I was referred to the "Don Giovanni" of Mozart. And herein music may be said to serve similar purposes to those of painting—the glory of the art is never lost; a certain tone of beauty and harmony shines forth from every effort of the artist's pencil, should he even descend from the spiritual and sublime to the sensual and groveling. Another marked endowment of my parent was his universality; the artist, he said, was never sufficiently philosophical to allow himself to embrace one school without despising the others. It was essential to true genius to admire all, since the productions of every school are the emanations of genius.

This disparity in the origin and growth of the peculiar self-nurture of imaginative thought renders it so difficult to find these positive laws and rules which every art student seeks, but never finds. Amid the mazes of such conflicting theories, he either becomes sceptical as to the existence of positive beauty, or swears allegiance to a single master, becomes the adherent of one school and discards every other. But in true art my preceptor taught me there was no school, and that he, who, by a regular system of logical reasoning on the simple laws of beauty in tone and colors, could develop from the works of the masters all that fell within the scope of his own consciousness of beauty, arrived at the highest realization of art.

The mind of the individual seldom disagrees with itself, whereas separate minds rarely correspond in all the divers points of emotion excited by the study of art and nature. The mind should be at peace with, resign itself to, and cultivate a fondness for its own images of beauty, and from this source derive the enjoyment which springs from eclectic art. To subserve this end, it should draw its recreations from every school.

As long as the Moravian village remained isolated and shut out, as it were, from the world, it retained in all their warmth and festivity the musical rituals and the annual celebrations that bore reference to the various stages of the history of our church. The common appellation of brother and sister was upheld, and the costume of the latter on sacred days was marked by its simplicity, and the chaste emblem it disclosed gave significance to our religious pleasures. The forms of worship, however, which were cherished within the secluded village could suffer no contact with the grosser element of worldly life. In those days of comparative seclusion, my associations and friendships were only with those I really loved, with those whose sympathies were alive to my own. In going beyond the limits of this narrow social existence, I found it impossible to assume that ready conventional tact which makes friends of all, of even those in whom we can find no congeniality. I found it hard to comprehend how those artificial friendships spring up, where the heart is always at war with itself, finding no real attraction in other beings, or that magnetism which draws soul to soul. This narrow life, however, was inclined to bring on fastidiousness, for even in our closest intimacies we are known to rebel against the most cherished objects, and, recoiling from our fondest attachments, seek refuge within ourselves, and even there to feel lost and dissatisfied. In such a crisis, I found music my safest refuge. Unlike many, who, from being its most impassioned votaries, leave it for a time with an indifference approaching disgust, awaiting the season when some new bloom of harmonious fancies shall have put forth within them, and reawakened all the old affection; my melodious impulses were always active, and led at times to an estrangement from all around me.

I am now speaking of a later stage of my life; although opportunities of marriage were often laid in my way, that growing fastidiousness, to which I have alluded, turned away from the object which fell so far short of my ideals.

From Spohr's Autobiography.

From Darmstadt: Spohr furnishes an amusing chapter. It must be borne in mind that the time is 1815.

"Being obliged by the illness of my good wife to make a four weeks' stay here, I had ample time to become acquainted with the state of musical affairs in this city. I cannot report very favorably. The Grand-duke is very fond of music, and spends a good deal of money for it; but this fondness is one-sided, selfish and confined altogether to operatic music. His greatest pleasure is at rehearsals, to act as both orchestra-leader and stage-manager in his own august person. Not only does he, from a music-desk placed on the stage, direct the corps of musicians below, but superintends the smallest minutæ of the stage business. As in both capacities he thinks himself infallible and neither conductor nor manager dare oppose him, many blunders are committed. For although among the Grand-dukes he may be the best conductor it does not follow that he is even a tolerably good one in the common estimate. This is amply shown by his selection of works to be performed. The theatre is so richly endowed by his munificence that the taste of the public needs not be consulted at all. If the management could only have their own way, they might—and would probably—establish a repertoire of good, sterling works. But as the Grand-duke constantly interferes it happens that not only many indifferent works are constantly performed but many excellent ones are totally excluded, as, for instance, Cherubini's Operas, against which the Grand-duke is prepossessed. He makes an occasional exception in favor of this composer's "Water-carrier," but even of this work he only tolerates the first act. Even Mozart's operas do not appear to be to his liking, for when, one or two years ago, Don Giovanni was performed, after an opera, Athalia, by Ploissl had been rehearsed for thirty consecutive days, and the orchestra, glad to have escaped from the killing ennui of Ploissl's creation, played the first Finale with great warmth and energy, the Grand-duke remarked confidentially to the conductor: "After the Ploissl opera Mozart tastes rather stale."

The singers might be much better than they are, considering the high salaries which they are paid; it is said, however, that the Grand-duke is afraid to engage first-rate artists, lest they should not so readily conform to his wishes. The chorus (thirty men and thirty women) is excellent. The orchestra is numerous and contains some very good musicians, but also many of common stuff. The Grand-duke prides himself a good deal on its ensemble, especially the pianissimo; still intonation and distinctness are far from being perfect. Probably no other orchestra in the world is worked nearly as hard, for all the members are required to spend every evening which God has made, from six to nine or ten o'clock in the theatre. Every Sunday an opera is performed, and twice a week dramatic plays; on the remaining four evenings the Grand-duke holds his opera rehearsals. There is no rest except in case of his illness, during which no operas are performed or rehearsed, as he either believes or wants to make others believe, that without him nothing in that line could be done.

"It is indeed a singular sight to behold the old gentleman, bent with age, in military uniform, with the big star on his breast, indicate the time from behind his desk or see him arrange the chorus and hear his remarks to the orchestra, singers, and supernumeraries. There could not be a better manager if he only understood these things, as he has energy, perseverance, and, in his quality as Grand-duke the necessary authority. But unfortunately all his knowledge of a score is confined to his being able to read the first violin part tolerably well, and as he has had some lessons on this instrument in his youth, he is constantly tormenting the poor fiddlers with remarks, without ever improving anything. In the meanwhile the singers may sing as false as they please, or the wind instruments may be a bar ahead or behind—he does not hear it."

Scudo on Wagner. II.

The detailed criticism upon Wagner's music is confined to certain pieces performed at three concerts given him in Paris. Of the overture to the Phantom Ship, Scudo says:

"We see how much the poet and musician, combined in the person of M. Wagner, have wished to express in the overture, which is an assemblage of sounds, of dissonant chords, of strange sonorities, where the ear is utterly lost and wherein it is impossible to detect any plan or design whatever which may convey the composer's idea to the mind. It is literally chaos portraying chaos, where surge forth only a few blasts of harmony given out by the trumpets, which instruments the author greatly abuses in all his writings. This is where we are led in music, by symbolism and the pretensions of a false profundity which wishes to refuse to the senses the enjoyment which belongs to them in the manifestations of art."

Of the march, with chorus, from the Tannhäuser he says:

"The march consists of a very fine phrase which belongs to Weber. . . . This remarkable piece, which the whole world at once comprehended without commentary, proves that when music remains faithful to its own laws, the composer attains the high point at which he aims, and that then the ear is satisfied as well as the intelligence."

Of the introduction to the third act of Tannhäuser with the pilgrim chorus, he says:

"On this text the composer has placed a phrase somewhat well conceived, expressed by the stringed instruments, particularly the violins and repeated by the wind instruments, particularly the brass. After this gross opposition which is common to M. Wagner, a hollow antithesis which dispenses with the necessity of an idea, one perceives why a confusion of strange sonorities, painfully far-fetched harmonies, a waste of colors without any design to bear them or to direct the lost ear; and we listen to an immense effort of will, destitute of grace, and which ends in nothingness. At the appearance of the chorus, which joins its monotonous lamentations to the orchestral clamor, the intent becomes more perceptible, to again relapse into veritable chaos. It is difficult to listen to anything more monstrous. As to the overture to Tannhäuser, which we have known for a long time, and which the admirers of M. Wagner would have pass for a chef d'œuvre, it is a vast machine of symbolic and picturesque music, badly constructed and of desperate length, in which there is nothing to praise but the beginning and the peroration, which produces an increased energetic effect because the confusion and impotence of the musician have endured so long a time. The ear, anxious for order and light, eagerly seizes the opportunity of escaping from the torment which has been inflicted on it during the five minutes that this rare morceau occupies."

Omitting M. Scudo's description of the plot of the pieces performed, we give only his résumé regarding their merits. He says of the prelude and introduction to an opera called Tristan and Isolde:

"On this text the composer has certainly surpassed anything that we can imagine in the way of confusion, disorder and impotence. One might call it a wager against common sense and the simplest demands of the ear. If I had not heard this monstrous piling up of discordant sounds I should not have believed it possible. They assure us that the author sets a great deal on this composition which, contains the revelation of his second manner. I do not think that M. Wagner, with all his boldness, can ever reach a third transformation of this fine style."

Of the Wedding March, with chorus, and the Nuptial fête with epithalamium, from the opera of Lohengrin he has the following praise:

"The march has a fine character, although the musical idea on which it rests belongs to Mendelssohn, as one may convince himself by consulting the march in the Midsummer Night's Dream. Interrupted by the wedding chorus, which is charming and marvellously accompanied, the march resumes its theme with a power and vigorous, sonorous brilliancy, which produced the finest effect. The whole of this scene from the third act of Lohengrin is a masterly conception."

"The result of the different impressions that we have received is that M. Richard Wagner is no ordinary artist. Endowed, like almost all the remarkable men of our time, with more ambition than fecundity, more will than inspiration, M. Wagner has wished per fas et nefas to obtain celebrity. Not being able to act in the manner of true poets and predestined geniuses who sing their love as the bird warbles, as the flower exhales its perfume, as the brook murmurs while fecundating the shore which it bathes with the limpid waters, M. Wagner has made himself a reformer by the necessities of his own cause, and to cover with the éclat of a system the infirmities of his nature. . . .

"With an uneasy spirit, discontented, despising everything, pretending a contempt for popularity, but, in reality, very desirous of obtaining public favor, M. Wagner has been deprived by nature of the two qualities most necessary to a dramatic composer; imagination and sentiment. The author of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser only conceives well those scenes of great stage display, exacting striking and opposing colors; he disposes of only two elements of musical art: rhythm and harmony. His instrumentation, powerful in grand effects, lacks variety and flexibility. His orchestra, almost constantly divided into two extreme parts, the stringed instruments in direct opposition to the brass, has no body, no continued theme which fills the ear with that sonorous paste which the great colorists like Beethoven, Weber and sometimes Mendelssohn, know to knead so well. A very skillful harmonist, M. Wagner shines but little by the brilliancy and novelty of his modulations. His style is monotonous, notwithstanding the efforts of a vigorous will and incontestable talent. He looks well to color, relief, oddity which he takes for profundity; but one soon perceives that the effects which he seeks and obtains are rather the results of the curiosity of the ear than the experiences of the sentiments of the soul. Like all the materialistic poets of our time, M. Wagner proceeds from the exterior sensation, not the inward emotion; he coldly seeks for and combines an effect before possessing the idea or having experienced the sentiment which he wishes to manifest. But the human heart is never deceived by this, and is only moved by realities."

We have translated most of this article which refers directly to Wagner's compositions. A great part of it is devoted to an examination of him as a man, and this we omit. It is curious to note the severity with which all new theories are treated by the adherents of the old ones. In politics, religion, music, it is the same. He who takes a step outside of the beaten track is considered a wanderer, whether his new path lead to unknown beauties or inextricable confusion. We cannot any of us, say what will form the delight of music lovers a century hence; as certainly those who lived a century ago would have looked on Meyerbeer and Wagner as bedlamites in music. Yet they are both worshipped by their special admirers, and it is a sure thing that much music wins upon our affections through simple familiarity. The long habit of hearing certain music will give it an interest to us which springs almost entirely from that habit. The changing fancies of the world, the gradual love for new things and putting by of old, is due quite as much to thirst for novelty, for new sensations, for new combinations, as to the real superiority of the new over the old. We get accustomed to the peculiarities of the new, they become even beauties, and the old forms lose their charm from disuse. Whether Wagner be a light which is to brighten the distant future, we cannot say; but it is certain that while many hail him as the rising sun, others turn from him as an ignis fatuus. Scudo's article will have a certain interest to both parties.—Boston Musical Times, Sept. 22.

The Opera before Gluck.

In a general view of the history of the Opera, the central figures would be Gluck and Mozart. Before Gluck's time the operatic art was in its infancy and since the death of Mozart no operas have been produced equal to that composer's masterpieces. Mozart must have commenced his Idomeneo, the first of his celebrated works, the very year that Gluck retired to Vienna, after giving to the Parisians his Iphigénie en Tauride; but though contemporaries in the strict sense of the word, Gluck and Mozart can scarcely be looked upon as belonging to the same musical epoch. The compositions of the former, however immortal, have at least an antique cast; those of the latter have quite a modern air; and it must appear to the audiences of the present day that far more than twenty-three years separate Orfeo from Don Giovanni, though that is the precise interval that elapsed between the production of the opera by which Gluck, and of that by which Mozart, is best known in this country. Gluck, after a century and a half of opera, so far surpassed all his predecessors that no work by a composer anterior to him is now ever performed. Lulli wrote an Armida, which was followed by Rameau's Armida, which was followed by Gluck's Armida; and Monteverde wrote an Orfeo a hundred and fifty years before Gluck produced the Orfeo which was played only the other night at the Royal Italian Opera. The Orfeo, then, of our existing operatic repertory takes us back through its subject to the earliest of regular Italian operas, and similarly Gluck, through his Armida, appears as the successor of Rameau, who was the successor of Lulli, who usually passes for the founder of the opera in France—a country where it is particularly interesting to trace the progress of that entertainment, inasmuch as it can be observed at one establishment, which has existed continuously for two hundred years, and which, under the title of Académie Royale, Académie Nationale, and Académie Impériale (it has now gone by each of these names twice), has witnessed the production of more operatic masterpieces than any other theatre in any city in the world. To convince the reader of the truth of this latter assertion we need only remind him of the works written for the Académie Royale by Gluck and Piccini (or Piccini) immediately before the Revolution, and of the Masaniello of Auber, the William Tell of Rossini, and the Robert the Devil of Meyerbeer, given for the first time at the said Académie within sixteen years of the termination of the Napoleonic wars. Neither Naples, nor Milan, nor Prague, nor Vienna, nor Munich, nor Dresden, nor Berlin, has individually seen the birth of so many great operatic works by different masters, though, of course, if judged by the great number of great composers to whom they have given birth both Germany and Italy must be ranked infinitely higher than France. Indeed, if we compare France with our own country, we find, it is true, that an opera in the national language was established earlier, and an Italian Opera much earlier there than here; but, on the other hand, the French, until Gluck's time, had never any composers, native or adopted at all comparable to our Purcell, who produced his King Arthur as far back as 1691.

Lulli is said to have introduced opera into France, and, indeed, is represented in a picture, well known to opera-goers, receiving a privilege from the hands of Louis XIV. as a reward and encouragement for his services in that respect. This privilege, however, was neither deserved nor obtained in the manner supposed. Cardinal Mazarin introduced Italian Opera into Paris in 1645, when Lulli was only twelve years of age; and the first French opera, entitled Akabar, Roi de Mogol, words and music by the Abbé Mailly, was brought out the year following in the Episcopal Palace of Carpentras, under the direction of Cardinal Bichi, Urban the Eighth's legate. Clement VII. had already appeared as a librettist, and it is said that Urban VIII. himself recommended the importation of the opera into France; so that the real father of the lyric stage in that country was certainly not a scullion but in all probability a Pope.

The second French opera was La Pastorale en musique, words by Perrin, music by Cambert, which was privately represented at Issy; and the third Pomone, also by Perrin and Cambert, which was publicly performed in Paris. Pomone was the first French opera heard by the Parisian public, and it was to Perrin its author, and not to Lulli, that the patent of the Royal Academy of Music was granted. A privilege for establishing an Academy of Music had been conceded a hundred years before by Charles the Ninth, to Antoine de Baif,—the word "Académie" being used as an equivalent for "Accademia," the Italian for concert. Perrin's license appears to have been a renewal, as to form, of de Baif's, and thus originated the eminently absurd title which the chief operatic theatre of Paris has retained ever since. The Academy of Music is of course an academy in the sense in which the Théâtre Français is a college of declamation, and the Palais Royal Theatre a school of morality; but no one need seek to justify its title because it is known to owe its existence to a confusion of terms.

Six French operas, complete and in five acts, had been performed before Lulli, supported by Mad. de Montespan, succeeded in depriving Perrin of his "privilege," and securing it for himself—at the very moment when Perrin and Cambert were about to bring out their Ariane, of which the representation was stopped. The success of Lulli's intrigue drove Cambert to London, where he was received with much favor by Charles II., and appointed director of the court music, an office which he retained until his death.

Lulli had previously composed music for ballets, and for the songs and interludes of Molière's comedies, but his first regular opera, produced in conjunction with Quinault—being the seventh produced on the French stage—was Cadmus and Hermione (1673).

The life of the fortunate, unscrupulous, but really talented scullion, to whom is falsely attributed the honor of having founded the opera in France, has often been narrated, and for the most part very inaccurately. Every one knows that he arrived from Italy to enter the service of Mad. de Montpensier; some are aware of the offence for which he was degraded by that lady to the post of scullion, and which we can no more mention than we can publish the original of the needlessly elaborate reply attributed to Cambronne at Waterloo*; and a few may have read that it was only through the influence of Mad. de Montespan that he was saved from a shameful and horrible death on the Place de Grève, where Lulli's accomplice was actually burned, and his ashes thrown to the winds. The story of Lulli's obtaining letters of nobility through the excellence of his buffoonery in the part of the Muphti in the Bourgeois Gentilhomme, has often been told. This was in 1670, but once a noble, and director of the Royal Academy of Music, he showed but little disposition to contribute to the diversion of others, even by the exercise of his legitimate art. Not only did he refuse to play the violin, but he would not have one in his house. To overcome Lulli's repugnance in this respect, Marshal de Gramont hit upon a very ingenious plan. He used to make one of his servants play the violin in Lulli's presence, upon which the highly susceptible musician would snatch the instrument from the varlet's hands, and restore the murdered melody to life and beauty. Then excited by the pleasure of producing music, he forgot all around him, and continued to play to the delight of the marshal.

Lulli must have had sad trouble with his orchestra, for in his time a violinist was looked upon as merely an adjunct to a dancing master. There was a King of the Fiddles, without whose permission no catgut could be scraped; but in selling his licenses to dancing masters and the musicians of ball-rooms, the ruler of the bows does not appear to have required any proof of capacity from the purchasers. Even the simple expedient of shifting was unknown to Lulli's violinists, and for years after his death to reach the C above the line was a notable feat. The pit quite understood the difficulty, and when the dreaded démachement had to be accomplished, would indulge in sarcastic shouts of "gare l'ut! gare l'ut!"

Strange tales are told of the members of Lulli's company. Dumenil, the tenor, used to steal jewelry from the soprano and contralto of the troop, and to get intoxicated with the baritone. This eccentric virtuoso is said to have drank six bottles of champagne every night he performed, and to have improved gradually until about the fifth. Duménil, after one of his voyages to England, which he visited several times, lost his voice. Then, seeing no reason why he should moderate his intemperance at all, he gave himself up unrestrainedly to drinking and died.

Mlle. Desmâtins, the original representative of Armide, was chiefly celebrated for her love of good living, her corpulence, and her bad grammar. She it was who wrote the celebrated letter communicating to a friend the death of her child "Notre an fan ai maure, vlen de boneure, le mien ai de te voire." Mlle. Desmâtins took so much pleasure in representing royal personages that she assumed the (theatrical) costume and demeanor of a queen in her own household; sat on a throne and made her attendants serve her on their knees. Another vocalist, Marthé Le Zochois, accused of grave flirtation with a bassoon, justified herself by showing a promise of marriage which the gallant instrumentalist had written on the back of an ace of spades.

The opera singers of this period were not particularly well paid, and history relates that Mlles. Aubry and Verdier, being engaged for the same line of business, had to live in the same room, and sleep in the same bed.

Marthé Le Zochois was fond of giving advice to her companions. "Inspire yourself with the situation," she said to Desmâtins, who had to represent Medea abandoned by Jason; "fancy your self in the poor woman's place. If you were deserted by a lover whom you adored," added Marthé, thinking, no doubt, of the bassoon, what should you do?"

"I should look out for another," replied the ingenious girl.

But by far the most distinguished operatic actress of this period was Mlle. de Maupin, now better known through Théophile Gautier's scandalous but brilliant and vigorously written romance, than by her actual adventures and exploits, which, however, were sufficiently remarkable. Mlle. de Maupin was in many respects the Lola Montez of her day, but with more beauty, more talent, more power, and more daring. When she appeared as Minerva in Lulli's Cadmus, and, taking off her helmet to the public, showed her lovely light-brown hair, which hung in luxuriant tresses over her shoulders, the audience were in ecstasies of delight. With less talent, and less powers of fascination, she would infallibly have been executed for the numerous fatal duels in which she took part, and might even have been burnt alive for invading the sanctity of a convent at Avignon, to say nothing of her attempt to set fire to it. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that Lola Montez was the Mlle. Maupin of her day; a Maupin of constitutional monarchy, and of a century which is moderate in its passions and its vices as in other things.

One of the most interesting and one of the latest works represented at the Royal Italian Opera was Gluck's Orfeo, and the reader has already seen how the Orfeo of Gluck takes us back to Rameau, Lulli, and the earliest days of the musical drama. We might have given this explanation beforehand. Perhaps the reader will be kind enough to accept it now?

Mr. B. J. Lang has returned from a tour in Europe, which we doubt not has passed both agreeably and profitably to himself. His many friends are glad to welcome him home again.

PROFESSIONAL VOCALISTS.—The churchwarden of the church in the diocese of Ripon, England, has written a long reply to the letter of the bishop of Ripon—published in our last justifying the employment of professional singers in churches, on four grounds: 1. The custom in cathedrals. 2. The requirements in the Book of Common Prayer. 3. The ordinary practice of announcing, on special occasions, particular preachers. 4. The difficulties which churchwardens experience in obtaining the funds which are required for the repair of churches, etc. The bishop answers at length, adhering to his previous opinion, and points out the difference between a regular choir and a professional singer. He says: "You are mistaken in supposing it is the custom to announce that professional singers will take part in cathedral services. Each cathedral has its own staff of singers, who are trained to the practice of music, and to whom devolve mainly the due performance of the musical portions of the service. I am not aware of any instance in which professional singing has been advertised as an attraction to bring persons to attend cathedral service. The practice is in reality indefensible. It is derogatory to the honor of God; it is at variance with the spirit of your Church service; it is fraught with many evils. Its tendency is to degrade our churches to the level of the concert-room; to make persons lose sight of the real ends of public worship, and in their admiration of musical talent to forget that we meet in the Lord's house for united prayer, united praise, and in order that our souls may be fed with the wholesome food of God's holy word and sacraments. When a parish is blessed with an active and laborious minister of Christ, in season and out of season abounding in his Master's work, preaching to his people both by word and example, and showing himself "in all things a pattern of good works," I am sanguine enough to believe that such a minister will succeed to rally around him an attached and willing people, ready to uphold to the utmost of their power the due observance of our holy religion. There will be no need in such a case to employ any doubtful measures for creating an interest in behalf of the Church or her services. I am desirous to see these services upheld with the utmost propriety and efficiency. There is not a parish in the diocese in which there may not be found a sufficient number of persons competent to lead congregational singing. I think it important to cultivate the taste for music. We ought to give to God of our best; but it is no gain to the cause of religion, whenever by the introduction of highly artistic music the congregation are deprived of the privilege of joining in the praises of God; or whenever, for the sake of replenishing a churchwarden's exchequer, the season for the celebration of public worship is employed as an occasion for calling together a multitude to have their musical taste gratified by the performance of select pieces of fine music."

MUSIC OF THE REFORMERS.—The feeble rays of divine truth which broke from the mind of Wickliffe, on a dark and corrupt age, and which increased their radiance, until the deformity and impious domination of the Romish Church was broken at the Reformation, carried with them some alteration in the choral service of the Church. A more simplified style of singing was practiced by the followers of Wickliffe which was carried forward by the Hussites.

With these examples before him, Calvin gave a still greater impulse to dissent from the choral service of the Popish Church, with which, on many other accounts, it is well known he had but little sympathy. With the assistance of Theodore Beza, he introduced a new version of the Psalms set to music by Guillaume Franco, in one part only. These compositions soon became popular through all the reformed Churches.

Martin Luther from having an ear no doubt more correctly attuned to melodious sounds than those of the two foregoing celebrated men and a soul on which devotion ascended more readily on the sublime strains of devotion, retained more of the splendor of the established choral service. He composed many hymns, some of which he himself set to music; specimens of both remain to the present time. The hymn beginning, "Great God, what do I see and hear," etc., and the "Old Hundred" tune, are considered, amidst some doubts, to be of the number.

In England, many of the Reformers disapproved of the secular spirit and cumbersome ceremonies of the musical part of the Church service, and Latimer went so far as to forbid singing of any kind within the limits of his diocese.—Hirst's Music of the Church.

ALBANY, N. Y.—The piano factory of Boardman, Gray & Co., was burnt Sept. 16. with 150 pianos. Loss $90,000; insured $59,000.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Bulletin says of Patti's performance in La Traviata, in which she appeared on Monday evening of last week.

The whole of the music of the first act was exquisitely sung, and there was enough of vivacity in her acting. But it was difficult to reconcile the character of the fallen woman of the opera with the youth and innocence of the singer, and we pay a compliment to Miss Patti when we say she did not well represent Violetta. But her singing was beautiful, and at the first fall of the curtain the applause was hearty.

In the subsequent scenes of the opera the physical and dramatic deficiencies of the young artist showed themselves, and though no fault could be found with her singing, the want of force and intensity, and the inadequacy of her young and sunny face to represent the anguish and passion that the situations call for, were very obvious. With delicious singing, perfect propriety and grace in movement, and intelligence in every phrase that she uttered, Miss Patti still failed to make an impression as Violetta, although the applause, especially in the last act, was very generous. It is not to be regretted that a young artist, who is so charming in other parts, and who sings the music of Rossini, Bellini and Donizetti so much better than any other woman in the country, should not be equal to the stormy music of Verdi. With increasing years and vigor, and with some harsher experience of a world that has thus far treated her only with kindness, Miss Patti may acquire also the power and the passion essential to the proper performance of Verdi's operas. At present we prefer not to see her in them.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.—At the "Golden Eagle" we also found one whose name is a "household word" in thousands of homes on both sides of the Atlantic, Hans Christian Andersen, beloved of children, for whom he has written so many exquisite stories. M. Andersen looks to be about fifty years of age; is very tall, fair, rather thin, of very simple, gentlemanly bearing, with a long, placid, benevolent face, that seems to be always on the point of breaking into a smile, large white teeth, clear, blue, child-like eyes, light hair, and an entire absence of beard and whisker. He spends his summers—in long frock coat, lavender kid gloves, and his inseparable umbrella under his arm—in wandering leisurely through the loveliest portions of Switzerland and Italy, visiting old friends, making new ones, and filling his mind with the noblest and loveliest imagery of nature. After which he turns his steps to his northern home, and adds some new tale to the long list of charming creations which have made his name so pleasant a sound to his readers. Though one of the kindest and most affectionate of human beings, M. Andersen is not only unmarried, but is believed to have never been in love. He is a universal favorite, and his heart has been invaded and taken possession of by such numbers of appreciative and affectionate friends of both sexes, that he seems to have found it impossible to give himself up to any more exclusive sentiment. He is a great admirer of the scenery of Lake Lucerne, and comes every year to the "Golden Eagle," for whose owners he professes great regard.—Corr. of Saturday Evening Post.

Italian Opera.

The Opera has come to us at an unfortunate season. The Presidential Election, always an exciting event, brings this year an unwonted interest. Mass meetings break out sporadically by day, while nightly processions with prismatic torches, rubber capes, sulphureous fumes, and indefatigable drums fill all our streets and penetrate to the quietest of our suburbs. A never ending rub-a-dub, from dusk on to the small hours. Inter arma silent cantores.

The fashionable world meanwhile acknowledges a gentle flutter of interest in the Renfrew Ball. Diamonds are re-set; antique laces are taken from perfumed cabinets; and all the resources of millinery will be employed to dazzle and bewilder. With an anticipation of an evening in the presence of royalty, and the possibility of contact with a princely hand, what belle could be content with the tame pleasure of an evening at the opera? No, Mr. Servadio, you have fallen on evil times. The shilling gallery has been recruited for tantara clubs, and the dress-circle will glisten no more with jewels until The Event.

The season opened with Il Poluto, never a favorite in this city. We were not able to be present, but have been informed that it was, in mercantile phrase, a fair average performance.

"The Barber" drew a better house on Wednesday evening, although there were some appalling blank spaces, and, in consequence, breaks in the magnetic circle on which sympathetic enthusiasm runs. The melodies sparkled gaily and the whole performance went off smoothly and without jar. But that is not enough for an opera like "The Barber"; the brisk action, the laughing volubility, the vis comica were sadly wanting. Figaro requires the sprightliness of Mercury, talaria and all; it is not enough that he sings the music without mistakes, and follows the traditional routine of stage business. We must say, however, that Signor Ardavanni has a fine figure, a rich voice, and a good method. Signor Tamaro is a singer whose short-comings are due to Nature rather than himself. He always strives to please and generally sings well, but he rarely interests the audience; perhaps because people do not fancy a hero five and a half feet high. His Count Almaviva suited the general tameness that prevailed upon the stage. Signor Bellini is one of the stereotyped buffos, whose fun lies mainly in a quasi parlante style that is neither singing nor talking,—a hoarse jollity, like Captain Cuttle disporting through a speaking trumpet,—walking meanwhile with legs wide a-straddle, and grinning with a portentously painted visage. Funny, but not artistic. Signor Amodio as Don Basilio is always amusing and his occasional extravagances and English interpolations may perhaps be pardoned in a character meant to be grotesque. Miss Philipps showed little trace of her recent severe illness, and confirmed the favorable impression she made in her former appearance as Rosina. Her full tones were never more beautiful; her manner, though not so coquettish (it seems to us) as the character requires, was lively and engaging. Perhaps a tenor of more spirit would have brought out her reserved force and stimulated her to a more brilliant style of acting.

The orchestra was ably directed by Mr. Anschütz. On Thursday, Signor Amodio the younger was to make his debut in the rôle of Germont in La Traviata. None of the new stars up to this present writing have appeared upon the stage. We are promised two new and beautiful prime donne also a new opera, La Juif.

Musical Chit-Chat.

This evening a complimentary concert is to be given to Mr. Gilmore at the Music Hall. The orchestra will number sixty performers. We trust the benefit may be a substantial one.

The Handel and Haydn Society commenced their rehearsals last Sunday evening at Chickering's new hall. The room was very much admired both for its acoustic properties and for the simple elegance of its decorations.

Mr. Mills, the English pianist whose first appearance we chronicled some weeks ago, we hear is coming here soon, to give a series of classical concerts—partly, it is said, for the purpose of introducing the Steinway pianofortes.

We have received a letter from our correspondent the "Diarrist" (too late for this number) dated at Bonn, Sept. 9th.

LYMAN W. WHEELER, a very successful teacher for several years in the West, sailed for Europe on Wednesday in the "Europa."

Mr. ZERRAHN contemplates establishing a vocal class or classes for young ladies on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. The course will begin with the rudiments and carry the pupils to reading at sight. The success of Mr. Zerrahn's vocal teaching in the Normal School seems to have given rise to this plan, which is certainly a good one and deserving of encouragement.

THE CONCERT SEASON will probably commence about the last of October. Rumors are rife of a series by the Philharmonic Society; another by Mills, the young English pianist; and the regular series by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. In case the Philharmonic Society fail to give concerts, Carl Zerrahn will offer a subscription series, as heretofore. The Handel and Haydn Society also have several novelties in the course of preparation, and there is every reason to anticipate rich and rare musical treats during the winter months.

SOBOLEWSKI, composer of an American opera in the German language, which was performed at Milwaukee last season, not without success, has lately been induced to remove from there to St. Louis, where a Philharmonic Society, under his direction, has since been established—something that was very much needed in the Babel of orchestras and brass bands, as St. Louis has been termed. The new Society starts with a fund of 15,000 dollars, contributed by citizens.

WACHTEL, the great new German tenor, of which our last week's Viennese report spoke, was formerly a hack-driver in Hamburg.

OFFENBACHS' comic operetta, "Orpheus in the lower regions," has reached the 229th representation in Paris. It was brought out first a little over a year ago. A German version of the play is now being performed in Berlin and Vienna with the same success. The comic points are mostly in the text.

BIRTHDAY ONCE IN FOUR YEARS.—Rossini was born on the 29th of February, 1792, consequently his birthday occurs but once in four years.

THE SUNDAY COURIER.—We find in the Macon Republic the following well-deserved notice of the Sunday Courier of New York. Charles F. Briggs, the editor, is one of the ablest literary men in the country. He edited Putnam's Monthly during its palmy days, and under the soubriquet of "Harry Franco," wrote many admirable tales and poems. "The New York Sunday Courier is the best and most scholarly of the Sunday journals published in the great metropolis. Its leading articles are always full of sound logic, and well written. There is also a dash of satire in its comments on public men and things, as cutting as the edge of a small sword, and much more dangerous. Our contemporary, we know, must be a pleasant, as well as a gallant gentleman, for he says so many good things of the ladies, and never touches their dresses without being spicy. All respectable people, we should think, would take the Courier, since it discards politics altogether."—Home Journal.

Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, with her husband and two children, has arrived at her native city (Stockholm), where she received a most enthusiastic welcome. The family are spending the season at a villa in the neighborhood of the city; but we believe M. and Madame Goldschmidt have made England their permanent place of residence.

A FOOLISH VIOLIN PLAYER.—The latest bit of gossip that has come to our ears, is of Wieniowski, the celebrated violin player, who may have delighted many of our readers. Previous to his marriage with Miss Hampton, the niece of Mr. Osborn, of musical fame, he thought he would take a run of a day or two up the Rhine, not, like a wise man, waiting till he had some one to take care of him. The consequence was, that he must just take an hour's look in to see old friends at Wiesbaden, and then to pass an idle moment looking at the green table doings. But the enticements were too great for a Pole, and from a florin to forty thousand francs was a rapid step, and he came away to his bride a sadder and a wiser man, and will be able to expend a little real knowledge of the feelings of the gambler in the composition of a brilliant fantasia, entitled "Le Jeu," which, in a grand diminuendo roudade, will show the way the money went.—Home Journal.

The Home Journal says:

Lamartine has written a biographical and critical sketch of Estelle Anna Lewis, the poetess, for the Cours de Littérature. Alfred Montemont is translating into the French language her poem, comprising "Records of the Heart," "Child of the Sea," "Loves of the Minstrels," and "Helemar, the Last of the Montezumas," a tragedy.

We wonder what the belle monde of Paris will think of the state of poetry in the United States? Could Lamartine find no better employment (in the intervals of his princely mendicancy) than the translation of poor poems?

HUMOR AND MUSIC.—When humor joins with rhythm and music, and appears in song, its influence is irresistible; its charities are countless; it stirs the feelings to love, peace, friendship, as scarce any moral agent can. The songs of Beranger are hymns of love and tenderness. I have seen great whiskered Frenchmen warbling the "bonne Veilla," "Soldats, au pas, au pas," with tears rolling down their moustaches. At a Burns festival, I have seen Scotchmen singing Burns, while the drops twinkled down their furrowed cheeks; while each rough hand was flung out to grasp its neighbors; while early scenes and sacred recollections, and dear, delightful memories of the past came rushing back at the sound of the familiar words and music, and the softened heart was full of love, and friendship, and home. Humor! if tears are the arms of gentle spirits, and may be counted, as sure they may, among the sweetest of life's charities—of kindly sensibility, and sweet, sudden emotion, which exhibits itself at the eyes, I know no such provocative as humor. It is an irresistible sympathizer; it surprises you into compassion; you are laughing and disarmed, and suddenly forced into tears.—Thackeray.

WORCESTER.—The Germania Band played finely at the concert last night, and drew hearty applause from a large and appreciating audience. They have always been the favorite concert band of Boston, with a large portion of the New England public, and they will always find a welcome in Worcester. They accompany the third battalion to Leominster.

CHOPIN.—He was a delicate, graceful figure, in the highest degree attractive—the whole man a mere breath—rather a spiritual than a bodily substance,—all harmony like his playing. His way of speaking, too, was like the character of his art—soft, fluctuating, murmuring. The son of a French father and of a Polish mother, in him the Romanic and Slavonic dialects were combined, as it were in one perfect harmony. He seemed, indeed, hardly to touch the piano; you might have fancied he would do quite as well without as with the instrument: you thought no more of the mechanism, but listened to flute like murmurs, and dreamed of hearing Æolian harps stirred by the ethereal breathings of the wind; and with all this—in this whole wide sphere of talents given to him alone—always obliging, modest, unexacting! He was no pianoforte player of the modern sort; he had fashioned his art quite alone in his own way, and it was something indescribable. In private rooms as well as in concerts, he would steal quietly, unaffectedly, to the piano; was content with any kind of seat; showed at once, by his simple dress and natural demeanor, that he abhorred every kind of grimace and quackery; and began, without any prelude, his performance. How feeling it was—how full of soul! * * When I first knew him, though far from strong, he still enjoyed good health; he was very gay, even satirical, but always with moderation and good taste. He possessed an inconceivably comic gift of mimicry, and in private circles of friends he diffused the utmost cheerfulness both by his genius and by his good spirits. * * Halle has now the best traditions of his manner.

HAYDN IN HIS OLD AGE.—You knock at the door; it is opened to you with a cheerful smile by a worthy little old woman, his housekeeper; you ascend a short flight of wooden stairs, and find in the second chamber of a very simple apartment a tranquil old man, sitting at a desk, absorbed in the melancholy sentiment that life is escaping from him, and so complete a nonentity with respect to every thing besides, that he stands in need of visitors to recall to him what he has once been. When he sees any one enter a pleasing smile appears upon his lips, a tear moistens his eyes, his countenance recovers its animation, his voice becomes clear, he recognizes his guest, and talks to him of his early years, of which he has a much better recollection than of his latter ones; you think that the artist still exists; but soon he relapses before your eyes into this habitual state of lethargy and sadness.—Aurelian.

MADAME MALIBRAN.—One day an intimate friend accused her of being generally too tame in the opening scenes of her characters; her reply was curious. "I look upon the heads in the pit as one great mass of wax candles; if I were to light them up all at once, they would waste and soon burn out; but by lighting gradually I obtain in time a brilliant illumination. My system is to light up the public by degrees."

Malibran has been known to undergo the wear and tear of a five hours' rehearsal, with a song at some morning concert between its pauses, and then again in the evening, half an hour after having gone through one of her exhausting parts, to be found as energetic and animated as ever at the Philharmonic or Ancient concert, and then again she would leave for some private party, where after singing with a freshness little impaired she would wind up the day's exertion, perhaps, by dancing the "Tarantella."

APOLOGUE OF JEAN-PAUL RICHTER.—One day the guardian genius of all who possess strong sensibility thus addressed Jupiter:—"Father divine! bestow on thy poor human creatures a language more expressive than any they now possess, for they have only words signifying how they suffer, how they enjoy, and how they love." "Have I not given them tears?" replied the deity,—"tears of pleasure, of pain, and the softer ones that flow from the tender passions?" The genius answered,—"O, god of men, tears do not sufficiently speak the overflows of the heart; give, I thee supplicate, to man a language that can more powerfully paint the languishing and impassioned wishes of a susceptible soul,—the recollections, so delightful, of infancy,—the soft dreams of youth, and the hopes of another life, which mature age indulges while contemplating the last rays of the sun as they sink in the ocean;—give them, father of all! a new language of the heart." At this moment the celestial harmonies of the spheres announced to Jupiter the approach of the Muse of Song. To her the god immediately made a sign, and thus uttered his behests:—"Descend on earth, O Muse, and teach mankind thy language." And the Muse of Song descended to earth, taught us her accents, and from that time the heart of man has been able to speak.

A FEW QUESTIONS FOR INTELLIGENT MUSICIANS.—May not a bar of very exultant music be called a crow-bar?

In what bank are the eight notes you talk of raising?

Is an air called a "strain" on account of the labor of performing it?

Can you do a good turn in a natural way?

Is not the influence of flats rather depressing in hot weather?

Is there necessarily anything green about a pastoral symphony?

Are agricultural youths partial to the hautboy?

Can a French horn intoxicate?

Could you open a musical entertainment without the key?

Musical Miscellany.

TEACH YOUR CHILDREN MUSIC.—You will stare at a strange notion of mine; if it appears even a mad one, do not wonder. Had I children, my utmost endeavors should be to make them musicians. Considering I have no ear, nor ever thought of music, the preference seems odd, and yet it is embraced on frequent reflection. In short, madam, as my aim would be to make them happy, I think it the most probable method. It is a resource which will last them their lives, unless they grow deaf; it depends upon themselves, not on others; always amuses and soothes, if not consoles; and of all fashionable pleasures, is the cheapest. It is capable of fame without the danger of criticism—is susceptible of enthusiasm without being priest-ridden; and, unlike other mortal passions, is sure of being gratified in Heaven.—Horace Walpole.

A POPULAR BOOK.—One hundred and thirty-five thousand copies of the "Golden Wreath," a volume of songs for children, schools, &c. have been sold. This sale is unprecedented in the music-book trade, no work having ever reached that number within the same period of time. A new book, similar in character, entitled "The Nightingale," seems inclined to follow in the footsteps of its illustrious predecessor.

SINGING AT SIGHT.—In 1741, Handel, proceeding to Ireland, was detained for some days at Chester, in consequence of the weather. During this time, he applied to Mr. Baker, the organist, to know whether there were any choir men in the Cathedral who could sing at sight, as he wished to prove some books that had been hastily transcribed, by trying the choruses. Mr. Baker mentioned some of the best singers in Chester, and, among the rest, a printer of the name of Janson, who had a good bass voice, and was one of the best musicians in the choir. A time was fixed for this private rehearsal at the Golden Falcon, where Handel had taken up his residence; when, on trial of the chorus in the Messiah, "And with his stripes we are healed," poor Janson, after repeated attempts, failed completely. Handel got enraged, and after abusing him in five or six different languages, exclaimed in broken English, "You scoundrel, 'tis not you dell me dat you could sing at soite?" "Yes, sir," said the printer, "and so I can, but not at first sight."

APPRECIATED.—The numerous applications for Ditson & Co.'s extensive catalogue of sheet music and books indicates a just appreciation of their offer to mail it free to any address. The catalogue is the largest in this country, and its admirable classification of musical publications renders it exceedingly valuable.

SACRED MUSIC.—At first it was a whisper among the lowly in the dwellings of the poor. Stealthily it afterwards was murmured in the palace of the Cæsars. In the dead night, in the depths of the catacombs, it trembled in subdued melodies filled with the love of Jesus. At length the grand cathedral arose, and the stately spire; courts and arches echoed, and pillars shook with the thunder of the majestic organ, and choirs sweetly attuned, joined their voices in all the moods and measures of the religious heart, in its most exalted, most profound, most intense experience put into lyrical expression. I know that piety may reject, may repel this form of expression, still these sublime ritual harmonies cannot but give the spirit that sympathizes with them, the sense of a mightier being. But sacred music has power without a ritual. In the rugged hymn, which connects itself, not alone with immortality, but also with the memory of brave saints, there is power. There is power in the hymn in which our father's joined. Grand were those rude psalms which once arose amidst the solitudes of the Alps.

Grand were those religious songs, sung in brave devotion by the persecuted Scotch, in the depths of their moors and their glens. The hundredth psalm, rising in the fullness of three thousand voices up into the clear sky, broken among rocks, prolonged and modulated through valleys, softened over the surface of mountain-guarded lakes, had a grandeur and a majesty, contrasted with which mere art is poverty and meanness. And while thus reflecting on sacred music, we think with wonder on the Christian Church—on its power and on its compass. Less than nineteen centuries ago, its first hymn was sung in an upper chamber of Jerusalem; and those who sung it were quickly scattered. And now the Christian hymn is one that never ceases—one that is heard in every tongue; and the whisper of that upper chamber is now a chorus that fills the world.—Rev. Henry Giles.

A GEM FOR SOCIETIES AND CLUBS.—"The Operatic Bouquet."—Mr. Bruce has prepared this book in a manner highly creditable, and fully satisfactory to the hundreds of societies and private clubs of musical amateurs who have long wanted a collection of the kind. It will be one of the leading books of the season.

DR. JOHNSON.—The late Dr. Johnson's ear, in respect of the power of appreciating musical sounds, was remarkably defective; nevertheless, he possessed a sense of propriety in harmonic composition that gave him an unconquerable distaste to all unmeaning flourish and rapidity of execution. Being one night at a concert where an elaborate and florid concerto on the violin was performed, after it was over, he asked a gentleman who sat near him what it meant. The question somewhat puzzled the amateur, who could only say, that it was very difficult. "Difficult!" answered the learned auditor, "I wish to God it had been impossible."

De Lisle wrote his immortal Marsellaise Hymn, music and words, in a single night of excitement; Rossini, the famous Di Tanti Palpit in a restaurant while waiting for his macaroni; Mozart, the overture of Don Giovanni during a few hours of midnight, while his dear Constance, in order to keep him awake, had to ply him with punch, and tell him fairy tales and odd stories, which made him laugh till the tears came; and his opera, La Clemenza di Tito, he commenced in his travelling carriage, and completed in eighteen days. Bellini composed one of the most exquisite arias in La Norma, as he wandered in a fit of deep melancholy through a masquerade ball room.

THE VIOLIN A PERFECT INSTRUMENT.—It would appear that the violin is a perfect instrument, since, although more than two hundred and fifty years have transpired since its origin in Italy, and countless attempts have been made to improve upon its construction, it not only remains without material change, but connoisseurs esteem the oldest specimens of the greatest value—especially those made by the brothers Amati, and by Stradivarius, at Cremona, about the year 1650.

LABLACHE was born at Naples in 1792. He was at one time one of the most popular buffo actors in Italy, and would have passed his life as such but for the persuasions of his wife, who urged him to a career of more extended labors. As one of the results of his efforts we have "Lablache's Method of Singing," one of the most popular and meritorious systems of vocal instruction in use.

All nature's full of music: The summer bower Respondeth to the songster's morning lay. The bee his concert keeps from flower to flower, As forth he sallies on his honied way; Brook calls to brook, as down the hills they stray; The isles resound with song, from shore to shore, Whilst viewless minstrels on the wings that play, Consorted streams in liquid measures pour, To thunder's deep ton'd voice, or ocean's sullen roar.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

I think of love and thee. J. L. Hatton. 25

A very pleasing parlor song.

Old times and old friends. McNaughton. 25

A favorite-song in this author's easy and agreeable style.

Lovely Lillie Dee. Song & Chorus. F. Wilson. 25

A capital song of its kind, likely to become popular.

Yes or no. Stephen Glover. 25

The air of this little song is pretty and lively and will be liked by young singers.

Good night. (Cradle Song.) A. Reichardt. 25

A beautiful song in the German style, by the composer of the much admired ballad "Thou art so near and yet so far."

Hushed are the winds. H. von Benzon. 25

A pretty song, which, in a young lady's musicfolio, would not likely be passed over.

Mother, dear, I'm thinking of you. With Guitar accompaniment. Ordway. 25

Make me no gaudy chaplet. With Guitar accompaniment. "Lucrezia Borgia." 25

Joe Hardy. With Guitar accomp. C. J. Dorn. 25

Now made accessible for the first time to those who use the guitar as an instrument to accompany the voice. The arrangements are simple.

Instrumental Music.

Une nuit sur l'ocean. Nocturne sentimentale.

August Gockel. 35

The composer, a pupil of Mendelssohn, and known through some of the Eastern states, a few years ago, as a young pianist of rare natural gifts, wrote this charming little Song without words on his passage hither from his native country. It is technically not difficult, but wants very precise and neat execution.

Ever of thee Quickstep. J. W. Turner. 25

A stirring piece of music by the popular composer introducing in the Trio the beautiful melody, from which the title is taken.

Prince Imperial Quadrille. L. Louis. 35

This is the true and genuine copy of the new leading quadrille in Paris. The principal professors of the Terpsichorean art in our large cities are going to introduce it and it will doubtless prove taking. The figures are accurately given.

Flirtation Galop. Carl Zerrahn. 25

A very pleasing Galop, which, with the advent of the Afternoon Rehearsals in a month or two, will become very popular.

Books.

DITSON & CO.'S STANDARD OPERA LIBRETTOS. Comprising all the Principal Operas and containing English and Italian Words, with the Music of the Principal Airs. Each 25

As the season approaches for operatic performances, we shall be doing our readers a favor by directing their attention to the above elegant and convenient series of librettos, an advertisement of which will be found in another column.

To Laura at the Piano.

TRANSLATED FROM SCHILLER BY CLAUDE BOWEN.

When thy white hand o'er the ivory dances,
Writing on the keys thy heart's romances,
Soul-less, statue-like I stand.
Thou hast power o'er the dead and living;
While thy brain those gorgeous chords is weaving,
Dead ideas waken—
From memory's charnel taken,
And living thoughts are lost on the Cocythus' strand.

Reverent and slow the breeze is soaring,
Listening to thy soul's outpouring.
Fettered to thy softly-purling
Song, for ever round thee whirling,
Listening natures must be quiet
And drink in thy joy-songs riot.
Sorceress as thou charm'st one by thy glance,
So thou charm'st them by thy fingers' dance.

From the strings emanate, (as from their heaven Seraphs fair and young,) Soulful harmonies; and space is riven
By this sensual throng.
As the suns,—escaped from chaos' mighty arm,
And moulded by creation into form—
Rose, sparkling, from their cradle night,
So flows thy song's bewitching might.

Sweetly now, as chrystal wavelets tinkle
When thy golden pebbles oversprinkle,
Grandly then as nature's moans,
As the thunder's organ tones,
Madly now flowing, like the foam-footed torrent
When it rushes and leaps from the rocks high and horrent
Soft and subdued
Fawningly tender now,
As through the aspen-wood
Caressing winds blow,

Sadder now, thereby a tearful sobbing,
Like the night winds through the Tartarus throbbing,
Where the ceaseless cries of woe
On the Cocythus' tear-waves flow.
Maiden! placing on thy word reliance,
Tell me, art thou not with higher spirits in alliance?
Is not this the language given
To the denizens of heaven?

Cincinnati, Sept. 1860.

The Diarist Abroad.

UTILE ET DULCE.

[Had you stood—a little more than a month ago, —to be exact, August 3, about 7 o'clock, P. M.,—just outside the railroad station-house in Munich, near the cab stand, you might have seen emerging from one of the doors, a rather short and stout individual—several inches too short and thick to be mistaken for an Apollo—with a gray felt travelling cap on his head, and a straw broad brim in his hand, a bushy, whitening beard covering the south side of his face, an armful of shawl and extra coat, and two black travelling bags and an umbrella. It rained. This individual was the D——!]

He had come that afternoon from Salzburg, upon that magnificent railroad that skirts the great Bavarian plains and affords such exquisite views of the Alps through nearly its whole extent.

At the moment when our tale opens he had refused to employ a cab to carry him the few rods which intervened between the Station and the Stackus Inn, and was proposing to a laboring man, to take his bags and lead him to the Gast-haus. How he found the Stackus full—where he had spent so pleasant an eight days in 1851—and three other inns—and at last put up with a room in the new part of the Bamberger-hof, the undried plaster of which still dripped, —how he ate fish and then went into the great beer hall of the inn and made ethnological observations—and how at last he rolled himself in his shawl, before he trusted himself to the tender mercies of the damp bed—all this and the like, we pass over.

It was hardly light when the D—— arose, and made ready to take the 5 A. M., train which was to bring him to Frankfort on the Main, at nine in the evening. It appears from the documents furnished us by the individual in question, that he found a great crowd of people pressing to the ticket office; that he and a strange gentleman waited until the crowd was less and reached the window at the same moment; that the stranger, whose baggage was already delivered, handed out the exact price of his ticket in Bavarian silver, a portion of which was in small pieces; whereupon the ticket seller, pushed it back, exclaiming in a rude tone, "I have no time to count it," and refused the ticket! Our hero, thereupon with misgivings offered the only money he had, Prussian bank notes—and a ticket was also refused him. The train was off. Four hours to wait and a night to spend on the road—pleasant prospect. The ticket man caught it, from the Russian, for such the stranger proved to be. The two companions in misfortune became acquainted and the D——, learned that his new friend was a large landed proprietor and Russian Senator.

Our hero undertook a long walk, but was driven back to the station by rain. The Russian invited him to visit the Schwanthaler Studio, where he had recently purchased one of Hautmann's beautiful statues for his seat in Russia. A welcome invitation.

The Studio—now the Schwanthaler Museum—a large rambling collection of rather rudely built rooms and halls, contains the models of most—perhaps all the great works of that master; the grand head of the Bavaria; colossal Goethes, Mozarts, Jean Pauls and others; kings, princes, warriors, artists.

But what interested the D—— most, was Sculptor Hautmann himself—a man in the best years, with a fine, noble head, and singularly modest and retiring. He spoke of his own works only in reply to the questions, which their beauty forced from his visitors. Two fine models of female figures, size of life, together with a remark made by the D——, in relation to Hautmann's knowledge of the English tongue, led to a story, which he told with a slightly sarcastic smile playing round his mouth, of an immensely wealthy English Mæcenas for whom he had wrought them in marble. The risk of breaking them was so great, that he went to England and finished them there. This risk he must bear himself—for if the statues were not delivered and placed upon their pedestals uninjured, Mæcenas would not have them nor pay him a penny for his labor. Mæcenas saw in the artist evidently, but the stonemason and the pecuniary results corresponded to this idea. The D—— was reminded of the rich New Yorker, who guessed "that sculptor had risk."

It was pleasant to hear Hautmann speak of Crawford's Works; especially of the Washington and the accompanying statues, and of the Beethoven, which, though as a portrait might as well be called by a dozen other names, yet as an ideal statue of a great musical artist, is magnificent. He exhibited some models and works half completed in marble—funereal monuments—destined for America; and wrought a few minutes upon a group of children, reclining in a shallow vase-like basket, that his visitors might see the modus operandi. Altogether it was a pleasant hour and made up in some measure for the rudeness of the railroad official.

The D—— was in too great haste to reach Frankfort, to remain in Munich, and parting with the friendly Russian—who assured him that all difficulties were gradually disappearing in the emancipation of the serfs, and that his Czar would carry this great measure through—he proceeded onward to Bamberg, where he spent the night.

Next day, via Würzburg, per railroad, to Frankfort, and to the inn, "Stadt Darmstadt," which is as small, and neat, and clean, and pleasant, as it was, when Rev. J. A., who recommended it so highly, was there five years ago.

A busy week here: the forenoons mostly with Schindler, the Biographer of Beethoven—indeed two or three of the afternoons also. These long interesting, and exciting conversations, confirmed the visitor in the opinion at different times recorded in this Journal, that the so much abused Schindler, however much mistaken in many minor points in his book, owing to insufficient data, and to the errors of correspondents, is a perfectly honest writer, and fired with a love and veneration for Beethoven's memory, which seems to increase with advancing age—for Schindler is now a man of sixty-five years. He has a good memory—for he recognized in the D——, his visitor of 1854, and enquired about Homer and other Americans, whom he had seen at various times.

Schindler declares that nobody plays Beethoven's works now in the style of the composer himself, and the players of his time, whom he instructed. This must be so; for nobody now executes in his manner. Hawkins—is it not?—says, that when Handel played on organ or harpsichord, he held his hands so still that a guinea would not slip from them; this was Bach's, Mozart's and Beethoven's manner. How can the modern mode of tossing the hands, as if playing with balls, bring out the effects produced by those masters? Other effects, perhaps as good, but the effects which they intended in their music—is not that doubtful? Would it not be well for some good pianist to examine into this matter?

From Frankfort to Bonn, where after a busy season, the D—— at length writes us as follows:—]

Bonn, Sept. 8th, et seq. 1860.

I came down the Rhine from Mayence the other day, or rather two days, for I stopped one night in Coblenz. On the boat I met Carl Formes, who must now be with you again, for he told me that he was to sail for America on the first of September.

It is six years since I was last on the Rhine. Alas, they are spoiling it! The railroad on the left bank from Cologne to Mayence has been long finished, and another on the right bank, is drawing near completion. The shores are thus gradually becoming as stiff and uniform all the way as those of a canal. They are spoiling the Rhine—that is, just as you spoil a magnificent savage from the far West by civilizing him and dressing him up in swallow-tailed coat and stove-pipe hat.

So much the better for trade and business, I know; your civilized savage has far more wants to be supplied by the trader, than the savage who still knows nothing of rum and religion.

Ten years ago the stream here and there could still undermine and carry away its banks; many of the little towns and villages, brooding in their nests between the river and the hills, which now show a thousand unmistakable marks of modern improvement, in new buildings of all sorts, promenades with rows of young trees, and the like, then looked so old and tumble-down, so neglected, sleepy and lazy, and sent out so strong a—say perfume, that Father Rhine held his nose as he rushed by—as to carry an American irresistibly back into the far legendary past and change for him a mere tramp on the Rhine into a journey in the middle ages. That is what we want, is it not? We can see enough of the New in the new world—indeed a vast deal so very new as to be worse than worthless—but when we visit Europe we ask the Old. We wish to see the Europe of which we have read all our lives.

When Paul Flemming stopped his coach and went up the ascent to Stolzenfels, the old ruined castle preached him a sermon, not over and above comprehensible, upon a Bishop of ancient time and his homunculus; now you find there a marvellously trim castle “with all the modern improvements,” and the man or woman who shows you about, describes this and that, shows you the sword of Napoleon, (a trophy of Waterloo), and at last astonishes and awes the auditor by the momentous information that in this room—this particular room—Queen Victoria slept in 1845! He does not tell you, though you may very likely hear it in Coblenz, that Victoria (the wife, not the Queen), kept her Albert here shut up for a time, away from the danger of prettier eyes than her own—which is probably a joke or a piece of scandal;—nor does he tell of the homunculus. There by Bingen, too, Bishop Hatto's Mouse tower, which used to have such a fine, old, decayed ruined look, all neglected on its island, has been renovated and looks as trim as a peasant girl in so tight a bodice that she can hardly breathe, and her hair tied back so fast that she can't shut her eyes.

Tall red brick chimneys of manufactories are increasing in number, until they bid fair to become the feature in the landscape, and reduce old doujon keeps and curious watch-towers to quite a secondary place. There is one comfort, though; many of the ruins are upon such barren, bare, God-forsaken pinnacles of rock, that they can never pay for modernizing; nor do I see how they can be made of any pecuniary value, unless some German, who has been in America, should have gained acuteness enough to buy them, surround them with a wall and charge twenty-five cents admission.

For the people who live here, they are not spoiling the Rhine; the peasants and laboring classes, have higher wages, and are better educated, fed and clothed than ever before. We are the sufferers, we who travel in search of picturesque antiquity. Is not a squalid, half starved, ragged, dirty beggar, a thousand times better subject for Barry, the artist, than you or I, ruddy from good beef and in our “Sunday” suits?

In Coblenz I asked young Wegeler about the man in the custom house, whilom the topic of a confab between Paul Flemming and his coachman.

“He is not on the custom house,” said he,

“but the Kaufhaus”—which proved to be a building, wherein are offices connected with the markets. It stands with the rear based upon the town wall, by the river Moselle, not far below the bridge, and fronts upon a market-place. Rising from the cave above, the main entrance is a low clock tower, and under this protrudes a large face and head of iron, wearing a helmet. The eyes are turned to one side, so that your own almost ache from sympathy; and this, with the great mouth and the huge black beard, make him look grim enough. It is only at noon that the head gives signs of life; so, next day, as noon approached, I happened to be taking a walk in that quarter, and found myself before the Kaufhaus a minute or two before the time. Two or three children of smaller, and two of us of larger growth, were the visitors to the man on the Kaufhaus that day. Small notice he took of us! His eyes were as fixed as ever in their side-ward glance. Giant Grim himself could not look grimmer. Did he await an enemy or a friend from that quarter? Was it fear or hope, that I read in his face?

The children of smaller growth made no secret of it, that the man on the Kaufhaus was what they “had come out for to see”; but we two put on such an extraordinary air of being innocent of all knowledge of and curiosity in regard to the distinguished personage under the clock tower, that doubtless there was “loud smiling” behind fifty windows at our expense.

There!—down goes the great under jaw, and, with the boom of the bell again flies upward. Twelve times the clock strikes, and twelve times the man on the Kaufhaus wags his black beard; but he never turns his eyes, nor speaks one word.

The steamboat, favored by the swift current, flew past the island of Nonnenwerth and Roland's (not R. Litchfield's) corner, on the left, than the Drachenfels or Dragon Rock, with the other of the Seven Mountains, on the right, and Bonn was before us, some three miles away seen across plain and river. A few minutes more and the boat was moored at the landing, and I once again trod the narrow streets of my first German home.

No Grande Hotel Royale, or costly Stern for me, but a quiet room in the Swan, Honecker's inn, where I can write and read undisturbed, and of an evening see, sipping their wine and playing cards for stakes of one and two cents, the same faces, now something older, it is true, that congregated at the same tables for the same purposes eleven years ago. Some have disappeared, new ones are added to list of regular guests; but enough of the same well known faces are there, to make me doubt as I draw up a chair to the table, whether since 1849 more than two or three weeks have elapsed.

Round the corner in Achter Strasse I find changes. Where I formerly lodged, father, mother and one brother have gone to the grave, the others are scattered, and strange faces only are to be seen.

But the town itself—how it has grown, and how it is still growing. Within the old walls the changes are principally in the rearing of new houses upon the narrow sites of the old: but beyond, splendid private dwellings, some of palatial extent with noble gardens and pleasure grounds, are giving a new aspect to the town, as one looks down from the Kreuz or the Venus berg.

In fact, if change and improvement go on at the rate in which I have observed them during two years past, from the North Sea to the Danube, from Vienna to Cologne, the American traveller in a generation or two, will hardly find a nook or corner in which he can find himself transported back into the past. One of the greatest of jokes even now is to read in Congressional speeches and July orations of “effete and decaying Europe,” when single States of our own Union can show more of the effete and the decaying, than all Central Europe!

This little city, Bonn, heavily taxed as it is for State purposes, has spent some $50,000 in widening the narrow, dirty passage, which six years ago separated the wall from the river, into a broad, handsome promenade and landing place, with walks and shade trees. “Effete decaying Europe” has always an eye and the money for the beautiful. Besides the two fine public promenades, back of the town, planted with quadruple rows of magnificent chestnuts, beeches and lindens, hundreds of acres of wooded land upon the heights a mile away, where one can get solitude, shade and exquisite views of river and mountain, are secured to the public for its enjoyment and benefit forever. I venture to say that the thirty-five to forty thousand people of Bonn and its neighboring villages, have a larger provision of promenades and parks than the three hundred thousand of Boston and vicinity.

“Well, suppose they have,” say you. “What then?”

Oh, nothing—nothing at all, only this:—if every little city can afford to give its poor such extensive pleasure grounds, and spend such sums to make them attractive, I pray you, the next time you make a political harangue, to be a little careful how you talk about Europe, lest you be heartily laughed at by some German or Frenchman, who happens to know that about the only provisions for the enjoyment of the poor, made by several generations of Americans, were cheap preaching and cheap rum. Moreover, don't boast too much of Boston and Cambridge commons.

Mem. To hint to the first old bachelor millionaire who asks me what he shall do with his money, that he leave it to trustees for two purposes, viz., the purchase of Corey's hill and neighboring grounds for a public park, and the establishment of an annual series of grand concerts, alternating with the Lowell lectures.

As I have nothing else musical to write about let us ride this hobby horse a little.

Fancy the fund established and in the hands of the trustees for the “Lowell Concerts.” How is its income to be appropriated?

Why not establish a Conservatory or musical college?

Simply, because our first object is to effect a general culture and improvement of the public taste. This will in the end secure a musical college, as the general diffusion of knowledge has brought with it better schools, public libraries and stated meetings of all kinds for the advancement of science. No, the fund is given, and is to be employed only, for concerts.

The directors, of whom a part are musicians by profession, and who are partly changed every year, are left free to decide what these concerts shall be, save that they must provide for an annual series of vocal and instrumental performances of music of various epochs and schools so arranged as to deserve the name of "historical concerts." These performances are to be illustrated by a lecture, or by carefully prepared programmes. They are also to provide for one, two or three annual productions of new works, by native composers, beyond this the appropriation of the fund is left to their wisdom and taste. If they see fit to purchase and distribute—in some manner that shall exclude favoritism—five hundred tickets to the performance of an oratorio or of an opera in the English language so much the better, or if they devote a handsome sum toward the maintenance of a really full band to play upon the Common evenings, none the worse.

Different boards of directors will naturally have different views, and thus, one year with another, variety will be secured; while the old church, dramatic, and instrumental music of the historic concerts will form a basis for a wide and general musical culture.

I see in fancy one board of directors, whose efforts are directed mainly to grand productions of church music and oratorio; another whose labors and influence form an epoch in the history of English opera—or opera in English—as you will; a third which places orchestral performances upon a new, and very grand footing; a fourth which has developed new musical resources in the schools; and so on.

I look forward a few years and see the Music Hall crowded to its utmost capacity, for several days in May, and when I enquire what is the reason of the concourse, am told, to-day the four prize symphonies are to be given, to-morrow the prize cantatas are to be sung, and the day after come the miscellaneous compositions of our young composers.

And in what does the prize consist?

In a stipendium after the European manner which enables the successful candidates to spend two or three years in study, at home or abroad as he will.

And who are all these performers?

The orchestra is the splendid company which has gradually grown up since the foundation of the Lowell concerts. The singers are in part our fine English opera company, in part members of our old Handel and Haydn Society, in part from the schools, and in part, and a very valuable part, the choir of our musical college.

"Herr T. Herr T."

"Well, what?"

"Mittagessen." [Dinner is ready.]

T.—Bless me! and so I am in Bonn, in 1860—and not in Boston, sixty years hence! 'Twas a pleasant ride on the hobby, though!

Confessions of a Musical Soul.

In an earlier stage of our community, when it existed as such in its fullest sense, all the forms of life, worship and labor being made a common impulse, and tending to a certain end, little room was allowed for romantic attachments or the growth of the poesy of love, that forms a constituent of all female autobiography. Strange as it may seem to the world at large, where the mere embellishments of life, and the vanities of romance form such an engrossing element of all pursuit and action, where the history of marriage is always a drama fraught with incident, excitement and tragedy—in our diminutive world partners for life are chosen not by, but for each other.

Equally strange will it appear, when told, that in these apparently blindfold engagements in which the happiness of all the coming future was at stake, there was but seldom a shipwreck of the heart or a blight of all those early hopes which, from childhood to maturity, form the perpetual dream of our existence. Excess of intellect, which some suppose to be an anomaly, of passion, of feeling, are the usual drawbacks of wedded life; and these elements of discord find more indulgence in luxurious ease than in a rugged and homely simplicity.

What the interior of wedded life proved to be in all its details, no Moravian auto-biography has ever disclosed. Nor have the diaries left behind ever shown that man and woman were bound in unwilling fetters. Like the overture which is a characteristic of the whole piece, the precedents of marriage were characteristic of the whole life's performance. Commencing, not in enthusiasm, which derives its chief nurture from the fiction of worldly happiness, but in what at once gave eclat to the men and women of the day I refer to, a total negation of egotism; the true Moravian marriage was not grounded on a love of self.

The divine being, under the impersonation of brother and bridegroom, was the absorbing thought of life, and to convey his personality among those who had never heard the name of Christ uttered was the leading idea, under which the whole Zinzendorffian creed, worship and activity had sprung up.

But to make trial of the destiny that might await me, and which this apparently singular institution of submitting to authority in the choice of husband and wife rendered still more problematical, never fell to my lot. My musical resources never forsook me; I had commenced my education in song, by the simple cultivation of the Moravian hymn and the tone-poetry of the classical composers of the last and present century; and when, more recently, new styles of musical thought were awakened among composers whose name is legion, I attempted, with how much skill I will not pretend to say, to warm myself into their beauties and intricacies. For those who write and labor for the future, and not for the present, and instead of taking man as he is, think for him when he shall have cast aside his present material predilections and become a more spiritualized thing of earth, I could never find any sympathy.

As in all modern intellectual poetry contrived in the most ingenious forms and glossed over with the superficial polish of art, its truest beauty is derived from these occasional passages of heart-poetry that are wont here and there to find an outlet; so in the most vague, dreamy and philosophical music of our day heart-melody is never entirely suppressed, although often dimly perceived amid the mists of instrumentation.

Is the present then a mere variation of the past? and is the theme which beat within the bosoms of the old composers always throbbing within that of every living tone-thinker? Homer wrote for all ages and so did Mozart. Those simple themes of the word and tone-poet never seem dull to the ear, even when the love of so-called scientific music has run its course.

Although addicted to reading in almost any department of literature, my parent, perceiving my strong musical bent, endeavored to foster it by leading me away from intense study; as he believed that nothing was more fatal to the growth and development of tone-poetry within us than strong intellectual exercise. He held that the finest musical organization was easily disturbed, its ethereal imaginings dispelled, by allowing the mind to be perplexed by the stern logical facts of life, or the thinking faculty to come into conflict with our musical instincts.

Zinzendorff's lyrics themselves, though a model for all sacred poets, and replete with the finest Christian imagery, are studied rather as an act of elevation rather than for their intrinsic literary merits, and I had recourse to the German and English poets, whenever I felt inclined to indulge in that species of fiction wherein words and rhythm supply the place of tone. The poetical gift was a characteristic of many of the Moravian women of a primitive day. In addition to an almost universal proclivity for music, they adopted the style of Zinzendorff and communed with the object of their adoration in verses of their own composition. Many of these are extant, and are forcible evidences of their living faith and their entire devotion to the theme of superhuman love sacrifice and atonement.

As this older school passed away, studies more literary and classical took the place of that entire consecration of thought to one engrossing subject; the mind became emancipated from its morbidly devotional condition, and more alive to what was transpiring in the actualities of life and the general progress of human thought. Fiction, therefore, in prose and poetry, was moderately indulged in by our people. Our very history was a romance embracing the material that makes up many an exciting tale; that furnishes biography with its most interesting traits of truthful sacrifice, disinterested heroism, philanthropic love, geniality of temper. Our stage of action was the whole surface of the globe. In the offices of humanity, our transactions with man extended to every condition of civilization.

But from the paucity of those among us who were engaged in literary pursuits, nearly every one being employed either in the work of the Gospel or the instruction of the schools, few fictions were ever attempted based on this romance of Moravianism. Zinzendorff was sometimes made the subject of an idealism; his life, trials and adventures have been embodied in a little tale, written with all the artlessness of the old tone of Moravian thought; but of all those ardent, devoted and marvellous spirits whose lives were spent under the same impulses of good will to men, no literary portrait worthy of the character and subject it might have personified, has ever been handed down. As a literary topic for the world at large, it had too little worldliness in it to make it attractive, but to the heart grown up within the abodes of that beautiful religious system of poesy, music and sacred symbolism the subject has ready access and admission. In all efforts of fiction, having for their object the portrayal of an inner Moravian life, the vicissitudes of the people, their reverses and misfortunes throughout centuries of time, a religious tone must necessarily reign throughout, which to the mere reader of profane poesy but rarely possesses that charm he is naturally in quest of.

In the great work of philanthropy which gave character to our history, the cause of education was a marked feature. In most of our European and American villages schools were established, which, for a whole century, have been the cradle of many a fine mental structure among both sexes, and the retrospect of such individuals as they return in memory to the old precincts of an early parental love that hovered over them as they gathered the fruits of elementary training, is filled with pensive and grateful joy.

Among others selected for the grave office of instruction, I was chosen to watch the growth and budding of the youth placed under my charge, and in this responsible vocation I had an ample opportunity, in common with my cotemporaries, to test myself and gather those convictions in regard to my idiosyncrasy which the grand experiment of practical life forces upon us.

In this sphere of activity, the sounds of music were scarcely ever lulled; the piano, the guitar, the harp and voice were in constant requisition, and we lived amid the associations of tone; of a never-ceasing sighing of notes; amid a sea of song whose waves never subsided. In our schools in this country strenuous efforts are ever made to conduct the youthful pupil amid these idyllic scenes of pleasing rhythm and the simple melodious flow which characterized the earlier German tone-poets. In many instances where a departure from popular feeling gave rise to finer culture and preserved a choice musical nature from falling, the influence of the only true music we possess prevailed, and many genial spirits left these schools filled with the elementary principles of all that is good and really beautiful in the deep, the sublime, the limitless world of tone.

Many, on the other hand, were led astray by the monotonous fascinations of the Italian school and by the thousand forms of ballet music, under-rate its modern ornamentation of the polka, galop, and those oscillatory movements of tone composition, which demand no inventive powers, no Beethoven faculty, but are a simple product of the most elementary condition of musical feeling.

With the aid of a knowledge of thorough-bass, I was enabled to devote many hours to original composition, and in giving such vent to my musical inclinations, I was ever discovering some new form or image of unseen beauty, called into being by those chords of harmony that occasionally suffer an alliance with discord, in order to show forth more strongly and vividly their own tone colors. Yet in familiarizing one's self with the works of a classic school of music, many groupings and successions of sounds rise up before us, which would seem to belong to our own imagination and leave no claims for purely original thought. Paradoxical as this may seem, we shall find by analysis, that with means differing so little in themselves, such widely different results should be produced. I was often led to compare my essays at composition with the amusement of the Chinese puzzle, where an endless riddle is at work to disclose new designs of a mathematical beauty, which pleases because it solves a problem of art. Such a puzzle, in its application to music, I found to be exhaustless, and in all my attempts at new forms, I discovered every new arrangement led to another as yet undiscovered by minds who had gone before me, and whenever a leisure hour would allow me to indulge in these congenial recreations, I proceeded to place before my mind some new figure of tone. In speaking thus of my own efforts at composition, I will probably be looked upon as an exception to the rule, which, from some obscure psychological law, renders it rare and unusual for woman to originate musical thought. Successful as she is in interpreting the conceptions of others, both through the instrument and voice, she rarely assumes the province of composer or imposes upon her emotions the task of invention. This problem is still more difficult to solve, when we bear in mind how conspicuous a stand she takes in pictorial art; not only by copying the designs of others, but by expressing her own views of nature with those impassioned means which the pencil places within her power. Of this riddle I never discovered a satisfactory solution; an inference drawn from it was, that the faculty of design in painting was essentially different from that of musical invention, and that although an equal exuberance of feeling takes place in either situation, the composer's genius must embrace elements of mental vigor which are peculiar to man.

To the pleasure I enjoyed in raising up before me these musical structures, I never added the labor of committing anything to writing. Many new discoveries were, therefore, lost and rendered irrecoverable, except when the memory treasured up little morceaux, that clung to it as the image of the wild flower had done before I had formed my attachment to art.

But I was never willing to admit, as many will have, that the simple heart-themes of the old masters had become obsolete. To me those artless forms of tone thought possessed the most intense and enduring beauty, and they always came up before me as the day dream of childhood is re-awakened and dreamt over again, when age invests it with new charms, and revives a lost picture for our study and perusal.

In the old and stereotyped themes of the Germans, in common with the Italian school, we find a large admixture of the plaintive element, traceable not only in the song, but in a marked degree in the language of the Teutonic and Italian races; and all airs wherein plaintive thought arises excite a ready sympathy, as often as the soul allows its chords to lose their tension, and those vibrations between hope and fear, in which we may sometimes be said to live, display themselves. By many of my pupils this plaintive subject was preferred, and was looked upon as an exclusive beauty in music; but wherever such a preference was too strongly shown, I strove to modify it and give a tincture of healthy feeling to that youthful taste which is easily led astray.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

L'Enlèvement du Sérail

"L'Enlèvement du Sérail" (and not du Sérail, as given in the bills of the Théâtre Lyrique, which is an absurdity) holds in the works and career of Mozart a place of far different importance from that of Abou Hassan in Weber's. Mozart wrote this delicious chef d'œuvre at Vienna, in 1782, and it has been played ever since in all the German theatres. Mozart was then twenty-six, and not seventeen, as the critics have said who we should have supposed would have been better informed of facts so universally known. Independently of two or three operas composed in his early youth in Italy, Mozart wrote Idoménée in 1780 at Munich, a chef d'œuvre from which the Conservatoire has given so many admirable selections. "L'Enlèvement du Sérail" and the "Flûte Enchantée," written in the year 1791, are the only operas composed by Mozart in the German language. The libretto of "L'Enlèvement" taken from an old play of the German theatre, was written almost under the dictation of one Stephani. Mozart wrote to his father on the 1st of August, 1781: "Young Stephani brought me yesterday a libretto to set to music. It is pretty, and the subject is entirely Turkish. I shall compose the overture, the chorus of the first act, as well as the first chorus, with Turkish music. I am so pleased with my subject that the first air to be sung by Cavalieri, that intended for the tenor Adamberger, and the trio that concludes the first act are already finished. After a year of struggle against a formidable cabal, fully conscious of the greatness of the genius which it would prevent from being made known, the first representation of "L'Enlèvement du Sérail" took place on the 13th of July, 1782, with immense success. In a letter from Mozart to his father on the 7th of August, he writes that Gluck was so pleased with the music of his opera that he invited him to supper after the representation, at which the composer of "Armide" and "Orphée" had assisted. It is pleasant to see this high and noble impartiality in the lives of illustrious men. We all know Haydn's reply to the father of Mozart, when asked what he thought of his son: "On my honor and before God, I declare that your son is the first of living composers," said the great master who created the symphony and so many chefs d'œuvre.

Mozart had under his direction, when he wrote "L'Enlèvement du Sérail," a very remarkable body of singers. He wrote the part of Constance for Cavalieri, a brilliant singer, who possessed a soprano voice of great compass and flexibility. Fischer, a deep base and an excellent actor, created the part of Osmín, and the tenor Adamberger, who sung with a great deal of taste, that of Belmonte; to Mademoiselle Teyber was assigned the secondary part of Biondina, and to Dauer that of Pedrillo. Mozart, who was young, without position, having to struggle against powerful adversaries, was obliged to make numerous concessions to those fashionable virtuosi who enjoyed public favor, and who consented to sing the music of a German, well known and esteemed, especially as a composer of instrumental music. This explains the numerous bravura passages filling the airs sung by Constance, and the loud notes appearing so often in the part of Osmín, running to the ré d'en bas. In these passages and others that we might cite, Mozart paid his tribute to fortune and to the public taste which it was of importance to please.

Even a creative genius must consult the taste of his age. There are certain vocal formulas that have grown out of date in "L'Enlèvement du Sérail," as also in "Le Flûte Enchantée," and even in "Don Juan." They are accessory parts, little details that do not affect the eternal youth of the work. Need we cite the many passages from "L'Enlèvement du Sérail" that have been popular for nearly eighty years, and which still preserve their early freshness; the first air of Belmonte, the well known couplet of Osmín, the duo which follows with Belmonte, the chorus on a Turkish march, so lively and so original and the trio that concludes the first act; in the second act the duo for bass and soprano between Osmín and Biondina, so freshly comic, the air of Biondina, the piquante duo between Osmín and Pedrillo, the admirable air that Belmonte sings, and the quartet that serves as a finale? In the third act, we remark also the pretty romance of Pedrillo, the air of Osmín so full of comic fury, and the finale which is at once in place and perfectly musical.

"L'Enlèvement du Serail," which would never have been performed without the patronage of Joseph II., who had just established a national theatre at Vienna, was a great event for Germany. This delicious chef d'œuvre of Mozart was received with enthusiasm. Since the little popular operas of Hiller, Dittersdorf, and other composers of the second and third order, the public heard for the first time, beautiful and original music written by a German on a national theme. On the subject of "L'Enlèvement du Serail," the emperor Joseph II. might have used those often quoted words: "Very well, my dear Mozart, but too many notes." "Not one more than is needed, Sire," would have answered the great musician, who had not the spirit that certain Parisian journals would give him, but who had the consciousness of genius, and the dignity of an honest man. Weber, who certainly understood music, passed upon "L'Enlèvement du Serail" a judgment worthy of the author of "Der Freyschütz," which obtained the approbation of Gluck. "I have a strong preference," said Weber, "for this charming production which overflows with the gaiety, ardor, sweetness and feeling of Mozart's beautiful youth. I seem to feel in this liquid and serene music that irrepressible charm, that grace, perfume of happiness that a first love gives. Yes, I think that Mozart has reached the perfection of art in this work, and that it would have been easier for him to write a second 'Don Juan' than to find again the serene inspiration that characterizes 'L'Enlèvement du Serail.'" In this way do the masters of art speak of their predecessors. To those writers without taste or style who take revenge upon the memory of great men, for the mistakes of a ridiculous and unsatisfied ambition, we may apply those fine words of Bacon, "No one denies the existence of a God, but he whose purpose it serves that there should be no God." P. SCUDO.

Music as taught in our Schools.

By PROF. H. KAPPE, SKELBYVILLE.

We are obliged to the author for a copy of an essay read before the Educational Society of the Southern States, at Macon, Georgia. After a general introduction of the subject, he proceeds as follows:

Let us consider for a few moments, by what means a general knowledge of music both vocal and instrumental, may be attained. Education in the first may properly be commenced with the earliest attempt to develop a child's mind—indeed, it should go hand in hand with every essential branch of learning, and, to learn to sing well should be regarded as not less important than the ability to read well. And here, let it be remarked, that proficiency, both in the one and in the other is the work of slow, and almost imperceptible degrees. All that belongs to a child's education should be allowed to grow with its growth and strengthen with its strength. There is no royal road in Music; time and training are necessary here, as in all other acquirements. It is absurd to suppose, that the voice can be cultivated, the ear trained, the eye accustomed to musical notation, and all this effected "in a few easy lessons." Other things being equal, a child may be expected to learn to sing, in about the same time as will be required to make him a good reader. With instrumental Music, a longer period of training will be requisite according to the degree of perfection to be attained; and here, as in the former case, too great results must not be expected, in too short space of time. The piano is the instrument usually selected as the one best suited to the purposes of a general musical education. This, with the cultivation of the voice, is the task generally assigned to teachers of music in our schools. And here, allow me to remark upon the manner in which teachers are sometimes required to perform their duties. A musical education, so called, is regarded as indispensable to the list of accomplishments, with which every young lady, who graduates from our seminaries, must be furnished. She certainly must be able to play some popular waltzes and polkas, to sing a few sentimental airs, otherwise she will not be considered fashionable and possessed of the necessary passport to good society. The instructor then, who can compass this object, in the shortest possible space of time, is caressed by the public and called a capital fellow! No matter if said young lady understands no more of musical literature and science, than the veriest child; she can, nevertheless, make a noise and silence all criticism by the clamor performance. Possibly, one or two good pieces may have been learned imperfectly by dint of continual repetition; but how painful to the educated listener, is the absence of expression, and entire lack of appreciation, which the whole performance displays. Too frequently, those teachers are preferred, whose only object seems to be that of pleasing pupils and patrons by catering to a depraved or uneducated taste, while they who are well qualified for their office, are often constrained to make compromise with their better judgment in gratifying that love of vain display, which interferes so materially with true progress in this divine art. This they must do, or themselves become a sacrifice to their love of truth. Look, for instance, at some of the advertisements, in our musical papers, of schools in quest of teachers. Mark you the qualifications there specified as being required, and if there be one found willing to stand up and say, "I am the man," he must be bold indeed, and possess a vanity and temerity capable of outbraving shafts of keenest ridicule. Observe the following, as extracted from the "Musical World" of January 17th, 1856, as illustrative of my meaning.

"Dear Sir: I want a well educated lady or gentleman for this Institute. If a gentleman, a fair linguist, say Latin, Greek, and French, and if Spanish and German could be added, all the better; a thorough English scholar as well, with fair mathematical attainments, and a fine correct perspective draughtsman, and a skilful painter; also a thorough musician in the theory and practice, vocal and instrumental, including violin, harp, piano, organ, guitar, and accordion. He must be a gentleman and an honest man; habits and morals unexceptionable, an example for a Protestant clergyman; good sound bodily health; great industry; an early riser, with a good, accommodating disposition; a Sabbath observer, with a disposition to lay hand on an organ and make the audience feel (what he himself feels) the awful majesty and incomprehensible mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Salary to begin with $1,000 and board in the Institute for the school term of ten months. Vacation from July 31st. to October 1st. When this person once suits and is suited, we shall not part on the ground of salary. The gentleman must also understand how to keep pianos in tune and repair. Now, if you could ship me such a gentleman by the first ocean steamer, it would greatly oblige your friend and well wisher,

"SAMUEL THORNTON,

"Principal of the S. Tennessee Collegiate Institute."

We know not whether the writer of the above was successful in finding the object of his search, but if so, we would respectfully suggest that the fortunate of so many varied accomplishments might do well to exhibit himself as a prodigy of acquirements, and if the salary should be enlarged to the extent of his merits, it must be sufficient to satisfy the most extensive desire.

The true teacher should be a man of modest merit, well acquainted with the wants of the age and of the community where he is called upon to exercise his talents. He should be strictly independent in his methods of imparting instruction, regarding only the true interests of his pupils, by aiming to develop and cultivate a refined taste, together with a correct and finished style of performance. Of the means necessary to accomplish this purpose, the instructor is, of course, best qualified to judge. He must not be influenced by the whims of pupils, regarding the pieces to be learned. The great abundance of trashy sheet-music, dedicated invariably to Mammon, or the goddess of Fashion, often gives the conscientious music-teacher a world of trouble. He is constantly beset with solicitations from bright eyes and rosy lips—"Please let me learn Bonaparte's Retreat," or somebody else's march—until, what with quicksteps, marches, and retreats, he is himself often disposed to beat a retreat and war no longer against existing prejudices.

"Tis true, 'tis true, and pity 'tis, 'tis true," that a large amount of money is annually expended in the so-called musical education of young ladies, and yet, without the results which ought to be expected. I know not that parents should be held responsible for a want of correct musical taste; but, they may at least refrain from the practice of fault-finding, so common among many who have never heard better music than "Yankee Doodle" or "Fisher's Hornpipe."

Not long ago, a worthy resident of this State, anxious that his daughter should be considered somewhat preëminent in the possession of an accomplished education, sent her to Philadelphia for the purpose of receiving further instruction from a distinguished Professor of Music. She labored diligently during her stay, and really accomplished more than could have been expected. Delighted with her acquisitions, she returned home, and, in obedience to a request of her father, made haste to exhibit her skill, by playing for him one of Mozart's sonatas in a style really artistic. The old gentleman listened perfectly silent, until the conclusion of the piece, when, instead of the coveted commendation she had so confidently expected, he gravely remarked, "Well, Sally, do you intend to inflict such torture as that on all who ask you to play? Be assured, I shall ask you no more."

So, in our own experience, after having labored faithfully for several sessions, and merited, as we thought, the gratitude of both parents and pupils for our efforts, we have been mortified exceedingly by remarks like the following: "True, my daughter can play a great many fine pieces, but she does not yet know 'Bonaparte's crossing the Rhine,'" and in consequence thereof said daughter was immediately withdrawn from further instruction.

The cultivation of public taste, we are aware, must necessarily be a slow process, and great patience will be required in its accomplishment. Those, however, who have gained access within the sacred temple of Art, and can gaze with eye unveiled upon its glories, must not stand forever upon its portals, and close the door to such as would enter; rather let them, with guiding hand, assist all to comprehend its mysteries, leading in such as would search for hidden treasures, until they are qualified to share in the higher enjoyments of a cultivated nature. But, it is not with those who are advanced in life, that we can expect to accomplish much in the way of reform and education; it is with the young, and here, we believe, a very general mistake is made by nearly all classes of society. The work of musical instruction is allowed to commence quite too late in life. A child of six or seven years may profitably learn to sing, and, at the same time become accustomed to the keys of the piano in the use of finger-exercises, &c. This process continued with daily assiduity, yet so as not to fatigue the child, will invariably prove a source of profit, and lay the foundation for future excellence. Musical instruction should, in the majority of instances, be continued much longer than is customary in this country. The reason why the harp, piano, and guitar are laid aside so soon after connection with the school ceases, is not that the possessors thereof cannot find time for the exercise of their talents, but, rather because their education was imperfect; they were not self-reliant and capable of becoming their own teachers.

The instructor in Music, then, must, as I have before intimated, be one who understands his business; not a man of enlarged pretension, laying claim to a variety of accomplishments, such as no ordinary mortal could be expected to possess; but one, who with a competent knowledge of his art, is independent and persevering in his efforts to lead his youthful disciples where they can appreciate and feel the power of true music.

The successful teacher must be a man of refined sensibility, of cultivated taste, noble and conscientious, with a high veneration for sacred things. These qualifications we hold to be indispensable, and having secured the services of such a one, interfere not too frequently with his plans. Allow him the free exercise of his judgment in the selection of appropriate studies, and, above all, let him have your sympathy and approbation; discourage him not by cold looks and still colder words. If he is faithful and energetic, he is necessarily an enthusiast; and, let me tell you, if he would conscientiously perform his duty, his is a thankless task. Far easier would it be, for him oftentimes to relieve his patrons of their money, in exchange for trifles of instruction, which merely tickle the ear and the fancy for a short period, and they, perhaps, would feel far better satisfied. But no, he will neither so degrade his favorite profession, nor falsify his better feelings; he will aim at the accomplishment of a praiseworthy object, and leave it for time to decide on the merit of his doings.

The standard of musical taste among the people must be elevated by making them acquainted with good compositions. Such music should frequently be rehearsed in their hearing; explanations, relative to its design and meaning, should be given by those qualified for the task; and, there is no doubt, even the uneducated would soon come to realize a degree of pleasure in listening, to which they were once entire strangers.

The music of our schools should invariably comprise an attention to Church Music, properly so-called; and we refer not, now, to the tunes so generally sung in our churches by choirs trained for the purpose, but to that higher, more dignified and sacred style, which is alone appropriate to the worship of God; where the whole congregation unite their voices, as with one soul in the music, and on the wings of melody, rise to the throne of the Most High. The young should be taught to participate in this part of divine service, and where can a training for this purpose be more easily effected than during the period of school education? They should learn to understand the distinction between secular and church music. They should be taught that because certain airs are agreeable, they are not necessarily appropriate for the expression of religious feeling. Not simply because they like them, should certain airs be sung in church; rather should they be instructed to like what is appropriate in church music. Good congregational singing will no longer be regarded impossible, when the young of both sexes are taught to sing in our schools, well selected melodies, such as are adapted to the expression of genuine religious feeling. Then, as they grow older, their tastes having been properly formed they will possess a true idea of church music as it should be; and, we shall not find the hallowed strains of "Old Hundred," and "Gloria in Excelsis," giving way to some profane love-song or negro melody, whose only claim to merit is, "that they please," "they go well." Alas! alas! that both old and young should look for mere musical excitement and diversion in church music, instead of aiming at religious benefit.

To correct this, as well as other evils to which I have alluded, the axe must be laid at the root of the tree. Youth of both sexes must be adequately instructed in the principles and practice of the various styles of music appropriate to different purposes, and Normal Schools, for the education of teachers in this particular branch of study, must be established all over our land; then, and not till then, may we expect to see the work of reformation fully commenced. Then will the true glory of our country begin to dawn, and a brighter day arise, wherein all will have occasion to rejoice.

The various ends for which a knowledge of music ought to be cultivated, are so important and so numerous, that it seems to me no means can be disproportionate. It is worthy the efforts of all to inquire. What are the best means for a general diffusion of musical knowledge? and having so learned them, let those who occupy positions of influence lend their aid willingly towards the bestowal of this blessing on society. Then may we hope to see those grosser pleasures, in which many of the present day freely indulge, giving place to the refined charms of music. Men are social beings, they will congregate for various purposes, let them then be encouraged to exercise the musical talents acquired during the process of education. Listen, now, to those happy glees, as they rise up to Heaven's pure sky, and roll on and on, until lost in ether! or to the well-tuned orchestra, discoursing its delightful harmonies to listening thousands under the broad free canopy of Heaven, and tell me if it does not afford an innocent pastime which may well take the place of a lower order of entertainment! How cheering the influence, too, which such a scene exerts over the mind of the listener. He goes forth to his work, on the following day, with steady hand and placid brow, while ever and anon, the irresistible echoes of past sounds break forth over desk or counter into jovial or plaintive humming, as if the memory were rejoicing too much in her sweet possessions to be able to conceal them. Happy recollections these for wife or sister, to whose voice or piano he is frequently indebted for pleasures, it is a pleasure to give, and who lead him with those exquisite strains as with a silken string.

There is, we believe, but one class of men who condemn the practice of music, and they are fanatics: and there is only one order of beings, who, according to Dr. Luther, hate it, and they are DEVILS.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 13, 1860.

Editorial Correspondence. VI.

Geneva, Sept. 1, 1860.

I set out, in my last, with trying to recall some musical as well as other impressions of these weeks in Switzerland. But music was of course the smallest, merest incidental part of it. Of music proper the account is summed up in a couple of organ-concerts, which but half seemed to make one feel at home again, in cities in the lowland after daily intercourse with snowy peaks and glaciers and wild mountain passes, rushing streams and sprayey cascades, the picturesque, the sweet, the human everywhere nestling at the feet and on the very knees of the terrific and the grand. The first of these was at Berne, and wholly unexpected. After going upon the Schanze, to look off over the old city, and to seek in vain through clouds for that famed horizon panorama of the mountains, I had left behind me; after wandering through the curious streets, and under those gloomy, heavy, catacomb-like arcades which enclose the side-walks, and seeing the omnipresent emblem of the city of bears; the statues and the curious fountains, especially that one surmounted by the "Kinderfresser," grotesque Punchinello of a Saturn cramming a child down his mouth, with other children under his arm and in his basket ready to devour, while round the base of the statue march a troop of bears in armor; and the old clock tower, where the bears come out and walk round in procession, when the curious mannikin above brings down his hammer on the bell; I came at nightfall to the old Cathedral and approaching the portal, whence rich organ sounds were issuing, was asked by the sexton if I had a ticket. Here every one that thirsteth could not come "without money and without price," it seemed. Berne was copying Freyburg, making a good thing out of the summer travel, by giving organ concerts every evening at a franc a head. We gladly paid and groped our way along the aisle, amid the shades of twilight, to the furthest end of the church, where we saw, or felt, some scores of curious listeners about us. The organ is a fine one, not so large as that of the sister city, but very powerful; rich, sonorous, brilliant in its full combinations, and with a singularly interesting quality of reed tones. The organist, if not Mendel's Sohn, is Mendel. He was in the middle of his programme when we entered. What we heard was good—music of a solid, edifying sort, worthy of a good sound musician, although it did not prove his powers remarkable. A well known March of Handel's (from Judas Maccabæus, if I mistake not), was his theme, which returned several times with great emphasis amid clever variations and digressions. He played also one or two plain chorales, and tantalized with just a bit of fugue. To the wanderer, away from all society of friends or mountains now, the lingering vibration of such music chimed well with the walk upon the terrace round the church, with the full moon gleaming on the Aar that washed its walls a hundred feet below, and silvering the tiled house roofs of the streets down there, and the hanging gardens climbing to the Münster's feet, and showing the bronze statue of the old Count of Zähringen, the founder of the city, with a bear for squire and helmet bearer, in bold relief.

The tower of the Berne Cathedral is remarkably rich in great bells—a dozen I should think—each sacred to particular occasions, the largest weighing 27,000 lbs., and bearing curious figures and inscriptions. The tower-keeper was proud of his bells, and made me hear the story and the tone of every one. And very rich and musical they were. Upon a long beam near the biggest bell is notched a comparative scale of the diameters of all the famous bells in Europe; this one, if I remember, stands the next to the great bell in London.

Most travellers hurry past the strange old city of Freyburg, content with crossing its wonderful wire bridge, (which spans like a spider's web the chasm in which the city is built, half on a level with the river's banks, and half down on the beach two hundred and fifty feet below), with glancing at the old Gothic church, and listening a half hour to its organ. But it is well worth a day or two days stay. You dine at the very nice and comfortable hotel at the end of the bridge aforesaid, and on the edge of the high town, whose houses look so strangely, almost crowding one another over the sheer precipice—a very nice hotel indeed, and quite practically situated, where you can sit on a terrace amid masses of choice and beautiful plants, and great cages of many colored birds withal, and look off over the town and down the deeply excavated channel of the river—the "Zähringer Hof" the hotel is called—a famous name that in this region—the old bear-slaying Count was founder both of Berne, named from the bear, and Freyburg—and here you notice in the dining hall a portrait of a dark, stout, full-blooded, little man, improvising as it were most energetically at an organ, with the black eyes rolled upward courting inspiration. This is Herr Vogt, who plays the famous Freyburg organ in the St. Nicholas Church. Lithographs of the portrait are for sale there also. A little too much of the lion about this. However you are happy to pay your franc for the card which mine host offers you, and walk a few rods to the church, a fine old Gothic specimen, though not one of the greatest. Over the deep arched portal is a wealth of sculptured relief, representing, as in so many of the old Gothic churches, heaven and hell and the last judgement; but here the picture is wrought with a grotesque inventiveness somewhat peculiar. You see an angel weighing people in scales, a devil clinging to one scale and trying to drag it down: another angel lifting a poor wicked mortal by the shoulders, about to swing him into the scale: a devil with a swine's hand dragging a batch of sinners by a chain, and with another batch in a basket on his back, to a huge cauldron under which a smaller devil blows the fire with bellows; hell in the corner typified by the jaws of a devouring monster; the good inducted into paradise on the right, &c., &c. The interior is not very striking. The great object of interest is the organ, which is placed above the entrance, and does not look so very large, although it contains 67 registers with 7800 pipes, some of them of course of thirty-two feet. Albert Mooser, who died in 1839, was the builder. Haase built the one in Berne.

The studied feature of the programme, much of which was improvisation of the fantasia kind, was the representation of a festival and concert interrupted by a storm, with alternation and mingling of fancy stops, Alpine echoes, bells, rolling thunder, lightning, and all that—a standing dish, we judged, for it was repeated in the evening. It certainly was very skillfully arranged to show the instrument, and contained many beautiful and grand effects. There was a Vox Humana stop, which really sounded like a voice, a choir of fervent tenor voices, singing a religious strain in the far recesses of a great cathedral, and we knew not which most to admire, the beauty of the violin family of stops, the fine quality of the reeds, or the wonderfully liquid, bright and sweet tones of the various flutes. We never heard an organ voiced to so fine and various expressiveness. And the great stops, the trombones, the trumpets, the great basses, and the general mass of harmony, were wonderfully satisfying and imposing. The various allusions to Alpine sounds seemed to us, who had just come from the regions which they haunt, strikingly true and natural. One of the most striking was the regular stroke of a sharp, high toned bell, just as we heard it all day in a little village on the St. Gothard road, during the great rain that threatened to flood all the valley of the Reuss, suggesting not quite pleasant thoughts of the possibility of another Golgau catastrophe.

At sunset, after a long ramble through the strange up and down streets of the town, and over the green heights overlooking it, wondering at old towers and walls, peeping into curious little Catholic chapels, fascinated by quaint old houses, and finding the interminable stone stairs that lead from high streets into low ones more fatiguing than the mountain passes, I came round to the church again. They have two organ concerts daily during the height of the travelling season. This time the programme was more classical; for, besides the "Storm Fantasia," it consisted in great part of Mozart. The organist had promised me a good fugue by Bach; but, not seeing me enter (how could he in the dark!) he did not feel emboldened to bring out such old wine before a modern crowd of travellers. But who will grumble when he can have Mozart! And this time we had the noble march from Idomeneo (repeated in the Zauberflöte), worked up into many very curious and interesting variations, well suited to the organ, and exhibiting the organist's as well as to composer's skill to great advantage. He told me afterwards, the variations were the work of a young man in Leipzig. He must have talent. Next we recognize the Fantasia followed by Sonata, which Mozart wrote for the piano. The characteristic expressions of the different movements were brought out by singularly felicitous contrasts and combinations of stops; and we must own we never felt the grandeur of the introduction and the other stronger parts, nor the heart-felt singing beauty of the slow movements, in that composition, so fully before. Even the "Storm" affair derived a certain interest from the impassioned warmth and vividness of color with which the organist worked up his picture; varying it somewhat from the afternoon's performance and yielding to his own mood with some felicity of inspiration. We were in no way disappointed in the famous organ. The performance also had great merits; yet it was not all one craves in presence of so grand an instrument. Our hope of hearing organ playing here in the old world of organs and cathedrals remains still unrealized. What has Germany in store for us? Alas, that Mendelssohn is dead!

There was much, however, to work on the imagination in the circumstances under which we heard this organ. Think of sitting there under the solemn Gothic arches of the vast church, with the dim outlines thereof and of indefinite columns, altars, monuments, stained windows, rather suggested than made visible by the slender rays of the lamp swung up there at the organist's desk, and of the lantern with which the old Küster (sexton) below conducts the listeners in and out! The marvellous flood of tones poured down upon you in such darkness, amid such surroundings, with all the changes and surprises of remote sounds entering, beautiful as strange, so life-like too, now sounds of nature, tone-spirits such as haunt the snow Alps or the cascades in the valleys, now wild echoes of the horn, now human voices,—all this gathered up into the great religious volume and full fugue and choral of so grand an Organ, in so grand a place, in so strange an hour, could not but touch the springs of mystery and poetry and feeling of the infinite within you. It was not like the clap-trap miracles of virtuosos whom we hear in brilliant concert-rooms.

I still hope to recall some snatches of a certain music which the sounds of nature among the Alps, left humming and ringing strangely in the mind's ear.

Our notice of the opera is necessarily brief. Like some of our unsuccessful pin-wheels touched off for admiring children on a damp Fourth-of-July evening, the machine sparkled, gyrated once or twice hesitatingly, and then fizzled out, leaving only an odor of brimstone in the darkness that followed. Truth to say, the season was determined by events beyond the manager's control and we presume he did wisely to stop.

The only performance since our last issue which we care to mention, was that of La Traviata, which was really admirable in many respects. Madame Cortesi made the most of the consumptive heroine, singing with more taste and finish than we have ever observed in her style, and acting with consummate skill.

Signor Musiani acquitted himself with his usual success, although it seems to us that in the more passionate scenes, his tones, meant to be simply pathetic, sounded rather too much like wailing. Signor Amadio the younger was warmly received, and barring the inevitable awkwardness of a debutant, made a decided impression. His voice, though not so ponderous as his brother's, is full, clear and resonant, and his method is good. He promises to be a fine artist.

The second performance of The Barber we did not see, nor could we attend the matinee on Saturday.

Signor Servadio promises to return in the Spring with a larger troupe and (we trust) under more favorable circumstances.

We take pleasure in calling attention to Mr. THOMAS RYAN's card in another column. He is so well known in this vicinity as a public performer and a teacher that any commendation of his merits in either respect is almost superfluous.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, we learn, is presently awaiting the subsiding of the tumultuous waves of the political campaign, which entirely absorbs the thoughts and time of the whole Nation just now, before making any stir about its doings next winter. But we are assured that it is neither dead nor sleeping.

THE BOSTON MUSICAL TIMES charges us with enjoying and appropriating the articles on "Wagner," admirably translated from Scudo, by Mr. C. J. SPRAGUE, (as may be guessed from the signature), and copied in this Journal. We plead guilty to the enjoyment and appropriation, but not to any felonious intent. In the best regulated families, accidents will happen, as is well known; how much more in an ill regulated one with no head, like ours, or at best, a head somewhat distracted by unaccustomed cares and often embarrassed by conflicting duties.

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, CONN., Oct. 8.—I have not written you of late, because nothing of an extremely musical nature has occurred to call for any particular correspondence from me. Lovers of negro minstrelsy have surely had no cause to complain of not having opportunities enough to gratify their tastes, in listening to stale jokes and thread-bare dittos, through the cheap medium of "burnt cork;" for the "Morris Brothers," the "New Orleans Serenaders," the Campbells, and I don't know how many more Ethiopian companies have of late chased one another in rapid succession in and out of the city, thereby illustrating again the Longfellowish idea—

"Never comes a 'Negro Minstrel,'"

But another's sure to follow,"—

And I see by the big bills that still another troupe is to follow this week. What were the "Dark Ages" compared with the present one?

Had it not been for the concerts of two of our own artists, this, I am afraid, uninteresting letter would never have been indited. I allude to the ballad entertainment by our favorite Soprano, MRS. PRESTON, and the Organ Concert of Mr. GEO. E. WHITING, organist at the North Congregational Church. MRS. PRESTON was assisted by a Mr. DRAPER, of New York, and Mr. OSCA MAYO, of this city, as pianist. The hall was quite well filled, and the performances, generally, very fine. The selections might have been better, and have given much more pleasure to the audience. MRS. PRESTON rarely fails to delight her friends in whatever she undertakes; Mr. MAYO is a good performer; but would have gained more admirers had he made a little different selection.

MR. WHITING gave his concert at the North Church, last Wednesday evening, upon one of Messrs. Hook's fine three-banked organs. He was assisted by Mr. and Mrs. STRICKLAND, Messrs. FOLEY, WANDER, and CADY, and the Chorus of the "Beethoven Society," under the direction of Mr. JAMES G. BARNETT, who acquitted themselves in their usually fine manner.

Mr. Whiting gave us the following classical selections:—

"Grand Sonata in F Minor," by Mendelssohn; "Organ Fuge in G Minor," by Bach; "Overture to Guillaume Tell," by Rossini; "Pastorale," by Kulenkamp; "Chorus," by Handel; and a most meritorious "Fantasia for the Organ," by himself. These were all performed in an astonishingly facile and masterly manner—and would have brought down sounds of applause, but for a very proper reverence for the sacredness of the place. He certainly possesses a most remarkable talent, which has been well cultivated by indefatigable study and practice—placing him already among the very few really classical organ performers in the country. He is quite a young man—not yet twenty years of age—and, considering his present immense execution, must in a few years make himself famous.

THE DRAYTONS—the charming inimitable Draytons—are again to delight us with their fine singing and acting this evening. They are here for only two nights; and, accordingly, the house will be densely packed. What is finer than Mr. Drayton's impersonation and singing of old "Simon the Cellarer?" It is insurj a sable.

Musical Miscellany.

Citizens of St. Louis did not contribute fifteen thousand dollars towards the establishment of a Philharmonic Society, as the types had it last week, but only five thousand.

DRESDEN (Germany) has at last, on the 26th of July, been blessed with the first performance of Verdi's "Trovatore." It was a success of course.

WHAT IS IT.—There is a mysterious Opera which figured largely in the manifestos of the Opera Company just departed. It was sometimes printed La Juiz, sometimes La Juif, and again Le Juise, and in plain English "The Jew." It was evident that it was not Halévy's "Jewess," and just as evident that nobody knew much about it. It was turns out to have been an Opera by Apolloni, one of the very latest of Italian composers, and its real and proper name is L'Elros.

CINCINNATI, Oct. 6.—The Cecilia Society began their fifth season yesterday by a well attended concert, given to members exclusively, as all their concerts are, with the following programme:

Gipsy's Life, for mixed Chorus and Soli.....	Schumann.
Funeral March, by Chopin.....	Piano Solo.
La Chasse, by Hiller.....
Ave Maria, Song.....	Schubert.
Psalm for Chorus of female voices.....	Lachner.
Scena and Prayer.....	"Freischütz."
Solo and Chorus from "Templer und Jüdin".....	Marschner.
The Forty-second Psalm, (As the hart pants), for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.....	Mendelssohn.

VIENNA.—A new Opera by Anton Rubinstein, with the title "The Children of the Prairie," meaning probably the gipseys of Bohemia, has been accepted by the management of the Court-theatre. It is said that the composer received one thousand Florins for the score. The opera will be brought out for the first time in November.

A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that Mlle Patti gets fifteen hundred dollars a month for her services in the Strakosch and Ullman Opera Troupe, in the former city Max Maretzek has the musical directorship at one hundred and fifty dollars a week; and when Tamberlik performs, which will be late in the season, it will be at a salary of twenty-five thousand dollars for twenty-five nights. Valuable voices these are.

A UNIQUE LETTER.—The following letter was recently found among the old documents belonging to Trinity Church, Boston. There is no date to it, and the exact period when the writer was organist, is not known. The prices named for church music are in marked contrast with those now paid by the same church. The total expense now being about $1800 per annum, of which sum the organist receives $500.

P. A. von Hagen, Organist of the Trinity Church, Boston

Respectfully informs the honorable Wardens of said Church that their Organ is much out of Repair and Tune. By a close Examination of it he found; That the greater part of the metal pipes are onsodered and stoped with a Stuff, which generally gathers on lead; the wooden ones onglued; the Trumpet-Supporters are partly dislodged, and the principal part of the Reeds are eat up by Verdegreaase. The wooden pipes, as well as the metal ones must be voiced. The Keys wants to be regulated. The Cloth under neath of the Keys is eat by the moths. Ten pipes are missing. The great part of the Leather of the Bellows is cracked and must be new. The Conductors leak; the tops and bottoms of the leaders and Rollers are worn so much, that they cause a Rattling while playing; they also make they Keys stick fast. The touch has sunk an eighth of an Inch. The Levell-box is warpt. In short, there is no Article in the whole Instrument, but what wants more or less Repair. It is however a Common Case with an Organ which is getting old. The Reparation of it will cost by a moderate Calculation, about one hundred Dollars. The Organ might be greatly improved by an Addition of Pedals for to play the low Bass with the Feet, as it has an excellent Effect in slow Psalm Tunes. The Cost of which would not exceed Thirty Dollars.

He respectfully solicits, that his Salary, which is now $150, may be raised to $200 per Annum.

The Motives of this Request are as follows:

1st. Having a Prospect of a larger Salary some where else.

2d. House Rent and Provisions being unusually high, and

3d. Wishing to have the Instrument always in Tune, which ought to be examined every Saturday, and paying for Bellows blowing, he, in his opinion, ought in some regard be compensated. He has worked and spendd his time several Days in Order to make the Organ playable, for which he has not made any charge.

He hopes, that the above Request will not meet any Objection, as he is attached to the Church and would prefer worshiping there, to any other Place. Nothing could induce him to leave the church, excepting the Interest of his Family.—Eve. Transcript.

THE ORGANIST OF TRINITY CHURCH.—Mr. Editor: The Supplement to the Transcript of Saturday has an antique letter from P. A. Von Hagen, formerly Organist of Trinity Church in this city, but the exact period, as you say, "is not known." Allow me to say that he was the organist prior to 1810, and his immediate successor was Mr. James Hewitt, father to Mrs. Ostinelli, and grandfather to the distinguished cantatrice Biscaccianti. Mr. Van Hagen was the father of a late esteemed Marine Reporter of this city, who, with the rest of the family, was induced to assume his maternal name on account of the erratic movements of the father. Among other celebrities that constituted the choir while Mr. Van Hagen was the organist of Trinity Church, was the celebrated painter, Stewart Newton, and his lamented brother Hibbard, who fell at the battle of Salamanca. Gilbert Stewart, our own famous painter, was a frequent attendant in the organ loft, and I can well remember the diversion he caused by his peculiar method of taking snuff. His snuff was worn or carried in a leather pocket without a box, and on occasion he would take a handful of the article, into which he would thrust his nose instead of applying it "between the finger and the thumb." On one occasion, John, the bellows blower, was absent from duty, and it was ascertained that the cause was dissatisfaction with his pay. Mr. S. Newton, on the moment, passed among the choir the following impromptu;

* * * strives in vain the choir to please
Von Hagen's fingers travel o'er the keys,
All strive in vain—ah foolish fellows,
What can ye do while John won't blow the bellows.

To return to Mr. Von Hagen. In the year 1819 he was at Fort Independence as the teacher and leader of the band under Col. Eustis, and frequently came over with the soldiers and the band to assist in the music in St. Matthew's Church, in South Boston. Some eight or nine years afterwards he was employed in teaching a portion of the colored band, at the south part of the city. From that time I lost sight of him, but I think that he ended his days in one of the eleemosynary institutions of the city. He was a man of kind feelings and of considerable musical talent for those days. His residence, when I was a schoolboy, was in Essex street, near the corner of Short, now Kingston street. The organ of which he had the charge in Trinity Church, is now, if I mistake not, in the church in Pittsfield, Mass. The organ builders must have worked cheaply to be willing to put in a pedal base for "thirty dollars." R.

PAGANINI.—Did you ever know that Paganini was desperately fond of gaming once? I shall tell you how he was cured of his passion. Paganini's favorite violin was a large Guarnerius, so called from Guarnerius, their maker, (these instruments are worth twice their weight in gold,) which a Russian Prince was anxious to purchase from him. He often asked Paganini to sell it to him, and at last, Paganini, tired of his repeated appeals, told him he would sell the violin for $1,000. The Prince told him he must be joking to ask such a sum of money, but that he would give him $500 for it. Paganini had lost everything he owned at gaming tables the night before; his jewels, his rings, his breastpins, his watch, had all been lost, and he had nothing in the world but thirty francs and his violin left. He was about to accept the Prince's offer, when he determined to appeal once more to the gambling table. He did so. He lost, lost, lost—nothing was left in his hand but three francs, and he was obliged to leave the next day for St. Petersburg! He staked these three francs. The run of luck turned, and he soon won money enough to carry him to St. Petersburg. "I was saved!" said Paganini, speaking of this incident. "I was sure of keeping my beloved Guarnerius. Since then, I saw that a gambler is the most contemptible being on the earth, and I have never since touched a card."—N. O. Delta.

TAMBERLIK AND HIS UT SHARP.—The fête at Blois is the only thing I have heard of which has broken the monotony of the season and political hemisphere. M'mes Ugalde, Wertheimber, Messrs. Faure, Levasseur and Tamberlik (by the way, it is said here Tamberlik has been offered $80,000 for eight months; if you wish to have him, pay him any price to get him in his prime, and do not do, as you did with Mario and Grisi, wait until they were voiceless before you summoned them with your golden wand. It is as cheap, even pecuniarily, to get them in their prime: for singers, like the Roman Sybil, increase their demands as they have less to offer); Messrs. Sainte Foye and Ponchard were the seven singers heard. Let me tell you the origin of Mr. Tamberlik's famous "ut sharp," which is worth so much money to him. He is by birth a Roman, but his family is of Polish origin. He stuttered badly when he was a child, and his family destined him to slumber in the stalls of the church. He ran away from the theological seminary and entered the army. Discovering one day that he had a splendid tenor's voice, he quitted the army, and took Guglielmi (a son of the celebrated Guglielmi) for his singing master, under whom he made such progress he was soon engaged at the San Carlo; he and Fraschini (who was several years older than himself) sharing between them the tenor's parts, Fraschini singing the forte and Tamberlik the tenorino. Being wretchedly paid at this opera house, he quitted Italy for Spain, where he obtained an excellent engagement at Barcelona. One day, while rehearsing a new part in which he was to appear that evening, he lost his voice. Nevertheless, there was no such thing as closing the opera house, or changing the piece; for the Court had commanded the opera and the performance. "Then, if you can't sing, bawl!" exclaimed the leader of the orchestra, upon Tamberlik's saying: "By Jove! I cannot sing!" "Bawl," continued the leader of the orchestra; "I'll give you the pitch!" and he knocked the piano as hard as he could. All at once, Tamberlik, the tenorino, who never sang anything, except the softest, sweetest melodies, thundered "do sharp" in clear, bell-tongued tones—his fortune was made, a new "star" rose above the lyric horizon. 'Tis strange we have no altars to Accident; what miracles this god hath wrought!—Id.

SIGNOR BRIGNOLI.—It is growing out of fashion to decry Brignoli on account of his acting, to which he makes little pretension. There is never an occasion when an audience in Philadelphia is not glad to welcome him. The fact is, his voice alone is worth more than others' acting and singing combined. He is, besides, the most elegant gentleman upon the lyric stage. His fine person, his almost beautiful face, his incomparable voice, added to his manliness and gentleness, off and on the stage, will always render him a favorite par excellence, spite of the most ingenious critical industry.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Te Deum, in B flat. (Easy style.) T. Bissell. 50

This Te Deum will prove eminently useful to Episcopal choirs. The want of compositions of just this degree of difficulty has often been felt. Mr. Bissell has proved himself fully equal to the task of supplying it. The music is pleasing and light, yet dignified and church-like throughout.

Byron's farewell to the maid of Athens. Song.

C. A. E. Ewing. 35

A song of much power and originality for a tenor voice.

I tell thee, minstrel, I must weep. H. von Benzon. 25

I speak not, I trace not. " 25

Pleasing parlor songs.

Instrumental Music.

Douce Reverie. Badarzewska. 25

A new piece by the talented lady, whose "Maiden's prayer" is now or soon will be in the hands of all amateur piano players. It may not excite such lively admiration, but will prove very attractive.

Gazelle Waltz. C. P. Burr. 25

Remembrance Waltz. H. von Benzon. 25

Prince Albert Edward Polka. Hyttenrauch. 25

Prince Albert's Galop. C. D'Albert. 25

Good and recommendable dance-music.

On to the field of glory, for Brass band, arranged by Burditt. 1,00

One of the well-known series of "Ditson's Brass Band" Music, printed on cards. The arrangement is complete for any number of instruments between 8 and 14.

In the silent bower. Fantasiebild. T. Oesten. 35

This is the first of a new series of charming pieces by this elegant and fashionable author, entitled "Bygone hours" (Aus holder Zeit), which, like the Sounds of Love series, will soon be immensely popular.

Garibaldi Galop. Chas. D'Albert. 50

A stirring galop, with a very striking picture on the title-page, representing the Italian hero on horseback at the head of his army, and illuminated in colors.

La Piemontaise. New Dance. Renausy. 25

A very pretty new dance, arranged by a conclave of Paris dancing-masters, and just now very popular in the gay French capital. It will be taught here at several academies during the season.

Ernani. (Operatic Favorites.) Franz Nava. 30

Don Giovanni. " " 30

Excellent arrangements for young players, likely to surpass Beyer's Repertoire in popularity.

Books.

DITSON & CO'S STANDARD OPERA LIBRETTOS.

Comprising all the Principal Operas and containing English and Italian Words, with the Music of the Principal Airs. Each 25

As the season approaches for operatic performances, we shall be doing our readers a favor by directing their attention to the above elegant and convenient series of librettos, an advertisement of which will be found in another column.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Italy.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Voices from the mountains speak,
Apennines to Alps reply;
Vale to vale and peak to peak
Toss an old remembered cry:

Italy

Shall be free;

Such the mighty shout that fills
All the passes of her hills.

All the old Italian lakes
Quiver at that quickening word;
Como with a thrill awake;

Garda to her depths is stirred;
Mild the steep

Where he sleeps,

Dreaming of the elder years,
Startled Thracymenus hears.

Sweeping Arno, swelling Po,
Murmur freedom to their meads,
Tiber swift and Liris slow

Send strange whispers from their reeds,

Italy

Shall be free,

Sing the glittering brooks that slide
Toward the sea, from Etna's side.

Long ago was Gracchus slain;

Brutus perished long ago;

Yet the living roots remain

Whence the shoots of greatness grow.

Yet again,

God-like men,

Sprung from that heroic stem,

Call the land to rise with them.

They who haunt the swarming street,

They who chase the mountain boar,

Or, where cliff and billow meet,

Prune the vine or pull the oar,

With a stroke

Break their yoke;

Slaves but yesterday were they—

Freesmen with the dawning day.

Looking in his children's eyes,

While his own with gladness flash,

"Ne'er shall these," the father cries,

"Cringe, like hounds, beneath the lash.

These shall ne'er

Brook to wear

Chains that, thick with sordid rust,

Weigh the spirit to the dust."

Monarchs, ye whose armies stand

Harnessed for the battle-field!

Pause, and from the lifted hand

Drop the bolts of war ye wield.

Stand aloof

While the proof

Of the people's might is given;

Leave their kings to them and heaven.

Stand aloof, and see the oppressed

Chase the oppressor, pale with fear,

As the fresh winds of the west

Blow the misty valleys clear.

Stand and see

Italy

Cast the gyves she wears no more

To the gulfs that steep her shore.

Autumn.*

A SONNET BY LONGFELLOW.

Thou comest, Autumn, heralded by the rain,
With banners, by great gales incessant fanned,
Brighter than brightest silks of Samarcand,
And stately oxen harnessed to thy wain!
Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
Upon thy bridge of gold; thy royal hand
Outstretched with benedictions o'er the land,

Blessing the farms through all thy vast domain!
Thy shield is the red harvest moon, suspended
So long beneath the heavens o'erhanging eaves,
Thy steps are by the farmer's prayers attended;
Like flames upon an altar shine the sheaves;
And, following thee, in thy ovation splendid,
Thine almoner, the wind scatters the golden leaves.

Confessions of a Musical Soul.

An event which forms an epoch in my life happened at this time; the death of my father, my guardian, instructor and nearest friend. Having belonged to the musical choir of our village, his obsequies were solemnized by more than the usual demonstrations that announce a death and impart the deepest interest to the scenes of interment. As soon as body and spirit dissolve their earthly alliance, the dirge is heard sending its pathetic tones through the calm quiet air of the village.

The performers of this death chorale are a Quartet and are stationed on high, near the belfry of the church. The first tones of their instruments bursting suddenly and unexpectedly upon the ear, suspend for a moment all other avocations, and the question occurs, in the phraseology of the Moravian, "Who has gone home?" ("Wer ist heimgegangen?")

During the church service a long and interesting auto-biography was read, compiled from my parent's manuscripts; for he as well as many others of his day, kept his diary of the little inner and outer events of a life distinguished by such an unruffled tenor. In this memoir, many peculiarities of thought, many artless incidents are introduced, expressive of a Zinzendorfian mode of life, worship and language.

A German by birth, his education and all the associations of his life were essentially of a German nature. He had been nurtured and trained in one of the German Moravian villages, had never seen the great organizer himself, Count Zinzendorf, but had been in such communication with those who had lived in the days of the "Disciple,"* and listened to his teachings, heard his lyrical improvisations from his own lips and witnessed his life of philanthropy, so that he was aroused by, and animated with, all the fervor of that peculiar cultus, which distinguished our people of an earlier day.

In his auto-biography he presented a picture of the scenes of those primitive times, not the day of a religious fanaticism mixed up with a perfect religious drama, wherein worship became an actual stage representation, but of that unexceptionable piety and self-sacrifice which elevated the men and women of our past history into an unique model of humanity and rendered them a phenomenon to the world of callous and self-indulgent thought. Of his musical employments, his various discoveries in the philosophy or æsthe-tics of music, he left but a sparse record. He was not devoid of the musical temperament, and it was to that extreme organic sensitiveness that distinguishes all musical natures, he attributed much of his success in performance and conception. But of those vagaries of thought, those fitful moods of feeling and action that make his class a peculiarity of the race, he left no traces in his diary. How strange that the perversities, the contradictions, the loves, the hatreds, the attractions and repulses of a musical, or I might say of a poetical, temperament, embody so much soul; and that all this struggle at last finds vent in tonic, in poetical yearnings, in painting nature, in grasping at, though not reaching, the great unknown!

Why musical beings, why all artists of a delicate mould, are swayed and led by moods and impulse, can be explained in some measure by referring it to a too near contact with persons of more crude and practical natures. But another, a more easy and natural solution of the riddle of a musical nature may be found in the fact, that when we leave the province of tone and reënter the world of dull truth, there is a vast descent—we are liable to feel all the consequences of the change—reality is a disappointment, a thwarting of all the exalted aspirations into which tone-poetry had led us. Life is too real, and the more we live in music, the more unreal every thing around should become, to supply happiness. The anatomy of my father's nature, from whose strange composition there sprung forth so many beautiful effusions of lyrical music, was not an easy subject for my feeble philosophy, and in the course of his memoir, I was often reminded of those mysterious qualities that make up the artist's temperament and originate so many of the distresses of an inner life. Harmony and gentleness flow together and unite us with all surrounding congenial spirits; then comes the qualm of disgust, a feeling of repulsiveness; a dislike bordering on hatred; a disunion of our loves and friendships; a perverseness of tastes and inclinations; a wish for some vague nothing; and that proceeds till some new musical creation rises up and restores order, unity of thought, and a perfect ideal love.

In accordance with custom, no cenotaph or sculptural tomb marked the place of burial; but an oblong marble tablet, with a simple inscription of birth, birth-place and death, distinguished the resting-place of my lost parent. Much attention is paid to the cemetery, in laying out the ground, surrounding the tablet with flowers, and adorning the walks with trees, and every effort is made to render the place a resort of sacred pleasure, open at all times for friend and stranger. Here I now often repaired for meditation, and not unfrequently when a musical interment drew the multitude together, did I follow, to enter into the enjoyments of the dirge, played in the open air, among the trees, where the birds were singing, where, at a time of over-drawn excitement, the spirits of the departed seemed to hover; where Hope was the presiding angel, leading you onwards toward a place of final bliss; and where a general feeling of repose and quiet indicated that here was the symbol of man's eventual destiny. One link broken, I now more than ever before swayed between life the mortal and life the eternal; calling up before my dreamy vision images of a musical unearthliness, and so purely harmonious, so deep in the combinations of those exquisite chords that never fail in their effect, even upon untaught ears; breathing peace, hope, joy to the disturbed soul, and anon looking forward to an emancipation from this dull bondage of care, and a realization of all that, of which our finest tone images are but a shadow.

But during this later stage of thought and study, I felt as if my powers were ever putting on more and more of that maturity which belongs to the autumn of life, clothing its fruits in the mellow colored garb of mental perfection, and filling up all the vacancies of a youthful intellectual growth with the fullness and ripeness of old age. As this sunset of life approaches, and is indicated by these longer shadows and that far-off obscurity that throws many past objects into uncertainty and forgetfulness, reflections force themselves upon me in reference to the utility of my own performances upon the stage, where every human being occupies a higher or lower position and acts his part. Some of us live for and dedicate ourselves to others with a devotion that makes a perfect sacrifice of egotism, while many and by far the larger portion, live for themselves, and never allow their individuality to operate upon other minds, when its influences would be of service, and where that universal philanthropy which ought to be the end of our being could come into play. Many years had been spent in the discharge of those tutorial services, which among us have no adequate remuneration above the ordinary gratitude of the pupil, who sometimes evinces it by an occasional acknowledgement of love and affection for those who have instructed her. In this capacity, therefore, I was conscious of having surrendered all selfish gratifications, sacrificed many of the little vanities and those temptations to self-adoration, that characterize so many of my sex, to the pursuit of nobler ends.

But a more serious question, which I frequently put to myself, was, how had I been benefitted, or in how far had I contributed to the elevation of others, by my ceaseless musical studies? That I had lived in the poetry of tone, had discoursed in its language from day to day, and had even fancied I had wandered beyond boundaries to which others who had gone before me had been limited, was left me as a consoling truth, after the many years I had spent in these pursuits; and I felt unwilling to draw an inference from all this that to me music had proved nothing more than an inane gratification. I was conscious of the position it held among the sister arts, and that, in all its moral influence, it should never be ranked below painting, written poetry or sculpture.

The life I had lived, therefore, was in the æsthetics of religion, viewing a musical cultus in this peculiar sense; and with this avowal, I look forward to my withdrawal from the scenes of this outward life, with the conviction that my musical devotion was productive of good results. Many have seen fit to prescribe the limits of religion, in its relations to æsthetic morality, and have deemed that an infringement of the purity and reality of a Christian belief, which adores the beautiful and thus jeopardizes its dogmatism and the performances of its mere duties.

But I feel convinced that no one has ever drawn that fine line of demarcation between religion and poetry, which limits each to its proper sphere; nor has it ever been shown how near poetry approaches the lofty and sacred province of the former, for those mysterious qualities of our nature, those incomprehensible instincts of our humanity which give birth to a love of beauty and solemnity of feeling, invariably mingle and fraternize, and leave us in doubt whether such elements can be separated.

Our primitive Moravian culture was æsthetic in all that relates to the inner or impalpable forms of beauty, such as we find in music and in religious poetry. For it cannot be said that all poetry is impalpable. Its imagery, when derived from the outward world, becomes visible and is of the earth. Music, in its purer and sacred forms, free from imitation or description of external life, is impalpable and proceeds from an invisible world. Our cultus was thus deeply imbued with a heavenly poetry, and by addicting one's self to its spirit and its usages, we could at times realize a foretaste of that unseen condition which is supposed to follow this material condition, whose investiture is marked by such strange contrasts of hideousness and beauty.

In some of these later days of calm contemplation of the nature and essence of music, moments of transient doubt have come over me as to the existence of any analogy between a musical motive and a stanza of written poetry—between a musical and a written thought; whether that totally abstracted thought which harmonized tone arrangements embody, is not altogether an unearthly conception and worthy of being ascribed to Heaven. Had I ever, in the study and works of the congenial arts, found myself as strongly drawn from earth or as deeply absorbed in the hope of a celestial life, as I was tempted to indulge in, while listening to the strains of the Moravian chorale? And could any word definition ever lay before the mind the disclosures of sacred song, or the sublimity of feeling engendered by the Oratorio?

These and similar reflections often excite within me a dilemma as to whether music really has an exponent, or whether its thoughts are its own and undefinable by any powers of criticism or rhetoric. And while yet delaying among those dim and uncertain shadows that flit around me, what a glorious solace to think that these forms of musical beauty shall soon have a realization in the world that awaits me!

Though happy is my present lot, I am prepared, at any moment to depart, whenever called, to the mansions of eternal rest. I feel assured that my hours of musical exaltation have all been prefigurations of an unseen life, and hence I regard my passage into an hereafter as a blissful transition.*

J. H.

* In reference to this sentiment it may be remarked that the Moravian always entertained æsthetic views of death. In illustration of this are the rites of interment, the localities of the tomb, and the cheerful avowal that death has no terrors and is merely a transitional event. Inordinate grief is rarely seen accompanying the catastrophe of death, and a hopeful tone characterizes all his expressions in relation to its bereavements.

DRESDEN (Germany) has at last, on the 26th of July, been blessed with the first performance of Verdi's "Trovatore." It was a success of course.

The Diarist Abroad.

Dorm, Sept. 9, 1860.

I heard a story the other day, which pleased me. When Rau's absurd book on Mozart was appearing in parts, Prof. Jahn of course bought them as they appeared, he being at the time engaged upon his great biography of the composer. Rau's utter lack of comprehension of the real character of Mozart, his singular ignorance of the man's history beyond what Nissen had published, and the general feebleness of the whole thing, being without one spark of real genius from the first to the last, made the book a source of great fun to the professor, and, through him, to the gentlemen who dined at the same table in one of the hotels.

"Well, Professor, anything new on Mozart?" was the question one day just after Jahn had received and gone through with one of the most ridiculous numbers.

As there was a great deal of "new" in that number, Jahn proceeded to elicit "inextinguishable laughter" by giving them Rau's latest inspirations. All but one—a stranger—enjoyed it highly. He, however, seemed rather ill at ease. It was afterward discovered that this man was Heribert Rau himself, who, as it seems, had come down the Rhine from Frankfort to pump Jahn for materials to abuse, but who after this dinner thought best to sneak away without speaking with the Professor.

In the Life of Mozart Jahn has honored Rau and other Mährchen writers with a note of which I should not like to be the subject.

So I am not alone in my dislike to, and contempt for, false pictures of historical personages. For real Mährchen, i. e., stories, where the imagination invents the personages as well as the scene in which they act, my taste is strong. I consider them as among the best means of elevating and cultivating a genuine taste for music. Hence an intense love for Hoffman's writings, great pleasure in the musical sketches of Weisflog and others of their school.

But there is a side to this question, which we who search for facts—and facts are good things in spite of ridicule—perhaps alone feel. And this side is the labor, expense and disappointment in which these distorters of facts involve us. I am told in Dwight's Journal that such sketches are understood for what they are and nobody is deceived by them. With all due respect, this is not so. They get into currency and finally are adopted as history. And this sort of history has cost me weeks of labor and time, and of course all the expenses of living in a foreign land.

How so? do you ask?

Case I. There is a long and very interesting (to the general reader) sketch called "Beethoven in the beginning of his troubles." This I found in a respectable German periodical told as history, in the musical department of the Royal Library at Berlin. I could obtain no copy of the periodical and spent some days in copying it. It proved afterward to be the meanest kind of bosh. Last season, a gentleman who is editing a Biographical Dictionary, lent me this sketch as history, and was surprised to learn from me that it was mere fancy work—poor stuff, too, at that.

Case II. A gentleman directed my attention to a long and fine article (as he said) in a literary periodical, which would give me certain valuable facts and traits in Beethoven's character.

So from bookstore to bookstore, from library to library I went to find the periodical. After much loss of time and trouble it occurred to me that the Imperial Library must have it. Sure enough half a dozen bound volumes were brought me, and I set myself to work searching for my article. At last! It proved to be a lot of anecdotes printed with "pictures to match," the last of which was an old acquaintance, which I had ten years ago carefully copied, and found afterward to be — bosh. It is the old story how the tenor singer Barth visited Beethoven one day and found him just about to burn a piece of music. "Let me first sing it," says Barth. He did so, and Beethoven exclaimed, "No, we will not burn it." It was the Adelaide! Is it not a pity that so good a story should be met by this fact? Barth first came to Vienna in 1808, when Adelaide had already been printed over ten years.

Case III. The following capital story was related me in Vienna in relation to the composition of the "Battle of Vittoria." No, I will not tell it, for even if I state as preface and appendix that it is false, some ass will print it as fact, and when the death-angel has touched me, some other ass will come to my bedside and wonder that it found no place in the book — to be written. Suffice it to say, that this story was a main reason for a journey of a hundred miles or more, and was there shorn of nine-tenths of its dimensions; that the other tenth has nothing whatever to do with the "Battle of Vittoria," and Schindler has since confirmed me in the opinion that it cannot possibly be true in all that gives it any importance.

Case IV. When Gungl was in America, he used to tell a story with tears in his eyes, which story — not tears — I have also in in print, in a short biography of Beethoven published in Bonn, in 1845. The story has gone the rounds, I believe, in German, French, and English. It relates how Beethoven in the autumn of 1826, too poor to hire a vehicle, travelled on foot from Baden (in Austria) to Vienna; stopped over night in a peasant house; saw — for he could not hear — the members of the family play a piece of music arranged as a quintette: then looked at the music and found it to be his own Seventh Symphony; then burst into tears and exclaimed "I am Beethoven!"; and then there was a deuce of a fuss generally, &c., and he marched out into the cold night air, and next day reached Vienna sick, went to bed and was borne from the bed to the tomb. This whole story is certainly false from beginning to end, and yet it is printed as biography?

Case V. In the recollections of Madame Schröder which have appeared in the "Gartenlaube," and which profess to be historical and are received as truth, is a sketch of her first appearance in Fidelio — not the story of the Polko, though — which I took the time and pains to copy. Upon seeing Schindler afterwards, I asked him about it, and he assured me that Beethoven was not present at the performance! At the second performance he was; but so far from sitting "so enveloped in his cloak that only his glowing eyes were visible," the Vienna papers of the day state that he sat in one of the front boxes. "The whole story," says Schindler, "is a lie."

Case VI. In Dwight's Journal of Aug. 11, Article on Wagner, that composer's sketch "A Visit to Beethoven" is mentioned. This article, done into German, has attained the currency east of the Rhine as history, which it, I suppose, still enjoys in France. Wagner never saw Beethoven, and the whole story is a fabrication. What trouble and time it cost me to prove this!

Case VII. A gentleman here in Bonn, who has long been a collector of Beethoven matter, placed before me the other day one of these sketches, I forget now what, with no doubt of its authenticity. I saw at once it was one of my abominable nightmares — or day bores — and told him it was a mere fancy sketch, to his great surprise and even sorrow.

Enough of these cases.

If there was any way of compelling writers of this class to live from hand to mouth a few years in a foreign land, and go through with the literary drudgery of making researches, and be continually and everywhere met by this sort of trash as history, being thus often led into the wrong track and to the loss of weeks of time and labor, this is all the punishment I would inflict upon them. So far from being punished they make money by their absurdities.

With Heribert Rau's book upon Beethoven, the matter has a worse side. It seems hardly worth while to speak of a so-called Romance, which in our country, when once its character is known, would only be read in a brothel, and by people of low tastes. Suffice it to say that he represents Beethoven's brother, Carl Caspar, as selling his handsome wife for vile purposes, and that too utterly without foundation, and notwithstanding that wife is still living near Vienna, and the family of Caspar's son, now a widow with a fine set of children, some of them grown up and married, still living in that city. Unfortunately there is too much of sad truth which the biographer must expose in the history of Beethoven, but what right has a miserable romancer to make such trash the basis of a tissue of vile, lewd scenes, which we cannot read aloud in mixed company without blushing, and which heap infamy upon the name of a respectable and most amiable family?

What would the people of Boston say to Sylvanus Cobb, should he make the sad Cambridge tragedy the subject of a romance, and that too, without changing the names, and even by dragging the unhappy wife into his plot as a criminal?

Could you see, as I have seen, and hear as I have heard, the tears and sobs, of a widow and mother, outraged in her holiest feelings, by the infamously false descriptions and pictures of Heribert Rau, you would share the indignation which rises in my breast whenever his name comes to my ears or meets my eyes. And this, this — what? — this filler of his pockets by an almost obscene book, in which he has multiplied tenfold the sins of the fathers, and then visited them upon the still living children — this getter of money out of the tears and sleepless nights of the widow and the fatherless — this man, as the newspapers inform us, has now in hand another romance, on whom? Ye Gods! on Alexander von Humboldt, which is to be rendered piquant by certain love adventures of his youth! If he has done this, as he has done Beethoven, God grant that the Humboldt family will have power and influence — which Carl van Beethoven's poor widow has not — to confiscate the book and punish its infamous writer with five years on bread and water in the state's prison!

It is high time that this sort of thing be stopped. See here. The late noble Wilhelm Grimm, when very young loved Dorothea Wild. Circumstances over which they had no control, prevented their marriage for several years. Meantime he and his brother had become inseparable. When at length their prospects brightened the marriage took place. Some years later a farce was written, entitled "One must Marry." This farce had a great success. Why? Because it was known everywhere, that those two great and noblehearted men, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, were the subjects of ridicule and low farce, in this piece!

Perhaps another "Letter to the D——" may overcome my objections even to Rau; I fear not, however, until certain facts related to me with sobs and tears, but in confidence, have passed from memory, but which seem now to be fixed there "as with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever." A. W. T.

A CHANCE FOR BARNUM.

In the villages of the Rhine valley there is an unusual festival called the "Kirmess," which is supposed to be a celebration of the dedication of the church in years ago. At least such is supposed to be the origin of the festival. We have nothing like it now, but the old country "muster" of thirty years ago, was not so very dissimilar. In large villages a Kirmess draws together all sorts of vagabonds, who set up their booths and open their exhibitions, as described in some of Dickens' works. Giants and dwarfs, jugglers, circus riders, the man with the young walrus, he with the double-headed calf, low theatres, and nobody knows what all. At Putschen, half an hour's walk from Bonn, we saw all these and long rows of booths besides, occupied with shows and with articles of all sorts, which the peasantry could need, for sale. Sunday is the great day of the feast, when the crowd becomes almost impervious, notwithstanding the great numbers who are within the booths witnessing exhibitions, refreshing themselves with eatables and drinkables of all (cheap) sorts, or in the dance houses, whirling in the waltz. What a music was that in the principal dance house — half a dozen old brass instruments, execrable in tone and execrably out of tune! Little did the crowd heed that, however: the main thing was the dance, and there was no lack of peasant girls, neat and clean in Sunday dresses for the constant succession of "danz-lust-ish" young men.

By the way, Byron must have been a poet, for a man, who could speak of these girls, "Peasant girls with bright blue eyes

And hands that offer early flowers" as something poetical, must have been blessed with a double share of imagination.

But to Barnum's chance. His speculation with the Swiss bell-ringers (from Yorkshire, England) and that with Jenny Lind, we propose should be followed by another, also musical, and which we think might be made to pay. We confess, however, in our ignorance of the real "capabilities" of the new light in the singing world, except so far as they are developed in the following sketch, which we translate and condense from a German paper.

A few weeks since the Kirmess was in full tide at Brühl, near Cologne, and shows and booths were in all their glory as above described. One of the railroad trains from Cologne, which halted at Brühl had a young Englishman for passenger, with a handsome sum of money in his pocket, and bent upon having a high time, during an excursion "up the Rhine." The station was crowded with people and as he looked them over, an old Cologne acquaintance caught his eye, who for his part greeted the Englishman joyously. A few words and the latter made up his mind to leave the train and "inaugurate" his jolly tour with the glories of Kirmess. After half an hour in the inn over good wine and in lively talk, the Englishman slipped away in quest of personal adventures. He wandered about from booth to booth, enjoying the oddities and drolleries of the crowds. Of this too, he in time, grew weary, and must find some new amusement. Why not he himself, take part in the business of the day! A happy thought!

There was among the shows one booth in which a Hercules exhibited his feats of strength. Thither he wended his way and proposed to the strong man to sing on his stage, four English national songs, gratis. Hercules should have the entrance fees—and he, the Englishman, only hoped that they would be abundant. Agreed; and now in front of the booth it was drummed and fided and shouted aloud that an Englishman was to sing four national songs. But nobody cared for the national songs of Albion. But the singer must sing—for had he not determined to do it—and must not John Bull carry out his determinations? "Fill the booth with spectators, I will pay the fees," said he, and in a few minutes every seat was occupied.

But the English national songs had no charms for the German ears—certainly not for those of German peasants, notwithstanding a Scotch song or two have saved a German opera. The singer's auditors laughed in his face. This was not pleasant, and the vocalist "waxed wroth." He grew indignant to such a degree as to draw off his coat, strike an attitude and challenge the laughers to fight. That was jolly, and a burst of applause from the sixty or seventy persons present followed. After some little discussion and hesitation, four strong, lusty young peasants mounted the stage, not doubting that they could make mincemeat of the slender Englishman, and without trouble. Four against one; but that one understood his business, and after a few fisticuffs, two of them lay at length.

The other two adopted new tactics. What cared they for boxing rules and regulations? Their intention was to give the Englishman a thrashing, rules or no rules. "They rushed in upon him, and being soon joined by the other two, who had picked themselves up and were not very amicably disposed towards the singer of national songs, the boxer began to get the worst of it. Indeed he was thrown down, and it rained fists from all sides upon him, while the audience laughed and shouted and hurraed in ecstasy. The noise called in Hercules, who rescued his singer from what had become an almost perilous situation.

After recovering himself, and getting breath once more, and finding no bones broken, he drew on his coat, and, satisfied with the humors of the of the Kirmess, returned to the Pavilion inn to his friend.

He related his adventures—his version of them—and when the whistle announced the approach of the train, he prepared to spend the night at Rolandseck or the Seven Mountains.

His bill must be paid. He put his hand in the breast pocket of his coat; his pocket-book was gone. It was sought in vain; the crier was sent through the village and among the booths, but no reward offered brought it back. The singer of national songs was at last glad to embrace the offer of his friend, and borrow of him money to pay his passage direct to London; where, for aught the Journal of Music knows he is ready to accept an engagement for Barnum's Museum, or even as primo uomo in an English Opera.

From Spohr's Autobiography.

"VENICE, October, 1816.

Paganini returned hither yesterday from Trieste, and seems to have given up the idea of going to Vienna at present. He called on me this morning, and I at last made the acquaintance of this wonderful man, about whom I have been talked to every day since I have been in Italy. No instrumental performer has ever so roused the Italians as Paganini. Although the Italians are not very fond of instrumental music, he has given ten entertainments in Milan, and five here. When you enquire by what witchcraft he enchants his public, you are told by unmusical persons that he is a genuine necromancer, and produces tones on the violin that have never been heard before. Connoisseurs will tell you, however, that the great dexterity of his left hand in double stops and all kinds of rapid passages cannot be denied, that however those qualities of his playing which transport the great multitudes, in fact lower him to a juggler, a charlatan, and that he is wanting in a large tone, a long stroke of the bow and tasteful treatment of cantabile passages, which are certainly sad deficiencies. These artifices, (which the Italian public are so much taken with, that they have given him as a nickname, "The Unapproachable," (which title, by the way, he has modestly adopted in the signature on his portrait,) consist in a lot of tricks such as in the dark times of good taste a certain Schiller used to perform in the small towns and petty capitals of Germany, and at which the good people used to stare with mouths wide open, viz., in flageolet tones, in variations on one string—the other three for the sake of effect being removed in sight of the public before commencing—in pizzicato passages, produced by the left hand alone, and in the imitation of sounds which are unnatural to the violin, as for instance the peculiar tones of a bassoon, the voice of an old woman and others. As I have never heard Schiller—whose motto was "One God, one Schiller" I should like much to have an opportunity to hear Paganini in his own manner, the more so, as an artist who is so much admired must certainly possess more real merits than those mentioned. The cause of his eminence as a player is said to have been a four years imprisonment to which he was condemned for strangling his wife to death in a fit of anger. At least this is the story told openly in Milan, and here. Not being able to entertain himself with reading or writing, as his education had been utterly neglected, he fell to practising the violin, and there it was where he invented and perfected those tricks which now astonish the whole of Italy. By unpleasant and impolite manners he has made several enemies among the influential musical people here, and these, after I have played for them, take every opportunity to praise me up at the expense of Paganini, which is not only very unjust, as two artists of such totally different style as Paganini and myself, should never be measured together, but also prepossesses all of Paganini's friends and admirers against me."

WORDER IF THEY DO.—They had a "Board of Music Trade Convention" in town the other day. Vanity Fair begs to inquire if the Board of Music traders take each other's notes for pay?

Johanna Kinkel's Eight Letters to a Friend

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRACET, A. M.)

[MR. EDITOR: The author of these "letters" who met with so untimely a fate at London, has deservedly enjoyed a wide reputation in her country, both as a musician and a poet. Her "letters" will clearly prove how thoroughly familiar she was with the musical art. As to her excellency as a poet, allow me to remark that when once in the stirring times of the German Revolution, her husband, Prof. Kinkel read to a vast assembly a most exquisite poem on the aroused nation's struggle, and the listening multitude asked for its author's name, I heard Kinkel exclaim with the fervor of an admiring husband: My wife wrote it, and the thousands standing around the platform burst into a universal applause. Mrs. Kinkel introduces her "letters" with the following preface:

"This book is particularly destined for musically educated mothers who live in the country or in small towns, and are obliged for want of a competent music teacher, to undertake or control themselves the instruction of their children in this department.

The observations contained in these letters and acquired during a many years' experience, might also benefit some music teachers in their first start."]

I.

You ask my advice with regard to the instruction on the piano to be given to your daughter. I cheerfully avail myself of this opportunity to write down many an experience made in this department, with the hope of benefitting others beside you. I do not presume to teach professional musicians; but the class of talented and well educated performers on the piano to whom you belong, who with all their own acquirements might hardly be able to instruct a child will perhaps thank me for giving them some hints in order to obtain the method by which I enjoyed so much success. It is true that with the assistance of the many excellent "schools" and "studies" for the piano, published by masterly musicians during many years, any musical man with ordinary patience and clear conceptions may become a tolerable teacher; but it will none the less be desirable to have the path of our own experience somewhat shortened. For it is certainly detrimental to beginners to receive an impression of wavering uncertainty by the teacher's following various ways of instruction which he is likely to give up as his experience increases.

I need, of course, not tell you, in what manner you are to teach your pupils the notes and rests, as well as the general rules of performance. You need only take a standard Piano "Instruction Book" to get a guide for the entire course of instruction. But such a book being once selected, you must certainly go through it. You may, for the sake of encouraging the pupils, if they should become weary, allow some cheerful favorite piece as a temporary interruption; but you must return at once to the Instruction Book. If the latter does not contain a sufficient number of little pieces, you may find in every music store, a complete series of such pieces under the title: "Exercices préparatoires" by Aloys Schmidt.

I content myself, with regard to the first instruction, with pointing out such details as are most frequently overlooked or neglected, important though they are.

We direct your attention above all to the correct raising of the fingers, and the observance of the grammatical accent.

Both rules are so easy and self-evident, that I am ashamed to speak of them. But as many performers have wasted their time for years by futile instruction, and must retrace their steps, simply because they have impatiently skipped over those first steps; it is not superfluous again and again, to direct the attention of every teacher to it.

It is with spoiled pupils, very painful to undertake opposing at once their various short comings, since this constant interruption and blame on the part of the teacher confuses and exasperates them. Turn, therefore, your entire attention above all, and first to the mechanism of the fingers required by the very easiest pieces, and consider that the more strictly you oblige the beginners to learn, that the sooner you will enter with them a more pleasant field.

I am aware that he who teaches music for the first time, very often becomes tired of instructing. He must alternately drive out deeply rooted habits of pupils, negligently taught by former instructors, or incessantly warn small children not to hold their fingers too flatly. He will impatiently ask if there is on earth a more futile and tiresome task. He has perchance looked deeply into the soul of music, and is now to impart to his pupils his beloved art as an external skill of performing something on an instrument, instead of teaching them to think and feel musically. He would much rather be the magnetic stone attracting all those around him to music's bourne, and prepare the way for the creations of the immortal masters which are lifeless to all such as cultivate music as a thoughtless plaything.

This vexation of the teacher, whose original zeal is dulled by the beginner's stiff fingers, and slow perception is very soon communicated to the latter. Children's fingers, in particular, are as yet lacking in the muscular power required to raise them elastically after each tone. The constant call: fingers up! displeases them, and if in addition, the teacher's aversion to the mechanical part of his avocation, becomes permanent and manifests itself by a sullen, impartial bearing to his pupils, he often destroys in them the germ of future good results.

The teacher's task for the first step, in developing the mechanism of fingers is, after all, like any other handiwork, during which he must not carelessly meditate upon some other entertainment. He must look out for the acquirement of the finger's skill with just the same interest, which the turner or metal-working man exhibits in polishing his material.

Whoever is impatient of detail, and insensible even to the most insignificant results of his toil, has no talent for teaching.

Just try it, and devote yourself once with close attention, to the simple task of teaching a child to play a scale perfectly evenly. The liveliness of your interest, the cheerfulness with which you will e. g. remark: "there were only two indistinct tones in it now! now there is but one! now you have played it quite correctly," passes over to the child. It will now of itself attend closely to its touch, and hear with satisfaction every success. If you conquer indolence and weariness in yourself, you will carry the pupil along with you. It would not be amiss to insert alternately a more pleasing composition between dry exercises, provided you choose so as to promote this study and not to spoil the taste. The pleasant is sufficiently intermixed with the useful in the studies of recent composers, and if the pupils have once reached this step, they should surely not complain of any want of pleasing variety in their exercises.

It is decidedly injurious to pass with restless haste from one piece to another before the former has been studied and performed to perfection. The pupils should from the first start learn to appreciate a finished purity of execution as an unavoidable necessity.

If you bear in mind that an insignificant fault in the attitude of fingers, will render afterwards an appreciative performance impossible, you will not, like so many dilettanti, regard mechanical skill as a sort of contrast to expressive performance. The former must exist as a means for the purpose before the latter can be expected from the pupil. How can a performer, be he ever so clear and understanding, represent beauty in music, if his fingers are obstinate?

Whoever undertakes, then, the task of instructing a beginner, should be honest to him and not hasten away over the prosaic portion of his avocation, in order to amuse himself on the expense of the pupil.

Madame Clara Novello.

The retirement of Mad. Clara Novello from the Sacred Concert-room will leave a blank which at present there does not appear any likelihood of being filled up. Such a loss to sacred art is indeed to be deeply lamented, more particularly at a time when oratorios, become an entertainment for the people, are progressing rapidly in general estimation, and when their performances are no longer restricted to special localities and periods. Such an artist as Mad. Novello must have had some hand or voice in conducing to this progress. Many no doubt would at first go to hear the singer, with no particular predilection for holy strains, who subsequently, taught to attend and understand, would be attracted by the music itself. If ever a singer was constituted to exercise an influence over a large auditory, it was the lady who forms the subject of our remarks. Mad. Novello has not only a voice of surpassing quality and purity, but her style and manner are eminently adapted to sacred music. The beauty and purity of her voice were acknowledged from the first moment when, as a girl, she was launched into artistic life, and dared the fiat of the public alongside of Malibran, Grisi, Caradori, Sontag, Mary Paton, and other cantatrices, native and foreign, who were more or less remarkable in the roll of fame. A new star in such a constellation, the youthful Clara Novello was not obfuscated in the surrounding lustre. She gained hosts of admirers, who were enchanted with her lovely voice and the refinement of her style, and augured the most brilliant results for her future. That these auguries have not been falsified we need hardly say. Mad. Novello's career has been one of undeviating success, and no part of her progress has been marked by greater triumphs than that which dates from her return to public life after several years' interval passed in retirement. Indeed, our principal regret at losing the artist is bound up with the fact that her vocal powers are as transcendent as ever, and that time has only added to the purity and delicacy of her style. Mad. Novello's powers been on the wane our regrets would have been extenuated by the consideration that she was acting cautiously and judiciously; anticipating Time as it were, and succumbing to his supremacy ere he could lay too heavily his hand upon her—thereby exhibiting art to the last, as she stood on the threshold of the temple about to take her leave. Mad. Novello's reasons for quitting public life are alleged to be of a private nature. The loss to the public is the same whatever the cause.

The qualities which eminently befit Mad. Clara Novello for the sacred concert-room are the peculiar character of the voice, and a style essentially devotional. Mad. Novello's voice is a high soprano, pure, open, brilliant, clear and liquid as a well-tuned silver bell, and extremely sympathetic. In the upper register some of the tones are wonderfully touching. This rare organ, so available, it would seem, for all purposes, so capable, so beautiful and so telling, is toned down and sobered to a religious feeling that lends it its peculiar characteristic, and makes it almost sombre in expression and coloring. From this peculiarity, this sombreness of tone, Mad. Novello derives her special power in sacred music. Of that "demonstrative" quality so indispensable to the dramatic singer she exhibits but little, and is seldom outwardly energetic or forcible. Intensity without display, and earnestness arising from a manner full of repose and apparently absorbed, constitute the specialties which distinguish Mad. Novello from all other singers of sacred music. So rapt, indeed, is she at most times in her performance, that, even when singing, could our ears deceive us so, she might stand as an exemplification of Wordsworth's Nun, "breathless with adoration." Whether this be pure instinct or the most consummate art, we cannot say. In either case the result is the same, and the wondrous influence of the vocalist made manifest. When shall England be able to boast of another singer who can produce such extraordinary effects by such simple means? When shall England boast of another singer who, while disclaiming, if not failing in, that dramatic vigor and impassioned energy which all candidates for lyric honors, on or off the stage, have made the be-all and end-all of their acquirements, may be able to achieve such greatness and renown? The brightest luminary of the Sacred Concert-room is about to disappear for ever—when to be replaced lies buried in the womb of Time.—London Musical World, Sept. 22.

An Unknown Opera by Donizetti.

The following are particulars relative to the recently discovered manuscript opera of Rita. One day, as Donizetti was walking along the Boulevard des Italiens, depressed and sad, he was accosted by his friend, M. Gustave Vaez (author of the libretto of La Favorite). "I die with ennui," he exclaimed; "pray suggest something to occupy my mind, even if it be but one act." A comic subject was agreed upon; two days after, the first act was brought by the author to the composer, who soon accomplished his task; to be brief, within the week the opera (Rita) was finished. It was accepted with eagerness by the director of the Opéra Comique, M. Crosnier, but never produced, for the following cause. M. Auber, at that time the presiding deity of the Opéra Comique, had been vainly solicited to have his work ready at the period named, but replied that it was impossible, and chose the month of March following for its performance. In this dilemma, M. Crosnier addressed himself to Donizetti and an agreement was duly drawn up between them. M. Auber, who was in ignorance of this agreement, wrote a few days afterwards to the manager, retracting his first decision, and fixing November as the precise period he wished his opera to appear. Great was M. Crosnier's embarrassment; but by employing a little tact, he hoped to extricate himself. Donizetti, who did not at all understand theatrical diplomacy, was at first much puzzled by the manager's preliminary eloquence, but a light flowing into his mind, he divined the real state of the case, and coming at once to the point, said, "Oh, now I see; it is the engagement with me that is the difficulty in question; I am not in the habit of using a magisterial order to enforce a performance of my music," and taking up the paper he tore it in pieces. Feeling, however, much hurt, he refused to part with the score. Unfortunately for M. Crosnier, Auber within a few days again altered his mind, and gave notice that he should adhere to his original arrangement of producing his opera in March. Meantime the management of the Opéra Comique devolved on M. Basset, and the latter, finding an entry of the piece in the books of the theatre, proposed to M. Gustave Vaez to put it at once into rehearsal. The illustrious composer was already attacked by the cruel disease of the brain which, alas! paralysed his fine intellect, and his brother—chief of the military bands of the Sultan, at Constantinople—did not judge it right, while the poor maestro writhed in his bed of agony in a Maison de Sante, at Issy, to deliver over the fruits of that intellect to the anatomical discussions of the critic. Donizetti was taken to Bergamo, his native town, in a dying state, where he yielded up his last sigh. A seal was put on all his papers, amongst which was the score of Rita. Adolphe Adam, who was aware of the existence of this MS., wished to produce it while he was director of the Opéra Nationale, and M. Gustave Vaez wrote to M. Joseph Donizetti, and received the following reply, dated from Constantinople: "Sir,—It is out of my power to accept your polite offer at present, as no decision has yet been made of my poor brother Gaetano's effects, and I am only a co-inheritor." The matter thus rested during several years. M. Joseph Donizetti dying, his son bought the rights of the other inheritors, and came to Paris with the score, which M. Gustave Vaez proposed to M. Perrin, now manager of the Opéra Comique. M. Perrin inquired into the authenticity of the work, and M. Gustave Vaez pledged his word of honor to having seen each piece composed by Donizetti, according as the words were brought to him. "Your simple word is enough for me," replied M. Perrin, "but it will hardly satisfy those who may be tempted to surmise a speculation on our part." M. G. Vaez proposed forming a committee capable of pronouncing on the authenticity of the work. The proposal was at once carried into effect. Individuals were chosen, not only with reference to solving the question in an artistic point of view, but also those who were acquainted with his handwriting. The list included the following names: M. Duprez, M. Laborne, who had superintended the copying of all Donizetti's music for the theatre from the original MSS.; M. Vanthart, chief director of the choruses; M. Robin, chief copyist. The committee assembled under the presidency of M. Perrin. The question to be solved was the following: "Is the score of the opera (Rita) complete as it has been found, orchestrated, and ready for the copyist by the hand of Donizetti?" If the committee do not come to a satisfactory conclusion on this point, M. Perrin's agreement is null and void. The score was carefully examined, and the judges unanimously pronounced that no possible doubt could exist of its authenticity. The committee signing their names, they further stated that there was positive evidence that the music had been composed after the receipt of the words, and expressly for the French libretto.—London Musical World, Sept. 22.

Worcester Musical Festival.

SEPTEMBER.

Tuesday.—At 12 o'clock the musical performances were inaugurated by the first part of Haydn's Creation, in which the most marked feature was the singing of Mad. Clara Novello, whose voice told wonderfully in "The Marvellous Work," and "With Verdure Clad," bringing the selection to a fine close. Mr. Weiss is so thoroughly at home in this as in all other of our standard works, that we need do no more than remark that his delivery of "Rolling in foaming billows" was characterised by all those good qualities which have raised and retained him in his deserved position. After a few minutes' pause, Mendelssohn's oratorio of St. Paul commenced, and allowing half-an-hour's interval between the first and second part, did not conclude until just 4 o'clock. Our readers are sufficiently well acquainted with this masterpiece to render all criticism on its intrinsic and manifold beauties quite superfluous. Suffice it to say then, that the general execution is entitled to commendation—principals, band, and chorus alike exerting themselves to do justice to the great work, which twenty-four years ago was produced with such success at the Düsseldorf gathering, under the direction of the great composer himself. Mesdames Clara Novello and Rudersdorff divided the soprano music; Mad. Sainton-Dolby, assisted by Miss M. Wells, the contralto; Mr. Sims Reeves alone sustaining the tenor part, and Signor Belletti the bass, supported by Mr. Briggs, one of the lay clerks of the cathedral. The choruses producing the greatest effect were "Stone him to death," "Rise up, arise," and "O great is the depth," marred however, by people who could not wait for their refreshment until the end of the first part, but persisted in getting up and disturbing everybody else. The chorales, forming so distinctive a feature in this oratorio, were also given with great smoothness and attention. The one "To thee O Lord," performed at the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington, and "Sleepers, wake, a voice is calling," especially calling forth praise. The final chorus "Not only unto him," was altogether lost for the same reason we have above alluded to. Perhaps four hours is rather too long for a sitting, especially when we consider there are yet three full mornings and three long evening concerts to come. The attendance was larger by some 300 than is usual on the Tuesday morning (a good argument for continuing the same order at future meetings)—about 1,350 persons being present.

Wednesday.—The concert of Tuesday was a decided improvement in more respects than one on those generally given at these meetings. In the first place the length was not excessive, as it commenced at eight and would have terminated at eleven, but for the entrées in the second part. So much for the quantity. Next as to the quality, likewise praiseworthy, including, as it did, two works each equally great in its way, and sufficient to stamp the concert with the individuality of good music. We allude to Dr. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, heard for the first time at Worcester, and now fairly making the round of the provinces (it only remains for Hereford to follow the example of Gloucester the "fayre," and this the "faithfulle" city to complete the circle of the choirs), and Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, which occupied the post of honor, the opening of the second part. Mad. Clara Novello, as the heroine, Mr. Sims Reeves as the lover, Mr. Weiss, as Robin Hood, and Miss M. Wells as the Queen, one and all acquitted themselves to perfection; the chorus, too, was unusually good, and but for the orchestral accompaniment being far too loud throughout the entire execution, would have been entitled to unqualified praise. Of course for this the conductor is responsible, and it really was a pity to hear the voices of the principals all but drowned by the loudness of the instruments. We have so frequently eulogised this work that any further laudation would be superfluous, but it is sufficient to say that the intrinsic goodness of the music is such that the pleasure of the hearer is increased at each performance, a fact which never occurs with music of an inferior character, however attractive and catching it may have been at first hearing.

This being market day, the streets are crowded with farmers and dealers, their wives and daughters with butter, poultry, fruit, &c. and by their rustic garb and dialect contrasting with the throngs of elegantly dressed people who swarmed all over the town. About 1100 were present at this morning's performance in the cathedral, and certainly enjoyed a treat of the highest order,—for the execution of Spohr's Last Judgment was irreproachable from beginning to end. It was at first our intention to have specialised the most remarkable points, but we find upon consideration that so doing would involve a recapitulation of almost every piece from the overture to the final chorus, and so our readers must be content to learn that never perhaps has Spohr's masterpiece been heard to greater effect. The soloists were Mesdames Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, Mr. M. Smith, and Mr. Weiss, all of whom were in excellent voice, and sang with great artistic skill, Mr. Weiss especially distinguishing himself in the arduous bass part, the descriptive recitative describing the approach of the lost day being given most admirably. At the request of the Dean, who is supposed to preside in absence of the Bishop, the quartet "Blest are the departed," was repeated. The second part consisted of a selection of the most striking pieces from Judas Macabreus, comprising the choruses, "Mourn ye afflicted children," "O father whose Almighty power," "Dreadful of danger," "Fallen is the foe," "We never will bow down" and "Sing unto God." The whole of these were given with the greatest effect, hand and singers working with a will. To Mad. Clara Novello fell "Pious orgies" and "From mighty kings." To say that she sang these to perfection would be faint praise; and so marked an impression was produced by the latter that no one could help feeling gratified when the Dean got up and requested its repetition, with which Mad. Novello gracefully complied by again singing the second part. It made every one feel a regret that we are so soon to lose such a voice from among us, and that future festivals must look long and far before they again find any one conveying the sensations produced by those clear ringing bell-like notes. No less magnificent was Mr. Sims Reeves' delivery of the two airs set down for him, "Call forth thy powers" and "Sound an alarm," both equally well sung, but the latter absolutely electrifying the audience. Mr. Reeves was asked to repeat this, but wisely forbore from overtaxing his voice by a repetition of such a terrifically trying song. Of course all audible manifestations of applause are suppressed in a sacred building, but after such a display as those of Sims Reeves and Clara Novello, a subdued murmur seems to run round, and a thrill of delight is visible in the face of every one. Mad. Weiss achieved a most decided success in the air "O Liberty," and made many regret that the air "Wise men flattering," had not also been allotted to her. Mad. Sainton-Dolby had but little to do, but what she had was done well. Signor Belletti, who has been suffering from indisposition throughout the festival, was consequently unable to do himself justice in "Arm, arm, ye brave," or "The Lord worked wonders."

Thursday.—Our notice of last night's concert must necessarily be short; and as there was but one novelty in the evening (the greater part of the remainder of the programme being of an uninteresting character) our task is easy. The plot of Niels W. Gade's cantata, The Erl King's Daughter (first time of performance in England), is remarkably simple. A certain Sir Oluf, on the eve of his marriage, appears to have been taking a post-prandial ride "while twilight around was closing;" very unwisely he decides upon also taking a nap on the Elfin Hill, although his mamma has expressed her objection to his being "out" at night. The elfin maidens, no doubt gratified at the presence of such a distinguished guest, serenade him, and invite him to dance, while the Erl King's daughter tempts him by the offer of a silk waistcoat ("a silken vest it shall be thine"), a decided novelty in the way of attire, as the young lady's mamma, who must have been a laundress of original ideas, seems to have bleached it in "pale moonshine." Whether he accepts or declines the gift is not altogether clear; however, the lady "hurries him on," and having attained her wish ungratefully dismisses him with a prediction that he will die on the morrow. As she tells him to "ride home to his bride clad in robe of red," we conclude that in elfinland an extensive stock of ready-made gentlemen's apparel is kept on hand. Sir Oluf's mamma, who has been terribly distressed at his absence, welcomes him on his return, as does also a chorus of what we may suppose to be his tenants. Unfortunately for Sir Oluf, but fortunately for the public, the prediction is fulfilled, and the hero expires promptly; and so ends the cantata. An epilogue is tacked on very much in the shape of the "moral" to the celebrated pathetic legend, of "Villikins and his Dinah;" only instead of the advice being addressed to "All ye young maidens take warning and nor," it is "Knights who will on horseback ride" who are counselled to "stay not, like Oluf, in elfin grove with elfin maidens till morning."

Of the music we need say little more than that in parts it is invested with a certain graceful flowing melody, and that Mendelssohn has been the model the composer has sought to imitate. The execution was good, Mesdames Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, with Mr. Weiss as Sir Oluf, sustaining the principal parts. On the whole, however, it is not very interesting, lacking invention, and displaying a tendency, especially in the melodramatic part of the story, to run into commonplace. The audience were not very enthusiastic at its termination; but that says nothing, as enthusiasm does not appear to be an attribute of the Worcesters.

This morning the Elijah has been given with enormous success. The same remarks that we applied to the Last Judgment will serve equally well with reference to the performance of Mendelssohn's masterpiece, which has seldom been heard to greater perfection. Mr. Weiss sustained the whole of the arduous part of the Prophet, and well as he sings upon most occasions, was never heard to greater advantage than on this day—his voice being in excellent order, and his delivery throughout being unexceptionable. He certainly has taken his revenge for the treatment received at the last Gloucester Festival, and at future meetings, we can hardly imagine the conductors entrusting the part of Elijah to any other than Mr. Weiss. Of course, Mad. Clara Novello took the first soprano music, her fine voice producing the usual effect, especially in the duet with the Prophet, and "Hear ye Israel." Mr. Montem Smith sang the tenor part in the first, Mr. Sims Reeves in the second division, "Then shall the righteous" being magnificently declaimed. Mesdames Weiss and Sainton-Dolby were equally praiseworthy, and touchingly as the latter lady sang "O rest in the Lord," we are glad that its repetition was not requested "by authority," as was the case with the trio, "Lift thine eyes." We have protested so frequently and unavailingly against this barbarism (for it is nothing less, to destroy the chain of harmony in such a manner), that we fear until every one shall know the Elijah thoroughly there will be no chance of correcting such an egregious want of taste.—London Musical World, Sept. 15.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT THE OPERA IN PHILADELPHIA.—A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser furnishes the following account of the visit of the Prince and suite to the Philadelphia Academy of Music on Wednesday evening of last week.

The beauty of Philadelphia was present; for a more charming gathering of the fair sex could scarcely anywhere else be found, so great was the number of "handsome faces." When the full blaze of the grand chandelier was turned upon the crowded house, nothing could have been finer.

At a quarter past eight the royal party entered the box, and as the Prince advanced to the front, the lights were raised to their fullest extent, and the whole audience clapped their hands in his honor. The curtain was then raised, discovering the whole corps of artists, and the orchestra played the first few notes of "God save the Queen," at which the audience rose en masse, and remained standing during the singing of the Anthem. La Petite Patti sang the first verse in a very fine manner.

Carl Formes delivered the voice composed in honor of the Prince's visit, and the full chorus sang the last. The curtain descended amid great applause. The royal party had remained standing during the whole time; Lord Lyons in the centre, having the Prince on his left, and the Duke of Newcastle on his right; the remainder scattered around the box. They now took their seats in the following order: The front of the box was occupied by the Prince, Lord Lyons, Earl St. Germain and the Duke. Behind the Duke was General Bruce, behind the Prince Mayor Henry, and between the two Mr. Kortright, the consul.

During the playing of Hail Columbia and the overture to Martha, the Prince perceptibly colored painfully several times, doubtless from being the object upon which a large number of "double-barreled glasses" were leveled. However, during the performance of the opera, he often cast side looks upon the ladies through his lorgnette. In the last scene of the first act of Martha, the Prince enjoyed heartily the boxing match between Plunkett (Carl Formes) and Sir Tristram (Sig. Barilli), which was carried out in true John Bull style.

When Martha (Patti) sang the gem of the opera in Italian, she was so rapturously applauded that she repeated the melody to the English words of Tom Moore's beautiful composition which caused still greater applause by both Prince and people.

"Tis the last rose of Summer,"

Brignoli, as Lionel, was also applauded in the beautiful tenor aria in the third act, "M'appari tutt' amor," which he repeated.

At the conclusion of the opera the artists were called before the curtain, and bowing to the audience and to the Prince, retired amid loud applause.

The Music of the Day.

The music for the day, just now, is all in the streets, guiding the march of torchlight processions of all parties, in turn, and the midnight air resounds with the cheerful sounds of innumerable full bands, and the incessant roll of drums, while the blazing torches and ringing cheers for the different favorites of the day, give to our quiet streets an unwonted life.

Gilmore's Band gave a benefit concert to Ralph W. Farnham, the venerable survivor of the battle of Bunker Hill, here among us alone of all his companions on that day at the age of one hundred and five. The Tremont Temple was crowded, and doubtless the concert was a substantial benefit to the old soldier. Long may he live!

In curious contrast to this are the preparations in progress as we write, to welcome to our city the Heir Apparent of the Throne of England, ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, not the least pleasant part of which we think, to H. R. H., will be the greeting of the children of the Public Schools in the Music Hall. This is to be a musical ovation, similar in character to the recent Annual Festival of the Schools, the arrangements of the hall and the programme, being about the same. We heard the rehearsal of the music, and anticipate a complete success.

The heart of a Prince must be more insensible than that of the average of humanity that can fail to be stirred "as by the sound of a trumpet," and touched to its very core by the singing of the noble and beautiful words written for this occasion by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, to the music of the glorious anthem of Old England, sung with the enthusiasm kindled in the twelve hundred youthful hearts of the singers, by the unwonted stimulus of the Royal presence, and the universal spirit of good will and cordiality that pervades this whole people, on this occasion without a parallel in our history. Good will, good wishes and a cordial welcome to the Heir of England are in every heart and on every tongue, and the abundant tokens of this feeling on every hand, must amply atone for any occasional annoyances, and for the constant fatigue of a progress like that of the Prince through this country. True Republicanism loses nothing of its self respect in these honors, so gladly paid to the English Prince and through him to the great Free People, and the good and gracious Queen whom he represents, and there are few who cannot heartily join in the prayer, GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 15.—We are promised this winter six classical soirées by Mr. WOLFSOHN assisted by Mr. THOMAS and many other fine players. The programme will show the kind of music our people are gradually becoming admirers of, and if

Mr. Wolfsohn plays as well this winter as he did last, and there is every reason to believe that he will execute much better, we have a rare treat in store for us. The subscription list is rapidly filling up. The following is the programme of the first soirée:

1. Quatuor (D minor.—String instruments). . . . . Haydn
2. Solo Piano (Andante splanato—Polonaise, E flat major) . . . . . Chopin
3. Solo Violin (Tamtelle). . . . . Schubert
4. Sonate, Piano and Violoncello (Andante—Allegro Finale) . . . . . Mendelssohn
5. Quatuor, Piano and String Instruments (E flat major) . . . . . Schumann

Musical Miscellany.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Orpheus Glee-Club, or, as their official title runs, the Orpheus Musical Association, have in active preparation a musical novelty, which they intend to bring out this season. It is an opera-travesty in two acts, entitled "The Bards," by Julius Frondenthal, Kapellmeister to the Duke of Braunschweig. As the title signifies, music and text are a take off, a travesty, on the modern, especially the Italian opera. And we may add, after hearing one rehearsal, it is a capital hit. Burton's Po-ca-hon-tas is a mere trifle in comparison. The libretto has the additional merit of being a temperance story.

The dramatis personæ of the male sex appear in the costume of the priests of Norma, the heroine, Freia, (being the name of the wife of Wuotan), the chief god of the ancient Germans, is attired in the garb of Norma. The scene is laid in a dense forest. The child of Freia—Norma and a stranger from Berlin, who answers to the euphonious name of Piefke is a youth of light complexion, attired as a boy. The part of Freia is sung by a baritone.

The object of the society of Bards is stated by their chief in a very emphatic melodrama as follows:

The society of Bards is founded on an oath that is binding, always to carry the bottle, but never to empty it. It is further stated that any transgressor is at once to be "butchered." The chief of bards, who is unsuccessfully trying to make love to Freia, discovers her in a loving interview with the stranger, yclept Piefke, a poet, who appears to have been a tailor, Freia herself being at that time servant girl at the tavern called the Pinetree. They do not disguise the fact that they have been married clandestinely, the fruit of their union being the long-legged individual of a light complexion who rejoices in the name of Fritzchen, and is believed to be four years of age. In his wrath the chief of Bards is going to have them "butchered," when a savior appears in the person of the second chief, who is discovered to be an uncle to Piefke, having been a cobbler before. He and the chief having privately enjoyed the forbidden drink of ardent liquor, he advises Piefke to accuse the chief of this crime in public convention, which he does just as he and Freia are going to be "butchered." This plot succeeds, not, however, without burying the second chief together with the first under the ruins of their offices, whereupon Piefke is made chief, much against his will.

This is a meagre outline of the plot, which we may translate, if time and opportunity serve us. The music abounds in "first-rate airs and choruses," and we have not the least doubt, that the opera will take vastly. There is capital fun throughout the whole piece, which may prove a very pleasant diversion after the excitement of the present political campaign.

SCH.

NIEMANN, the great German tenor, who has been engaged for the performances of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" in Paris, as the best representative of the principal character in this opera, has lately been performing in Leipsic. The Signale says of him:

"With a magnificent voice and an imposing person there is coupled a demoniacal element by which, in his personifications of dramatic characters he is so intensely effective; truly demoniacal is then, too, the sound of his voice. His best part is "Tannhäuser." In the contest of the minstrels at Wartburg, and in the scenes of the third act, his performance is truly great. Niemann is the proper man for this character. Most of our tenors, sweet creatures, sing their story of the Venus mountain, as if they had with much pain committed it to memory. But when Niemann sings it he makes you shudder all over. It is no longer Niemann; it is Tannhäuser himself, glowing in the memory of his past revels. You feel that a mysterious power urges him on to reveal more and more, till at last the fatal confession is wrung from his lips, 'I have shared in hell's bacchanals.' The dénouement in the third act is given with painful truth, and here, where most singers are tried, his voice seems to be more telling than ever."

THE OPERA.—The "season" which will to-night close at the Academy of Music has been neither brilliant nor successful. Commencing, on the 3d of September, with an inordinate blast from the trumpet of the management, it has comprised (or will have comprised, if no change in to-night's performance is made) twenty-four performances. "La Traviata" has been four times sung; the "Sicilian Vespers," three times; "Il Trovatore," "La Sonnambula," "Linda di Chamounix" and "Don Giovanni," twice each; "Lucrezia Borgia," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Robert Le Diable," "Nabucco," "Martha," "Norma," "Il Barbiere," "Il Poltuto," and "I Puritani," once each.

There have been one postponement, several substitutions "at a moment's notice," changes and conflicting announcements almost innumerable. The audiences have been small, except only on one occasion, and a listless air has been their prevailing characteristic.

All will admit that the out door tendencies of the American populace in the great quadrennial campaign seriously interfere with the pecuniary good fortune of an operatic enterprise. In the case now under consideration however, there are other causes—causes not independent of the management—which could produce more disastrous failures than this which has crowned the season now to close. The first and most unpardonable of these is the unblushing want of good faith shown by the management to the public. While we have been taught by experience that the glowing promises of the advertisement preliminary are liable to fade before they are fulfilled, we still hope to see at least some resemblance between the two. When a series of new works is announced, we do not find ourselves fully gratified, or strongly drawn to the theatre by seeing daily upon our walls the names of the threadbare operas, whose every note we know, and whose melodies have even passed away from the hand-organs of the street. It is, nevertheless, possible that we determine to renew the pleasure of years long past by going to hear one of these old friends; we shall not bless the management, nor shall we be in haste to go again, when arriving at the Academy vestibule, we discover that sudden indisposition has seized some meritorious singer—it never attacks any other—and that our pet aversion is to take the rôle thus left empty, or that an opera the thought of which makes us yawn, is substituted.

Another cause which ever leads and always should lead to failure, is found in the monstrous improbabilities, the contemptible shabbiness, of the operatic stage itself. No inconsiderable latitude must always be allowed to the scenic department and wardrobe attached to any dramatic establishment. Much that would be beyond expression ridiculous in real life has merely an attractive brilliancy when exhibited in front of the footlights.—N. Y. Tribune.

HEARING IN LARGE CHURCHES.—This is now made as easy as in the smallest by the success of an experiment just completed in Trinity Church, in this city. It consists of a paraboloidal reflector of sound placed at the back of the pulpit, of which the speaker's mouth is the focus. A beam of sound about ten feet in diameter is thus thrown to the most remote point of the church, and by its side-flow fills the whole body of the building. All great public buildings, whether for singing or speaking, may have a similar arrangement adapted to their use. It is particularly suitable for legislative halls, as it works both ways. A person standing at the farthest door in Trinity Church can carry on a conversation, with one in the pulpit in the lowest tones, even in a whisper. Any person well acquainted with the higher mathematics, and accustomed to make constructions in architecture, engineering or machinery, is competent to superintend such an erection. The one in Trinity Church was put up under the supervision of Professor HACKLEY, of Columbia College, in this city.—N. Y. Evening Post.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Evening Bulletin prints the farewell card of the opera managers in that city, and appends the following comments. The same thing is true there that was true in New York and true in Boston, and it is not the political campaign alone that should account for the operatic failure.

This is a very neat way of disposing of the matter before the public; but it is not imperatively demanded that the story should be believed. In fact, it is growing into a proverb, that cards of opera managers are not to be believed. In September, a very flourishing announcement was made, containing promises most of which were broken. The same thing has happened repeatedly before, and will happen repeatedly again, unless managers learn from the public that such things will not succeed. They must be taught by experience that the people of Philadelphia, New York and Boston, will not sustain operatic enterprises undertaken without any serious intention of keeping faith with the public.

The history of the operatic campaign of this fall is a brief one and easily told. It began in New York, where a great array of artists was announced and many new operas were promised. But the new artists did not appear, nor were the new operas given. The season was a disastrous failure, every performance being before an audience small in numbers, a large proportion, also, being "dead-heads." There was a quarrel between the managers and some of their principal artists about salaries, like the quarrel of yesterday, and they seceded and set up a rival opera. In Philadelphia, in September, the same flourishing announcement was made, and there was the same failure to keep the promises made to the public; of course, poor audiences were the consequence. A new season was promised, beginning on the visit of the Prince of Wales. The managers made a large amount of money by that single performance, and now comes the old complaint of the artists, that they have not been paid, and there is a complete breaking up of the company.

The managers pretend that the election excitement prevents the public from taking any interest in the performances. But this is not the case. If the entertainments were good, novel and varied; if every thing was done that was promised, and if there were but three or four operas in a week, instead of six, the attendance would be larger, and the profits good. The election would not interfere to any serious extent. As at present managed, operatic entertainments do wrong in many directions. So little can the promises of managers be relied on, that artists will not engage to come to America, except at enormous salaries, as they feel assured that they will not be paid in full, and they hope to secure in one month enough to pay their expenses for six, counting on losing the pay promised for the remaining five months. On account of the same loose regard for truth, the public will not go to the opera, knowing that things will not be done as well as promised. The artists and the public are both wronged, and all array themselves against the managers. The public journals, on which success depends, are also wronged; for they are made the agents through which the public is deceived; the managers continually getting them to announce and promise great things, which are generally not performed. In this way there is a sort of quadrilateral irrepressible conflict, between the managers, the artists, the public and the press, in the midst of which the opera is broken down.

A RICH SCENE AT A PORTLAND THEATRE.—The Portland Argus states that during the performance of the Octoroon at the theatre in that city, last Wednesday afternoon, in the scene where Zoe is about to take poison, Mr. Nathan Winslow (a wealthy resident of Portland, and very rabid in his anti-slavery views,) astonished both audience and actors by rushing upon the stage and seizing Zoe, (Miss Kimberly,) shouting out in a highly excited manner: "Hold, Zoe,—don't take it! I command the underground railroad. Fly! fly with me and you are safe. Come to Canada to the possessions of Queen Victoria, and you will be free! free! FREE!" Manager Macfarland soon set things to rights and the excited gentleman left the stage. In addition to the foregoing we learn that this was Mr. Winslow's first visit to a theatre. The character of the piece drew him thither, and his active abolition sympathies led him to make this ludicrous "first appearance on any stage."

OCTOBER.

Av, thou art welcome, Heaven's delicious breath,
When woods begin to wear the crimson leaf,
And suns grow mild, and the meek days grow brief,
And the year smiles as it draws near its death.
Wind of the sunny South, O, still delay,
In the gay woods and in the golden air,
Like a good old age released from care,
Journeying in long serenity away.
In such a bright, late quiet would that I Might wear out life like thee, 'mid bower and brooks,
And, dearer yet, the sunshine of kind looks,
And murmur of kind voices ever nigh;
And when my last sand twinkled in the glass,
Pass silently from men as thou dost pass.

A SONG WRITER.—Henry Carey was a man of genius. He wrote for the theatre with immediate and lasting success. Next he handled satire; and Pope took his verses for Swift's, and Swift for Pope's. Lastly he settled down to lyrical art; with a rare combination of two rare talents he invented immortal melodies and the immortal words to them: inter alia, he wrote the words and music of "Sally in our Alley," and the words and melody of the national anthem. For this last he deserved a pension and a niche in Westminster Abbey.

In a loose age he wrote chastely. He never failed to hit the public. He was of his age, yet immortal. No artist can be more.

But there was no copyright in songs. Mark the consequence of that gap in law! While the theatres and the streets rang with his lines and tunes, while the fiddlers fiddled him and were paid, and the songsters sang him and were richly paid, the genius that set all those empty music pipes a-flowing, and a million ears listening with rapture, was fleeced to the bone. All shook the fruit tree except the planter. All reaped the corn except the sower. For why? The sower was an author; an inventor. And so, in the midst of successes that enriched others and left him bare, in the midst of the poor unselfish soul's attempts to found a charity for distressed performers, nature suddenly broke down under the double agony of a heart full of wrongs and an empty belly, and the man hanged himself.

They found him cold, with skin on his bones, and a half-penny in his pocket.

Think of this when next you hear "God save the Queen."—Charles Reade.

A new Oratorio, entitled Praise to God, composed by Geo. F. Bristow, Esq., has just been put in rehearsal by the Harmonic Society, who will produce it within a few weeks. This work deserves more than a passing notice, as it is worthy of great credit to the composer, not only, but to the art in this country. Mr. Bristow is an American by birth, and when quite young, exhibited a remarkable musical ability. His father being an accomplished professor, gave him a thorough education in every branch of the art. His first classical composition which attracted attention, was a symphony first brought out by the Philharmonic Society of this city, a society which never take up new compositions unless they are of great merit; since which, Mr. Bristow has composed several others, all of which have received high commendations from musical critics and the public. Julien, when in this country, was so much pleased with these symphonies that he took, I think, two with him on his return to Europe and brought them out in London, and also engaged Mr. Bristow to write others for his Orchestra. His opera of Rip Van Winkle, which had such a run at the time it was brought out by the Pyne and Harrison troupe a few years since at Niblos, established his reputation in that department. The oratorio just published, as a classical composition, will compare favorably with many of the works of the old masters. While it combines all that may be said to belong to the old school which is considered essential in a classical work, it is sufficiently modern in style, and adaptation to the libretto, to please all who can appreciate the higher order of music. The orchestral accompaniments show the perfect comprehension of the composer of the best effects which can be produced by the various instruments.—N. Y. Corr. Georgia Telegraph.

Song is the tone of feeling. Like poetry, the language of feeling, art should regulate, and perhaps temper and modify it. But whenever such a modification is introduced as destroys the predominance of the feeling—which yet happens in ninety-nine settings out of a hundred, and with nine hundred and ninety-nine taught singers out of a thousand—the essence is sacrificed to what should be the accident; and we get notes, but no song. If song, however, be the tone of feeling, what is beautiful [singing]? The balance of feeling, not the absence of it.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson &amp; Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Kindly remember the loved ones. D. B. Worley 25
A very pleasing song of medium difficulty.There is a fountain filled with blood. Quartet and Chorus. J. L. Ensign. 35

A most excellent short piece for large choirs. It may be sung quite effectively, though, by a choir of eight. There is a lack of such pieces, and those interested should encourage authors in their production by liberally using the few that are offered.

Song of the Spanish Orange girl. (La Naranjera.) Scotchdopole. 30

Madame Gasmaniga's celebrated song with the original Spanish words and a fine English version. Prima Donnas will please take notice.

Nellie Brown. Song and Chorus. Bishop. 25

A new plantation melody, which will become a favorite with serenaders.

Instrumental Music.

The maiden's prayer. Four hands. Arranged by T. Bissell. 35

This well-known piece will be liked all the better in this new dress. It has gained in fullness and brilliancy, and the task of performing it distributed among two players lessens the difficulty of each part considerably.

Wauregan Quickstep. J. W. Lewis. 25String of Pearls Waltz. H. von Benzon. 25March d'Amore. R. R. Trench. 25

Will be welcomed by young players as charming recreative pieces between their more serious studies.

Immortellen Waltzes. Four hds. Jos. Gungl. 75

Among musicians this set of waltzes composed in memory of Johann Strauss, the "Waltz king," is generally considered the best of the author. Certainly these waltzes when performed by two good players make as stirring a piece of dance-music as there is.

General Garibaldi's Quickstep. C. H. Loehr. 25

OLIVER'S COLLECTION OF HYMN AND PSALM TUNES, SENTENCES, ANTHEMS, AND CHANTS. A National Lyre, for the use of the Church, the Family or the Singing School. By Henry K. Oliver. 75

Few if any volumes of church music have been published of late possessing the merit of this work. The contents are selected and original, of the latter, much never before in print, the result of the compiler's labors in hours not occupied by his ordinary avocations. He has ventured to attempt the work, encouraged by long experience in the musical services of the church, and by the favor with which some of his own compositions have been received. Many admirable tunes are comprised in the work, which have been almost wholly ignored in the collections of the last thirty years, yet which really possess the highest merit. There are other compositions more suitable for Home and School use. In the selection of Anthems and Sentences, a leading object has been to combine novelty, variety and brevity.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Gone.

BY ROSE TERRY.

A silent, odor-laden air,
From heavy branches dropping balm;
A crowd of daisies, milky fair,
That sunward turn their faces calm,
So rapt, a bird alone may dare
To stir their rapture with its psalm.

So falls the perfect day of June,
To moonlit eve from dewy dawn;
With light winds rustling through the noon,
And conscious roses half withdrawn
In blushing buds, that wake too soon,
And flaunt their hearts on every lawn.

The wide content of summer's bloom,
The peaceful glory of its prime,—
Yet over all a brooding gloom,
A desolation born of time,
As distant storm-caps tower and loom
And shroud the sun with heights sublime.

For they are vanished from the trees,
And vanished from the thronging flowers,
Whose tender tones thrilled every breeze,
And sped with mirth the flying hours;
No form nor shape my sad eye sees,
No faithful spirit haunts these bowers.

Alone, alone, in sun or dew!
One fled to heaven, of earth afraid;
And one to earth, with eyes untrue
And lips of faltering passion, strayed:
Nor shall the strenuous years renew
On any bough those leaves that fade.

Long summer-days shall come and go,—
No summer brings the dead again;
I listen to that voice's flow,
And ache at heart, with deepening pain;
And one fair face no more I know,
Still living sweet, but sweet in vain.

The Diarist Abroad.

ВОНН, Sept. 1860.

It was quite a triumph for our side. You must know, that some half dozen young men, instructors in a sort of high school or teacher's seminary not far away, had come to Horecker's to spend the night, on their way to Brühl, where the next day was to be a musical festival of the common school teachers of this region. One of them being the music teacher of the institution, we soon fell into a conversation upon the modes and amount of musical instruction imparted in the common schools, i. e., in the schools of the peasant villages, so thickly scattered here in the Rhine valley, and so fully peopled.

The result—a result which they confirmed in so many words, when I announced it—was, that the musical instruction in all those schools is confined to the teaching by rote of loyal songs and church chorals, with (in catholic schools) more or less pieces of a higher character, suitable to public worship. There is absolutely no effort—according to these gentlemen—to impart a knowledge of reading music, and it may be asserted as a general fact, that no child leaves school with more knowledge of musical notation than he brought thither half a dozen years before. They do acquire sometimes a remarkable power of learning pieces by rote, just as men who cannot read can often astonish us by the accuracy with which they will repeat a speech or a sermon.

But what are the grounds of confining music to this mere exercise of the memory in learning by rote? To this the reply was, there was not time to devote to anything farther, (as though one or two hours a week for years is not sufficient to teach reading simple music!); that if there was time, it would be useless to try (!); that peasants need not know anything farther of music; and that the Government will not allow it! Then I dilated upon our New England system of teaching notation, as perfected by Dr. Mason and others, which they did not seem to understand very well however, and expatiated upon what Lincoln makes his boys and girls do, as described to me by one of the Cambridge school committee, which they could hardly comprehend as being possible, and at which they expressed a hearty astonishment.

And this was the triumph of our side.

Next morning I went with them to Brühl.

Clemens August, Elector of Cologne, 1724–1761, was a great builder of palaces. One large one on the plain some half dozen miles south-west of Cologne was named Augustenberg, but is now known as the Prussian royal palace at Brühl. As the old Electors were at the same time Archbishops, it was natural enough that with their palaces should be joined the necessary buildings to accommodate any desirable number of ecclesiastics. Hence back of the palace extends a long range of building, once a monastery with its chapel, now a teachers' seminary.

Herr M. Toepler is the instructor in music. He is learned in ancient Catholic church music, and has now for many years devoted himself to its resuscitation, to its rejuvenescence, so to speak. Under his auspices the school teachers of the neighboring villages—none but men teach school here—have formed an Association and meet once a year for a musical festival. For these meetings Toepler prepares the music some months beforehand and distributes it among the members who learn it themselves and drill it into the heads of such of their schoolchildren as are able to learn it. When the time of the festival approaches a general rehearsal or two is sufficient.

This year the programme was, divine service with a musical mass in the forenoon, and, in the afternoon, a dinner followed by songs in one or more parts for men's voices. At the mass besides the regular Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, &c., some half dozen pieces, among them a Magnificat, were sung during or at the close of the service.

The sacred music consisted of selections from old Latin choral masses, arranged by Toepler for mixed chorus or for men's voices—mostly for the former, and was sung without accompaniment.

I was very curious to see the singers, and at eleven o'clock was gratified. Imagine the end of the church under the organ railed off, the floor covered with a platform raised three feet, perhaps, and here some two hundred children collected, boys and girls, each with his or her part in the hand. Imagine these children just such as you have so often seen in our cities, progeny of the "finest pisantry in the wur-ld," or of just landed "Dutch." Little redheads, whiteheads, scrubheads, all sorts of heads—but scrubbed up, and made neat for the occasion. Peasant children out and out; and these are the sopranos and altos for the music of the mass which I held in my hand! Moreover, if my last evening friends are to be believed, not one of them can read music, and must all learn this by rote! But there they stood and besides them the platform had only men and youth, tenors and basses, in due number the proper balance of parts. There they stood, not interesting, not even interested looking children. Their want of animation was to me striking—how different from home! And they will sing all this music; and there will be no confusion, no lapses, no breakdown? We shall see.

Toepler takes his place in the middle of the crowd, motions "attention!"; the priest at the altar intones the first words of the service, and the chorus falls in,

The image shows a musical score for a Kyrie. It includes four staves labeled SOP. (Soprano), ALT. (Alto), TEN. (Tenor), and BASS. The lyrics are written below the staves: "Ky-ri-e e-lei-son, Ky-ri-e e-lei-son, e-lei-son." The notation is in a simple, early 19th-century style with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat.

Here are eleven only of the 63 measures of the Kyrie: not difficult music, it is true, but sung by these children, and so sung, it was striking.

The difficulties arising from the rhythm, change of key, &c., of course do not show themselves in the first few measures, and I copy them only to give an idea of the sort of music in which these little peasants were entrusted with the soprano and alto, with no assistance from organ or other instrument.

Other pieces were more difficult. For instance, the short Sanctus, beginning thus:

The Agnus Dei was in three short movements; first, two tenors and two basses; secondly, soprano and two altos; third, soprano, alto, tenor and bass; the effect is very pleasing.

Just before the sermon the hymn "Komm heiliger Geist" (Come Holy Spirit) was sung; the melody was an old Cantus firmus from the 15th century, taken by the children, with an accompaniment of alto, two tenors and a bass (vocal) in the old contrapuntal style. Indeed this arrangement was made more than 250 years ago. This was not difficult for the children as they had merely to carry in slow, steady time the old choral melody.

I have had occasion often enough to write upon the great perfection to which boy choirs are brought in Europe, and your own boys at the Advent church in Boston have proved how much can be made of such voices by care and adequate instruction. It was not, therefore, that children at this festival sang as they did, which filled me with astonishment, but that such children, little peasants from peasant villages.

This was a triumph for their side.

I came down to Brühl intending to take a ticket for the festival dinner and hear the music for men's voices, but when the time came I was so ill as to be forced to forego that pleasure. Others who were present assure me that I lost a great enjoyment. I can readily believe it, for the pieces sung during the service in the church by the chorus of men were exceedingly well given.

Besides the music I had another gratification this day, for in the church opportunity was given to see and wonder at that grandest and most-elevating-to-the-beholder work of God,

A GREAT MAN.

I saw him standing in the crowd, against the iron railing leaned, all undistinguished from the mass, save through his own greatness, and this was hidden as under a bushel until my attention was called especially to him.

Now, I have looked in my day and generation upon divers whom the world by universal consent names great; with some of them have even spoken, and trust that I can judge of greatness; can feel its presence, as one much in society feels the presence of purity and refinement. Shall it be in vain that one has looked upon Webster, Clay and Calhoun, Story, Shaw and McLean, Humboldt, Rose and Ritter, Agassiz, Pierce and Henry, Grimm, Welcker and Boeckh, Allston and Rauch? Nay, I trow not. Not to speak of men of a younger generation, whose names will yet stand grandly in history.

Paint upon your mental canvass a man of forty odd years; the head covered and adorned by a profusion of crispy locks, of the color politely called auburn; the forehead —

There are two sorts of fine foreheads. The one figures extensively in Bulwer's novels; "broad expanse of forehead," "lofty polished forehead of vast width and height," "dome of thought with protuberant brow and three perpendicular lines between the eyes, indicative of thought," "the lofty dome of polished marble," and so on. They say Bulwer's own head has nothing striking about it; I am inclined to believe it, for I have observed that imaginative writers make the most of that which they have not, but wish they had. The dweller in garrets, who earns his salt by attic salt, makes his characters revel in all the luxury of wealth; he, who dares not say his soul is his own, draws pictures of moral and physical heroes, to whom Achilles was a fool; and your humble servant, who is as fidgety as quicksilver, intends in that romance to give you a hero, calm and serene as a summer sea-gull, floating sublime in the blue empyrean and gazing downward into the mysterious depths of old ocean for fish.

The forehead of the other class is neither strikingly high nor broad; but one sees in it the expression of concentrated energy and immense power of subtle thought. The first mathematical and the first philosophical thinker in America have foreheads of this class. So had the Great Man, barring the energy and thinking power. His face was, upon the whole, not remarkable; perhaps it would have been more so, but for his beard, which, of a decided "auburn," was entire, save for a shaven stripe which meandered about his chin, as we sometimes see in pleasure grounds a ring of stagnant water encircling a bushy islet.

In truth he was not one of those rare individuals, godlike in person, whose presence one seems to feel, before whom one involuntarily bows and whose greatness we instinctively acknowledge. Indeed, it was some time before I noticed him, and began to feel that he was a great man. You will have already perceived that not his looks gave evidence of his greatness, although you must not think him like the chiefest of the Apostles, in personal appearance weak and in speech contemptible. When, however, attention was once called to him, then indeed he became the object of observation and the subject of speculation.

That the Great Man was an Englishman — nay, more, one of those Scotch-Irish Englishmen born within sound of Bow-bells, so often to be met with on the continent, and who compliment us Americans with the assurance that we "spake English varry weel" — this I determined at a glance. But who could he be? Brougham, Lyndhurst, Palmerston, Russell, are all too old; moreover, Parliament was in session, the period of bird shooting not having arrived. Macaulay was dead. D'Israeli's face is Jewish, this man's not. Carlyle's portrait I had seen. No, this man was not one of those whose names have penetrated to all the corners of the round earth. With a sigh I left the question of his identity to that serviceable creature, Time, to determine.

That, which attracted my notice and filled me with a profound conviction that a Great Man was before me, was —

But wait a moment.

The difference and distance between very great men and very little men is very great. Little men are bound by and held to laws, customs, the usages of society, respect for the opinions and feelings of others; in short, by the rule "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," in so far as no sacrifice of principle is involved. The great man becomes a law unto himself.

Napoleon I. was a Great Man, a law unto himself; hence a republican New England divine has whitewashed him until his sins, though of scarlet, are white as snow. And now, the nephew, some say son, of his uncle, is he not a law unto himself? And are not his perfidy, treason, reckless ambition, perjury, murders, all washed white in the blood of his greatness? We see this, too, even in matters of art. Shakspeare could defy rules of grammar; Bach and Beethoven could write consecutive fifths.

You and I do not believe that during a certain ceremony a wafer of flour and water becomes the blood of one who died some two thousand years ago; nor can we, as matter of principle, take off our hats and fall upon our knees before it, any more than at the sound of harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music, we could fall down and worship the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar, the king, had set up. But we, being little men, when we enter a place where men do congregate to worship according to the dictates of their own consciences — be it a church, a synagogue, a mosque or a pagoda — feel bound so to demean ourselves as not to disturb the devotions of those, who, of another faith, engage in acts of worship in which we cannot join.

The principle holds good also for us, little men, in places where people come together for no higher object than amusement; to hear music, for instance. You and I may find it very good or very bad; whichever it be, there are always some who enjoy it. If it be too bad for us to hear, we quietly withdraw: if tolerable we sit quietly and speak not; for what right have we to destroy the pleasure of the man in the next seat, who has paid his perhaps hardly earned and ill spared money for what to him is satisfactory and enjoyable?

So that which attracted my notice and at length filled me with the profound conviction that a Great Man was before me, was —

But, not too fast.

Picture to yourself the chorus as above described, now all ready for the beginning of the service. A hush comes over the assembly, for the priest approaches the altar. He intones the introit, and the "Kyrie Eleison," Lord have mercy, streams sweetly and devotionally, from two hundred children's innocent voices, the tenors and basses falling grandly in and swelling out the full harmonies. In the hushed silence, broken only by those, now sweet now majestic, flowing tones, we, who believe not in all their dogmas, are touched sympathetically with their devotion and mentally join in the "Christe Eleison." We feel it to be an act of divine service and the place is sacred. Moreover, there is an influence in the music, which subdues us, and which, were the church a concert room, would hush us to silence — us, little men.

At this moment a voice talking and criticising the singers, subdued, it is true, but still distinctly audible, falls upon our ear. I gently "sshhd" as a hint or request for silence, not then noticing that a Great Man, a law unto himself, was there.

The hint was unheeded. Perhaps he did not hear it, or did not suppose it meant for him. So I repeated it more loudly. He still took no notice. Various were our efforts to bring him to silence during Kyrie, Gloria and Sanctus; but these efforts, the nervousness of men and women about him, whether worshippers or merely listeners, the sanctity of the place, the respect due to priest and choir—all were to him but as the idle wind—he heeded not. He stood there, following the choir in his printed score, and making his wise and weighty remarks to a favored individual or two with all the indifference and tranquility of a sleepy lion to the antics of the monkeys in a menagerie. The lion deigns not even a contemptuous glance to the monkeys. He vouchsafed us not a look, and I began to feel the greatness of the man. Once, during a pause, some one asked if there was no policeman present to keep order, and this word of fearful import hushed him for a time.

After the sermon, during which his conversation was doubtless as interesting as it was animated, like Cain I fled from his presence to the other side of the church. There I once had the satisfaction of seeing the Great Man's spectacles, with the eyes behind them, like two fine onions grown out of season under glass, turned upon me with that sublime and contemptuous indifference with which, in ancient times, a celestial cook in the Olympian kitchen of Jupiter Tonans may have looked through the golden evening atmosphere upon an eel, wriggling in the hands of Athenian fishwoman down at the Piræus.

I have a dim recollection that specimens of this kind of Great Man once existed in America, and at times made their appearance at oratorios and other musical performances.

Dear fellow-laborers in the field, whose letters have given me so many a half hour of enjoyment,—t—, Trovator, H. (of Hartford), Manrico, and the rest, not forgetting Stella, and him 'Out West,' who prefers the claim of two postage stamps for buttons,—please inform me when you next write upon some performances of fine music, whether any Great Men were there.

— (Some weeks later).

Did you ever experience the loss of a pet idea? a favorite thought? some notion, cherished until it had become a part of your thinking self? Have you ever been thus in a manner rendered mentally widowed and childless? Has your pet theory or hypothesis, say of the geology of the copper region, or of storms, or of the unity of the races, been dashed upon those terrible snags and rocks, facts? No wonder that you save the pieces and float along with them as well as you can, swimming or sinking as fate directs. It is nature, and the more worthless the theory, the more ridiculous the hypothesis, so much louder the outcry at its loss, so much greater the void it leaves.

Mrs. Pips has lost her son Bill.

"But, Mrs. P., your Bill was always feeble and liable any day to be taken from you."

Mrs. P. "I know it, but I loved him so much the better."

"Besides, Madam, he was a very bad, ill-natured, mischievous boy, whom nobody could love."

Mrs. P. "I know it, but I loved him so much the better."

"Moreover, Mrs. P., he was weak in his mind, and never could have taken care of himself."

Mrs. P. "I know it, but I loved him so much the better."

"He was a poor unfortunate creature in all respects, and it is a mercy that he has been taken from you to a world where &c., &c."

Mrs. P. "But I was not taken with him!"

Gentlemen and Ladies. Behold your humble servant. He has lost his pet idea. Look upon a mental Mrs. Pips.

Here follows how it came about.

For some weeks I had carried the thought of the Great Man with me; in the streets of Bonn, in my walks on the Rhine tow-path, or out to the hills and villages, down stairs to breakfast or dinner, up stairs to my chamber. It assumed, as you have seen, grand and important dimensions. It had become a pet idea. Now, a few evenings since, I sat at the long table in the dining room at Honecker's, listening to the deaf theological gentleman, who was giving me his memories of Schleiermacher, whose lectures he had heard in his youth. A rather lonely-looking, middle-aged couple, man and wife, sat farther down, towards the door, on the other side of the table as if awaiting visitors. At length they came; two or three gentleman and the Great Man! As the visitors seated themselves beside and opposite the visitees, the Great Man was brought into the very next chair to mine. Precious little do I now remember of the deaf theological gentleman's talk about Schleiermacher, at this juncture for the sudden presence of the Great Man had greatly disturbed my equanimity. How insignificant, how painfully little I felt!

As he took not the least notice of me, my normal condition, was, after a time, restored, and I was able again to follow with some reasonable degree of attention and apprehension the deaf theological gentleman's discourse upon Schleiermacher. You can decide whether I was desirous of knowing who the Great Man really was or not!

At the first convenient pause in the talk of the deaf theological gentleman, which had, until the Great Man entered, exceedingly interested me, I hurried into the large front "guest room."

"Who is that man sitting third on the left side of the table in the dining-room?"

Cassius did not know. One of the guests did.

Alas, for the pet idea! The Great Man was not a Great Man after all! He was not even an Englishman! Not even a Scotch-Irish cockney! He was the man who does the organ in a neighboring church; not religious enough to demean himself at divine service, not musical enough to listen to music in silence, and not gentleman enough to refrain from disturbing those who are both.

Johanna Kinkel's Eight Letters to a Friend

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAUERT, A. M.)

II.

It is, indeed, asking too much, to expect a music teacher to guide his pupil from the lowest step to the highest, while, in almost all other departments there is a special teacher preparing the pupil for the next teacher. The saying certainly holds good here that the most excellent professor is often the poorest schoolmaster.

We have, properly speaking, as yet no fit teachers for the preparatory steps. We possess all gradations of skilful and incompetent, conscientious and careless teachers, but hardly any that content themselves with bringing up their pupils to a certain degree of attainments, and leaving them then to a more accomplished master.

A composer who has abandoned himself, even for a little while, to his poetical dreams, cannot possibly transpose himself, as it were, into the mind of a beginner when the hour strikes. If he thoroughly pursues a happily conceived air, and the pupil enters the room with his studies, before the composer could write that air down, he is very apt to feel very much like slapping his pupil and throwing him out of his sanctum! The creative man actually hates the intruding beginner, and instruction without love is also without effect.

No particular musical gift is required to control children in their pieces as to the correct use of fingers; all that is needed is patience and conscientiousness. Many individuals assuming the avocation of a music teacher solely for their support without feeling the want of penetrating deeper into the spirit of music, might become highly useful members of the musical congregation, if they fulfilled their duty exactly within circumscribed limits. Instead of giving as early as possible, Beethoven as a prey to their pupils, they ought to employ the first years exclusively in developing the ear, the time and the fingers. From this elementary class, a pupil accomplished in his way, would step forth to be directed by a more accomplished teacher into a more spiritual sphere, without being incessantly impeded by the material obstacle of stiff fingers. To content himself with this modest task, is the duty of the teacher of the first step, and he is a good teacher only as far as he does not transgress it.

If a temple of art is to be built, architects are not first to pile up and cut the stones; they should leave this to the working men.

But as sometimes highly gifted musical individuals are, by circumstances, compelled to a subordinate activity in the kingdom of art, we will return to our theme.

It is a widely spread misunderstanding, to judge the skill of fingers only by the degree of their quickness, while this is much less required than the capacity of the fingers to render each degree of strength or softness of touch correspondingly.

The fourth finger (in the American fingering the third), is naturally the most uncontrollable. If it so happens that a particularly expressive note is assigned to it, this one is generally lost, unless it was betimes developed so as to equal the others in power. The well known exercise, in which the fourth (third) finger alone plays vigorously eighth notes, while the others must firmly keep down their notes, is as necessary to a performer, as is the exercise of a weak register-tone to the singer. Such exercises cannot be dispensed with at once, but they accompany us through the entire term of instruction. If the fourth finger is thus daily practiced but for a minute, it will soon be equal to the others.

The little finger stands, on account of its smallness, generally above the key board, when the others are sufficiently bent to press down the keys. We do not perceive this as much in the right hand, but a great inconvenience arises out of this habit for the left. The notes of the fundamental bass are assigned to the little finger: it is to represent the foundation on which rests the entire harmony, but it seldom fulfils its task. Even if the note is not completely missed, it is still weaker than the middle parts, while the bass ought rather to have a more vigorous "coloring."

But very few performers are conscious of this defect. They want to strike the bass-tone; they feel too, that the fifth (fourth) finger touches the key, but they do not observe, that it pressed the key only half-way down, and that this tone did not distinctly correspond. Ladies especially are subject to this important defect, because they are wont to follow up in thought the melody, and have no idea of the great importance of the fundamental bass. I have seen many a lady-performer playing a long piece with considerable skill, and—omitting for lines, the bass-notes without noticing it.

See to it, that your pupils (especially in full chords) keep the left hand always a little sideways toward the bass, so that the pressure increased in its heaviness is conducted towards the two weaker fingers. As to placing one finger above the other—a frequently occurring bad habit—there is a simple remedy against it. Just put to the place a small ring with a sharply edged stone, or tie around it a thread with a rough knot—and the other finger will soon remain in its correct position.

The Organ.*

TENTH STUDY—ON QUALITY OF TONE (timbre) AND ITS THREE PRINCIPAL CAUSES. FIRST PRINCIPAL CAUSE,—SCALE.

It is undoubtedly the duty of every pipe in the organ to give the sound of some one note of the gamut with the greatest possible perfection; but this one note may be given with equal perfection in an almost infinite variety of qualities of tone, and in as many different shades of the same. This one note may remain the same, without varying in the slightest degree as regards the pitch, in a hundred different pipes, but its special quality of tone may be different in every one of them. To take an example in illustration of this matter, in the works of two piano-makers whose works are everywhere most justly celebrated, Erard and Pleyel; how striking is the difference between the pianos of one and the other! The latter aims at giving to his instruments all those qualities of tone which are tender, delicate, and refined, though nervous; and in this the quality of his instruments approaches, generally speaking, more nearly of the two to that of the German and English makers. The first, on the contrary, gives to his pianos, both grand and cottage, a brilliancy, a roundness, and an elasticity of tone, which accompanies all the modifications of their sound without causing it to lose its chief characteristic—namely, roundness; and, what is not a little remarkable, from father to son, from uncle to nephew, the respective qualities of the two makers are perpetuated in such a way that, as we still find in the pianos by Pleyel a reflection of that grace and elegance which may be met with in the still musical, though now perhaps somewhat antiquated ideas of a composer of the same name, so we may find in the pianos of Peter Erard the vigorous, brilliant, and flexible organization of his great uncle Sebastian. With these two piano-makers the notes may be the same in each, the pitch may not vary; what is fa with one may be fa with the other, what is do, do; and yet, for all that, the do and fa of Pleyel are no more the do and fa of Erard, as regards quality of tone, than the do and fa of Erard are those of Pleyel. Any maker, any pianist, of even the most moderate experience in such matters, would detect at once the difference between the qualities of tone of both these makers.

Quality of tone, then, may be described as this or that particular shade out of those unnumbered shades which it is possible to give to one and the same note. Thus, a note or pipe of an organ may have this or that shade of tone—it may be delicate or cutting, sweet or tender, and still be the same note in the scale. For example, the note do of the scale may be given in any of these different quantities of tone in as many different organ-pipes, and still be the note do; for, without any change at all in the note, quality of tone may vary infinitely, and quality of tone alone.

This quality of tone depends mostly on three things—namely, on scale, form and material. Scale is not that which is usually understood by this word, but is the greater or less distance from one another of the sides of the pipes; in other words, scale is the same thing as the diameter of the pipe. The Germans call it measure, mesur. From this it may be seen that the very same note may be expressed by pipes of different diameters. There are also a great many varieties of scale or measure; but they may be all reduced to three principal ones, to the full scale, the fine scale, and the mean scale. The arithmetical proportion between three pipes made to sound the same note, but each in a different scale, is thus given by Dom Bedos:—"Let us take," he says, "a pipe, the height of which is six inches; if it is made to the fine scale, its diameter should be six lines; if made to the mean scale, and an open pipe, its diameter should be nine lines; and if to the full scale, and an open pipe, it should be twelve lines; if a stopped pipe, and made to this last scale, its diameter should be fourteen lines." This writer takes care to observe that these measures are not absolute, and allows to builders, as we should also do, considerable freedom in every case. He would also grant that, besides the fine scale, there is another, the very fine, and, in a word, that the scale of organ pipes varies according to their situation, the special duties they have to perform, and the effect they are intended to produce. "Thus," he says, "the do of four feet, which is the third do of a series of pipes, the longest of which is sixteen feet, should not be more than three inches in diameter; but that, if this do of four feet is intended to be itself the first of a series of pipes, and therefore the largest of them, then its diameter should be increased to three inches and a half." In fact, the comparative shrillness in the tone of the pipes of this series must be compensated for by the vigour of their sounds. Now the more the scale enlarges the size of a pipe, the greater does the vibrating column of air become which is gathered within its walls; the more the scale is narrowed, so much the more also is the sound resulting from it diminished, so much the more refined does it become in the quality of its tone.

Pipes of the full scale, which absorb a great quantity of wind, are suited to the largest organs only, to sound-boards only of the largest dimensions. These sounds ought to be at the very greatest degree of roundness and force. The very fine scale, on the contrary, is a luxury in the way of sound that a bare sufficiency of means alone does not admit of. It is that sort of quality which represents the delicate and rather meagre sounds of the viol, and which gives point to certain foundation open pipes, which are indispensable to the general body of organ tone in its more perfect state. Pipes of this quality of tone are, in matter of fact, put upon all the clariens in greater or less quantity, and with good reason, because of the effect of this kind of pipes, which is sweet, though penetrating, and very useful as an accompaniment to the voice.

Pipes of mean scale have generally more sweetness than delicacy as compared with the others, though they are not deficient either in a certain amount of brightness. Like everything else of a mixed character, they do not at all times take after the stock from which they first drew their origin. Thus deprived, as they are, of the strength and mellowness of pipes of the full scale, they partake of the infirmities of the fine scale, without possessing, at the same time, the delicacy, the refined and pleasing quality of tone, which is its distinguishing characteristic. In a large organ they are placed on the choir sound-board, or, when their number is very considerable, on some subordinate sound-board, for it is usual to place some series of them on each of the key-boards. Regard, however, must at all times be had to the place for which the organ is being built. In a small church, where a large number of pipes of full scale would be simply deafening, it would be found very useful to combine with a sufficient number of those, pipes of the mean, and even the fine scale; but within the walls of a vast cathedral, all the efforts of pipes, more especially of this last scale, would be utterly abortive and without effect. Pipes of both the mean and fine scale do certainly occupy a most necessary place in organ building, but they should not prevail in it to such a degree as is too often found to be the case in those sham organ schemes to which poor congregations, and other good but simple persons, are asked to put their names by dishonorable organ-builders.

Writers on this subject do not find it difficult to give some notions of comparison between scale and scale as long as the question is only about open flue pipes, because these pipes are for the most part made in the form of a cylinder, the apex of which is the same size in diameter as the base. But the pipes of reed-stops being conical in shape and wider above than below, their diameter and their length depend on one another, and it is not therefore easy to establish so exactly in their case an arithmetical proportion between one scale and the other. Nevertheless, Dom Bedos gives some measures by which the lengths of reed-pipes as compared with their diameters may be approximately determined, and these are the measures commonly in use amongst builders. Following him, then, they speak of a trumpet of 6 inches, of 5, or of 4 inches for the three scales of the trumpets, which corresponds in its notes with the do of eight feet in the open flue pipes. Dom Bedos himself gives three different measures for the scale of the trumpet, and says that the first measure or full scale should be five inches and nine lines; the second, or mean scale, should be four inches and nine lines; and the third, or fine scale, should be four inches and two lines.* This is a matter which it is important to study, and the comparison is one that should often be made, with the compass in the eye, if not in the hand, for the diameters and speaking lengths of the pipes for reed-stops are some of those many things on which dishonorable builders speculate with cruel impunity, making use of far too many pipes of fine and mean scale where they should place pipes of full scale, and this even in large churches, and without any regard to what may be the importance of the instrument which they are employed to build.

As regards organs for accompaniment only, commonly called choir organs, and, indeed, as regards great organs for small churches, this class of builders always find an excuse for their avarice in the smallness of the locality and the position of the organ; and hence, if possible, we intend to give a graduated table of the scale of one note as compared with another for each scale of the three kinds, and for every note of the key-board. By this means, on inspecting an organ, the eye, however little practised, will detect at once the scale which the builder has chosen as his starting point, and the greater or less exactness with which, in the same series of pipes, he has observed the proportions of one note to another throughout this scale so chosen. I say the proportions, and not the progression, for a strict logical progression would be the cause of such magnitude in the largest pipes made to the full scale, that it would not be possible either to find a place for them, or if such a place could be found, to supply them with a sufficient quantity of wind. But still there are proportions for the lowest bass pipes of the full scale, which are not the proportions for the corresponding pipes of the mean scale; as there is also a means by which the size of the lowest bass pipes of the mean scale may be distinguished from that of the lowest bass pipes of the fine scale. Where these proportions are not attended to, there is not only the difference between what the diameters really are, and what they ought to be, but there is also the very great difference between the quality of the sound in such pipes from what it really ought to be; a difference which amidst the general body of full-organ tone may possibly escape the notice of the ordinary unpractical hearer, but cannot escape that of either the inspector of the organ—if he knows his business—or of the builder himself, who cannot be supposed to be ignorant of such matters, or of the professed musician.

Supposing for a moment that there was no difference in the quality of the sounds produced by pipes of different scales, the builder would no doubt do most wisely in choosing for his standard the smallest scale of the three, as being for him the least expensive; but when he does so, well knowing that there is this difference, then he takes you in. Not only does he do so by taking metal from your pipes and money from your purse, but also by taking the soul out of your organ, in depriving it of all its most pure qualities of tone, and leaving it with such qualities only as are for the most part dull and veiled in the open flue pipes, thin and cutting and without body in the reed-pipes. Or, if your organ has not all these defects, it still has one which is no less intolerable than these, and that is, that it is not the organ as at first contracted for between the purchaser and the builder, an organ that is of such and such scale in all its parts, and consequently of such and such a quality of tone. When we consider, and we know it to be the fact, that a reed-pipe will speak just passably at three-fourths of that length which is necessary for it in order that it may produce its better tones, we shall more easily understand what the injustice is which is committed by a fraudulent builder, who thus murderously cuts off the heads of his pipes. To such an one of course the more perfect quality of tone in his pipes is as nothing, as long as he can reckon with any amount of certainty, either on the profit he is about to make out of you upon his instrument, or on the fact that it will be placed in a church where there is no lack of resonance, or, more than all, on the ignorance of those who are to hear it.

A few words only remain to be said on the relations between the scale and the length of the speaking part of the pipe. As a general rule, this latter may be diminished in proportion as the former is increased, and, vice versa, the length of the pipe may be increased if its diameter is very considerably diminished. Thus an open flue pipe of fine scale sounding the eight-foot do, ought certainly to be more than eight feet long, because the amount of air necessary for the production of this note will be very considerably diminished by the narrowness of the diameter of the pipe. But this increase in the length of a pipe is only found to be necessary in the very fine scale, when it is used as a starting point; in the fine and mean scales the pipe of eight feet is cut to the same length as the pipe which produces the same note in the full scale; and the reason of this is, that these three scales, fine, mean, and full, are calculated upon a sufficient quantity of vibrating air; with this only difference, that the fuller the scale of a pipe, the fuller also will be the tone produced by it. For it is clear that the full scale causing the air to vibrate in a greater space, and being provided with a vibrating apparatus in proportion to the size of this space, will produce much more powerful sounds than the other two.

To conclude: after having made these observations on the differences between the three chief scales, it would remain for us to consider the quality of tone in pipes which, owing to the directions taken by their sides, unite to themselves the characteristics now of one now of another scale, as is the case with some flue pipes, and the bodies of those trumpet pipes, which begin with being of fine scale, enlarge themselves gradually into full scale, and end oft with being no larger than the very fine scale. But this is less a question of diameter than of form, and as such it is more fitted to become the subject for another chapter.

* It will, of course, be born in mind that the French inches are rather longer than the English, and that the ligne is rather less than the English 16th. N. Tr.

Musical Culture.

I.

The complaint that good music is so little appreciated resounds like an echo from all quarters. At concerts, the higher the quality of the music to be performed, the smaller, we are sure to find the audience, so that musicians have come to consider concert-playing as the last resort for their subsistence, and many of them to prevent starvation, are obliged to waste their high acquisitions, their genius, their talents, in the unhealthy occupation of dance-fiddling at balls and parties, night after night. The Handel & Haydn society, Mendelssohn Quintette Club, Philharmonic Society, and similar institutions, are languishing for want of support; but when Negro minstrels, Oldfolks and Haymakers pitch their tents, they may count on full houses every time for weeks together. Our publishers, according to their own statements, make their money almost exclusively by music, frequently not worth the paper on which it is printed: and merely to save the reputation of their establishments, or to advance the cause of true art, they print the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other masters, at great sacrifices. They pay large sums to the manufacturers of that sort of fashionable pieces, which have as a theme an absolutely silly popular tune, dressed in picked up runs and stolen passages; but, if a respectable composer offers his work for publication, works formed after the best models, they shrug their shoulders, or subject him to the most humiliating terms. The result, then, is, that dabbling receives the prize, and true merit goes out empty. For the nobly striving artist, who disdains to cater for a corrupt taste, this is a bitter experience, one that paralyzes every effort and ultimately crushes out the last sign of talent or genius. But let no one believe that such a state exists only in Boston, in New York, or any other city of the United States; it is, with some difference the same in all countries, where music is practiced. Those who are in the habit of citing Germany as the Eldorado of music and musicians, are referred to an earlier number of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, where Gustav Bock, the experienced senior partner of the large music publishing house Ed. Bote & G. Bock, in a carefully prepared article, gives much valuable information relative to the trade. He there plainly states, and at the same time laments, what no one at all acquainted with the circumstances ever doubted, that the publishers in Germany must likewise rely for their existence on ephemeral productions, while the master works are printed chiefly to adorn the shelves, or to add glory to the establishment. Besides, the names of Hüntten, Czerny, Beyer, Oesten, H. Cramer, and of thousand other manufacturers, that figure prominently in the German music catalogues, fully confirm the above statement.

It may be objected that it always will and must be so, since human society is composed of individuals, whose gifts, tastes, knowledge and pursuits are widely different; so that, while some find true delight in what is pure and noble, others derive gratification from the rude and the vulgar. There is doubtless truth in this. But, why is it, that in literature for instance, things look quite different? Here, what is good is in most cases duly appreciated. Our lectures, unlike our concerts, are crowded, and crowded in proportion to the lecturer's ability; the ablest speakers command the fullest houses; high-toned periodicals, magazines, monthlies, etc., have subscribers sufficient to pay more than the expenses; good novels and poems, too, find ready purchasers. This looks more encouraging. The reason is that among the educated classes almost every man is capable of appreciating and enjoying a good lecture or book, while there are very few cultivated (musically) enough to find out, and delight in, the beauties of a fine piece of music; and yet there is in every house an instrument and frequently more than one player to it.

Now, if there is so much playing and yet so little genuine musical culture, we must arrive at the conclusion that the divine art, its nature, its power and destiny, have been grossly mistaken, perverted and turned to a wrong end. Facts proclaim it too loudly to doubt that music, as the common good of a cultivated community, has not yet risen above the first degrees. Let us examine for a moment a number of common amateur players and we shall find the greater part, though they have studied for many years, and under all sorts of teachers, wholly unacquainted with the highest productions of the art; they know nothing of the existence of these works, still less of their beauties, their purport, their meaning. If they hear such a composition performed and do not find it confused, dull and annoying, it is because there is no tone-poem so deep, but has as an effect certain light passages, plain melodies, sweet harmonies and the like; to these inferior parts our amateur is drawn, when unable to comprehend the work as a whole. But as a general thing they prefer a piece, which is a mixture of worn out runs and roulades, and then take an innocent delight in the readiness of the performer, as his fingers skip and dance like innumerable hobgoblins up and down the key-board with lightning swiftness. In short, these musicians are interested exclusively in the performance of a piece, while they care nothing for it as a composition. We say this with emphasis, since it proves best what we have stated above, that musical dilettantism is still scrambling up the first steps leading to the temple of the art. The natural course of improvement, with individuals as well as whole communities, in taste and judgement, is marked by a gradual turning away from the performance of a composition to the work itself, as it stands on the paper, mute, silent. In the first stage they go to a concert for the show; their object is to see, not to hear; they are interested in the performers, their movements, their dress or instruments (nota bene, if their attention is not absorbed in mustering and criticizing the audience); they care not at all what kind of piece is being played and who composed it; nor can they separate the piece from the performance, the composer from the player; if it is executed badly, it will be pronounced a bad piece, however beautiful it, in fact, may be; indeed, for them there hardly exists such an abstract being as a composer. Arrived at the last stage, however, they consider the work and the delivery of it apart, and it is mainly the composition, that commands their attention; they give all credit, all honour to the composer and regard the performers as secondary; the latter will of course receive their share of applause, if they do their duty; that is, if they render the work in the spirit of the composer, denying their personal taste, style, or conception so much as to make the master's approval or praise their sole object. Individuals who have arrived at this stage are to be found every where; but it is said that there are cities in Germany where even the whole community has risen to that point; as for instance in Leipsic. Whether this is the truth, or not, we will not decide now; at any rate it should be so, and not alone in Leipsic, but every where. All who have an influence should work to attain this desirable end. Let the quality of the piece be the first that calls for your judgment and then measure the player's ability by it. In short, let us labor that more importance be attached to compositions and that executing ability, which has arrogated such undue predominance over the former, be reduced to its proper functions, which consist in faithfully rendering and interpreting the piece, instead of exhibiting its own artifices and trickeries. We undervalue by no means the mastery a player may have achieved over the mechanism of his instrument. It is a great gain to the art, this amplifying and widening of technical means. It must be clear that we do not contend against the mania for acquiring superior skill of execution, but against turning it to a wrong end. As a general rule it may, however, be maintained that when the creative part of the art flourishes the executing part, as a natural consequence, does the same. Beethoven's immortal creations, for instance, caused a marvelous industry among the performing musicians; to them is in a great measure owing the perfection, to which the modern orchestra has risen, and which is both the wonder and delight of our age. So, we come back to what I have said before, which cannot too often be repeated: let us labor that more attention, more regard, more respect, be paid to good compositions, and we shall see a better state. BENDA.

* May, they can dispense with the performers altogether. There are, indeed, persons, who enjoy a musical composition by merely reading it. Comfortably seated in an easy chair, instead of a novel, they take the score of a symphony, an oratorio, or whatever it may be, and read it like a book, enjoying it as well as if they heard it performed.

Bach and Mendelssohn.

FROM A SOCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

I.

Music and German Burghership.

In the year 1850, when the hundredth anniversary of the death of John Sebastian Bach was approaching, I wrote the following words:

One hundred years ago, on the 28th day of July, the Thomas Cantor Bach, of Leipzig, was taken from earth by apoplexy, when an old, blind, harassed man. We read that in several cities a celebration is talked of to honor this cantor, who needed almost a century to make the fullness of his genius appreciated among the susceptible, and to grow in people's estimation from an organ virtuoso of "infernal dexterity" into a profound tone-poet. But it looks as though this celebration would take place in a very quiet, disjointed manner—and yet, who knows but that, after another hundred years, the 28th of July may be a national festival! What a contrast to the hundredth anniversary of Goethe's birth, which we celebrated a year ago, about this time, in such a brilliant and universal manner! But people are not very willing to keep fast-days, and are still less unwilling to have their sins generally known: Bach's memorial day, is for the present generation of artists, a day of atonement.

This is not the place to discuss Bach's position in regard to our newest musical conditions, although this would probably be an excellent mode of setting one's opinions right as to the present epoch. But Bach's character has its political social side, and as it is difficult to decide whether this wonderful man was not even greater from a social, than from an artistic point of view, it may not be altogether useless, as one way of celebrating the hundredth anniversary of his death, to throw some light on the political side of this thoroughly German character.

I see in Bach the proud representative of that sin-core, unfeigned burghership, which, true to itself, withstood the corruptions of eighteenth century, and presented a social balance to the demoralization of the "polite" world, the superficiality of the scientific and the "old-fogyism" of artistic life. This honest citizenship has now almost disappeared, even among our trading class; but an artist-nature, deeply rooted in a worthy citizen's life, finding its noblest consecration in the cheerful love and fear of God, and its best support in the moral atmosphere of a rich, strong, affectionate family existence, would be, indeed, to-day, something very "new and strange."

Such a character reminds us of those manly artists of the middle ages, with whom, citizen-like solidity in trade went hand in hand with artistic geniality. And indeed, the whole man, as he lived and wrote, is the last echo of the greatness of the middle ages, that was heard in those days of pig-tails. In the believing mysticism of a child like soul, and with the fantastic overflowing of wondrously intertwined forms, he built up cathedrals in tones, when people had long forgotten how to create them from stones.

The circle in which he moved, too, was formed from the last remains of middle-age burghership. The revolutions at the close of the eighteenth century destroyed these relics. No musician can again practice his art like Bach, since he can not live or develop himself socially in the same manner. The artistic appreciation of Bach's works, ceased to be, when people were no longer capable of understanding the middle-age in their own existence; and it was resuscitated when the historical understanding of that great epoch began to revive.

It is really a pleasure to contemplate the genealogical tree of the Bachs. From John Sebastian's great-grandfather down to his sons, are only four generations, that represent a period something over a hundred years, and yet, from one heart, the race has increased to a male posterity of more than twenty, branching into seven lines, of which each might found, as head of a family, a new line for himself! And they were a race of men who might well be proud of their genealogical table! Yet this great family, which, according to human foresight, promised to blossom through an endless posterity, has now, about one hundred years since John Sebastian's death—died out!

The predecessors of the great tone-master were honest tradespeople and musicians; his great-great-grandfather, Veit Bach, was a master-baker, who had left Hungary for Saxony; his great-grandfather, was a carpet-maker, and also a musician; in the third and fourth generation from Veit Bach, the family began to stock half Thuringia with excellent musicians; John Sebastian's father was court musician at Eisenach, and, as he died early, John Christopher, an older brother, was Sebastian's music-master; he, again, formed, by means of his own lessons, ten sons into excellent musicians.

Such people are very far removed from the modern notion, that art-life is a sort of noble vagabondizing, and that emancipation from family bonds, and one's own hearth, belongs to artistic geniality.

Sebastian Bach lived in the vicinity of one of the most splendid courts of that time. This fact would be of little consequence, as the master was with difficulty persuaded to visit the court—but for another fact.

At this court a sybaritism reigned in the artistic circle, the equal of which has never since been seen. Music in Dresden was almost entirely dedicated to the embellishment of princely splendor, and was itself adorned to the utmost, and was recompensed with the heavy klang of German gold, for its light Italian tinklings.

Bach did not fight against this at all; he bore his cross in patience, and, while creating immortal works, he suffered himself to be cheated by the school-directors. He was harassed like his father, and made music like him. But how much honorable greatness lay beneath these simple facts!

As publishers were then even rarer than to-day, the industrious cantor engraved his works himself.

When we think of this untiring energy, we can well understand that this man's face has been truly pictured in the following short words:

"When one looks at the firm set of the head, and the black eyes within it, it seems as though fire were breaking out of a rock."

And yet this never-resting man did so little for his "reputation," and for the circulation and preservation of his works, that we of to-day, after only one hundred years, must search for them as for the lost parchments of antiquity; and only a small part of his creations, and that but lately, has become generally known. Here lies the immense distance between modern artistic industry and the impulse to compose, which was so resistless with old Bach; our artists, to quote the apostle Paul "serve the creature more than the creator," and the contrary was the case with Bach. He was an artist without a public, who sang in honor of God, and for his own pleasure. He was a true aristocrat of genius. The idea of a public did not exist for him. I know of no artist since Bach, of whom this can be truly said. This idea has only too lively an existence with us. And the experience may well confound us, that precisely that body of artists, for whom the public is the most real idea,—actors,—have become the least independent among all, in an artistic sense, and, socially, the most corrupt. While the poets and the learned who belonged to the Gottsched period, contemporary with Bach's prime, fell into theoretic pedantry, because they had separated from the social burgher foundation, and because they were then venturing on the first attempt to form a literary class, a "polite and cultivating world"—par excellence—(a stupid fiction, the pursuit of which has brought such unspeakable mischief to Germany),—during all this, German burghership displayed, in Sebastian Bach, its last artistic embodiment.

To attach such a meaning to Bach's geniality may be called philistinish; I cannot help it; the man never looks greater to me, than when I see him as a cantor before me, surrounded by his ten music-making sons, to whom, art, in its purity, is a family legacy; who honestly fulfils the duties, and will not exceed the narrow boundaries of his position, as a simple citizen; who thinks in tones for the love of God, and not for the public, because it is his unquestioned custom, and was that of his fathers before him.

This is what gives to his works that iron, marrowy, chaste, pure character, that has not been equalled by any composer since him. Bach is our one speculative musician; and yet he never loses himself in his speculations, because form and expression have a historical foundation with him, and because he holds to the traditions of his fathers in artistic technicalities, just as firmly and intelligently, as to their family customs.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the 43d Psalm: "As the Hart Pans." By Mendelssohn.

The Prince's Welcome.

Of all the ovations offered to the Prince of Wales in his recent visit to the United States, none was more tastefully conceived and more admirably carried out than the Concert given by the children of the Public Schools, in the Music Hall, on Thursday afternoon [Oct. 18]. Although the Committee of Arrangements did not see the propriety of inviting the representatives of the Musical Journals of this city, we rejoice that we were enabled, by the kindness of Dr. Upham, to whom the City is indebted so largely for the brilliant success which attended the occasion, to attend and chronicle the performance.

The festivals of the last two or three years have made all the details of the arrangements comparatively simple and easy. The general arrangement of the Hall was the same as that which we described a few weeks ago, the same lofty amphitheatre reaching from the stage to the cornice of the Hall, covered with tier upon tier of youthful faces beaming with pleasure and radiant with the beauty of youth, all neatly dressed, the girls mostly in white, and presenting a spectacle of delight for the eyes, such as is rarely seen. The coup d'œil was absolutely startling, of what a cotemporary happily calls "a cascade" of youth and beauty. The seats in the floor of the hall were all removed and a platform erected nearly in the centre for the honored guests of the occasion. The decorations of the Hall showed the taste of the artist, and not of the upholsterer or professional decorator whose conceptions are limited to a lavish display of bunting. Hangings of velvet, trimmed with gold were upon the fronts of the balconies, and the simple words, "England," "America," and "Welcome." Over the doors, tastefully arranged trophies of the English and American flags, alternated with the nodding plumes of the crest of the Prince of Wales; and, high over all, the American flag and the red banner and cross of St. George dropped in peaceful folds, side by side, from the lofty ceiling. The galleries were filled with ladies, and every standing place on the floor with gentlemen, and the stage bloomed from top to bottom with the children; and, as the Prince, accompanied by His Excellency the Governor of the Commonwealth and the Mayor of the City, entered the Hall, cheer after cheer, and a waving welcome of a sea of handkerchiefs, that looked like a perfect foam, gave him cordial and enthusiastic greeting. The orchestra, under CARL ZERBAHN, struck up Weber's Jubilee Overture, as the Prince took his seat, between two Massachusetts mechanics, who have risen by the divine right within them to those conspicuous posts which they adorn—not the least interesting feature of the scene to Republican beholders. The overture led into the National Anthem of England, when the whole audience rose, as the children, with one voice and all their souls rolled out, with full orchestra and organ accompanying, the glorious melody to the words of the International Ode.

OUR FATHERS' LAND.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

SUNG IN UNISON BY TWELVE HUNDRED CHILDREN OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

AN.—God save the Queen.

God bless our Fathers' Land!
Keep her in heart and hand
One with our own!
From all her foes defend,
Be her brave People's Friend,
On all her Realm's descend,
Protect her Throne!

Father, with loving care
Guard Thou her kingdom's Heir,
Guide all his ways:
Thine arm his shelter be.
From him by land and sea
Bid storm and danger flee,
Prolong his days!

Lord, let War's trumpet cease,
Fold the whole Earth in peace
Under Thy wings!
Make all Thy Nations one,
All Hearts beneath the sun,
Till Thou shalt reign alone,
Great King of Kings!

The Prince and his suite, consisting of the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Lyons, Gen. Bruce, and other distinguished noblemen and gentlemen, showed marked attention during the singing and applauded the singers most heartily at the close. After an interval of a few minutes, the next piece of the programme was given with like success. The whole performance occupied exactly an hour. The remainder of the programme was as follows:

II.
CHORAL.—"SLEEPERS WAKE."
FROM ST. PAUL.—Mendelssohn.

III.
ALLEGRO-RETTO.
FROM THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY.—Beethoven.

IV.
GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.
FROM THE TWELFTH MASS.—Mozart.

V.
ANDANTE.
FROM THE FIFTH SYMPHONY.—Beethoven.

VI.
OLD HUNDREDETH PSALM.

From all that dwell below the skies
Let the Creator's praise arise;
Let the Redeemer's name be sung,
Through every land, by every tongue.

Eternal are thy mercies, Lord;
Eternal truth attends thy word;
Thy praise shall sound from shore to shore
Till suns shall rise and set no more.

Of the performance of the programme, it is perhaps, needless for us to speak more fully.

During the singing of the Doxology, the whole audience reverently remained standing. The guests then withdrew amid the enthusiastic cheers of the children and audience.

Nowhere else in the country, has such a welcome been given—nowhere else could it have been done, nor indeed according to the Dinriat's letter in another column, could such a thing probably be so well done anywhere. The Schools of Boston are her pride and boast, and in no way could they be more pleasantly or creditably displayed than in the manner chosen for this occasion. All thanks are due to Dr. Upham and Mr. Zerrahn for their unwearied efforts in bringing the affair to so successful a termination.

The Prince has left us, having received all over the country the spontaneous and hearty welcome which was due from a nation of the same blood, history and laws as that which sees in him the Heir to its ancient Throne. It cannot be but that the seeds of good will and peace have been sown in his young heart of which the rich harvest is to be reaped in the future years of the history of both nations. Of "Young England" himself, we may say that his modest and truly gentlemanly, not to say princely, bearing and manners have left a most favorable impression on all who have seen him, and many heart felt good wishes accompany him on his homeward voyage, and in the career that probably awaits him in the future.

Musical Chit-Chat.

We have reported in another place what seems to fall especially to a Music Journal, the School Concert at the Music Hall. The imposing reviews of Military and the splendors of the Ball do not come within our scope, but we are glad to copy the following notice of the excellent music at the Ball, by the correspondent of the Tribune, which we hear confirmed on every side.

The Boston Ball, although, as I have before intimated, not on the whole favorably comparable to the best of the Canadian balls, had some points of superiority over even these. The Prince had never danced to such excellent music. It is seldom that so brilliant an orchestra, with so capital a chief as Mr. Zerrahn, is heard in a ball-room. And the music was, I venture to say, more carefully selected than the wiles in the supper-room. I salute the taste which gathered so well together the brightest quadrilles that Strauss wrote, and the best morsels of the liveliest of other composers—Fry's "Lancers" most sparkling of all. The manner of the Prince's welcome, too, was a happy fancy. Instead of the unadorned anthem, which, although wanting nothing beyond its own austere simplicity on state occasions, may yield a part of its dignity in a festive time like this, Lindpainter's overture was played—the best, after Weber's, that has been written upon the English national theme—and Weber's, having been used at the Music Hall celebration could not well be here repeated.

Every good citizen regrets that an occasion so brilliant should have been made the opportunity of a marked and studied neglect, amounting almost to insult, of the Governor of the Commonwealth, and his wife, the only invited guests of the occasion, beside the Prince and suite.

One thing too marred the pleasure of the Concert at the Music Hall, viz., a repetition of the same shiftless arrangement for the admission of the audience at the Winter Street entrance, which we noticed on the occasion of the School Festival. No intimation was given on the tickets (which were of two kinds) at which staircase they were to be presented. The consequence was a confused and alarming pressure in opposite directions, of a perfectly well disposed and gentlemanly crowd that did not know where to go. Many aged citizens, of the highest respectability and eminence, whose names we could give, were thus exposed for a long time to the swaying of this uncomfortable crowd, at the serious peril of life and limb. The whole matter was discreditable to the Committee of Arrangements, and could have been prevented by a couple of words on the printed tickets. In marked contrast were the arrangements of the interior of the Hall, contrived by Dr. Upham.

THE MECHANICS' FAIR.—The Judges at the late exhibition of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanics' Exhibition have awarded the premiums.

We are glad to see that no competitor takes the "gold medal" from the honored house of the "Chickering's," whose instruments of every class were indeed admirable and worthy of their reputation. The silver medal for upright pianos also, was deservedly bestowed on them, as we know of no American instruments of this class that can compare with those made by the Chickering's. The Parlor Grands of Timothy Gilbert were excellent instruments; and a square piano, by T. McNeil, was worthy of especial notice, receiving a bronze medal. Mason & Hamlin had a large display of their admirable melodeons.

The following are those awarded for Musical Instruments. We copy from the list in the Evening Transcript.

Gold Medal.—Chickering & Sons; Best Piano.

Silver Medal.—Timothy Gilbert & Co.; Grand and Parlor Grand Piano Fortes. Hazelton Bros., New York; "Square Pianos N. M. Lowe; Square Piano Fortes. Wm. P. Emerson; Square Piano Fortes. Chickering & Sons; Upright Piano Forte. Mason & Hamlin; Melodeons.

Bronze Medal.—T. Gilbert & Co.; Piano Forte with Eolian Attachment. J. W. Brackett; Organ Piano Forte. T. McNeil; Square Piano Forte. J. H. Aray; Violin. E. S. Wright; Silver Bugle. F. H. Corney; Miniature Piano Forte.

Diploma.—G. A. Miller & Co.; Square Piano Forte. Wm. Bourne; Square Piano Forte. Dearborn & Severance; Melodeon. Phelps & Dalton; Melodeon. J. H. Gibson; Melodeon. J. H. Aray, Boocawen, N. H.; Superior Banjo. H. Westman, East Boston; Banjo. Samuel Pierce; Organ Pipes.

MRS. VARIAN JAMES.

My Dear Editor pro tem:—If it be a matter of interest to you, among the immediate musicalia of the day, please afford me space to record that this lady whose name has perhaps scarcely been known to your readers, until introduced to them by you in a very brief allusion, a week or two ago, I have lately had the fortune to hear not only repeatedly in private, but also in two Concerts in Providence, where she sang various brilliant cavatinas as well as simple ballads in so admirable a style as to receive from the critics of the morning papers of that city,—the Journal and Post, the most cordial and well-merited eulogiums.

Let me, without either entering, on the one hand, upon an elaborate criticism, or, on the other, falling into any extravagance of enthusiasm, add my confident prediction, that when the favorable opportunity presents itself for her to be heard in this city under such auspices as she richly deserves for a debut before the Boston public—to wit, in the Music Hall,—on a crowded Philharmonic night—with an orchestra under Zerrahn—the faultlessly charming quality of her pure soprano voice, the ease and grace of her execution, her finished and artistic method, combined with the fine personal appearance which indicates both the woman of character and the lady of culture, will not fail to captivate her audiences here, as they are said to have done those of every place she has visited, and to win for her the metropolitan renown which may be so efficient a help to the attainment of those material successes and rewards that should crown the aspirations and studies of the conscientious artiste.

OHIO NORMAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—We have received the Catalogue of the Institution at Ashland, Ohio. It is a sort of Conservatoire for instruction in Music. The following persons compose the Board of Instruction.

Principals.—B. F. Baker, Boston, Mass. W. H. Ingersoll, Hudson, Ohio.

Teacher of Vocalization.—Dr. Clara W. Beames, New York City.

Teacher of Education.—Robert Kidd, Esq., Cincinnati, O.
Teacher of Pianos and Organ.—E. C. Kilbourne, Ashland, Ohio.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.—As has been already announced, the operatic kaleidoscope, after much turning, presents an attractive picture. Madame Fabbri, Formes, and Stigelli, are to sing the principal rôles in "Robert le Diable," on Wednesday evening, and this agreeable opening of a new season is to be followed by "Les Huguenots," "Der Freischütz," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Mercadante's "Il Giuramento," and several other fresh works, if only the liberality of the public adequately rewards the enterprise of the artist. If there is shown by the latter an honest endeavor to deal justly with their public, a true regard for their art, and that respect for themselves which the since artist ever has, it cannot be doubted that pecuniary encouragement, which is always the most tardy, will cheer the treasury of Messrs. Fabbri and Formes. It is as certain as anything connected with that fickle and incomprehensible body, The Public, can be, that there are enough people in New York who are able and willing to do it, to well support an operatic company; it is also certain that excellence in public entertainments will be soon appreciated by these people; after the irritating disappointments to which they have been subjected, they may at first be inclined to look with coldness on any Irving-place undertaking; but this apathy can be quickly overcome, and the managers will see that a broad mantle of charity will cover the minor deficiencies which we may expect at the outset, provided they result not from negligence, but from want of ample resources. The Public is not by nature unkind, or severely exacting; but it is not entirely idiotic, nor will it be made by fancy advertisements to believe that a stone is excellent bread.

Beside this immediate project, there is a rumor which says that another combination is to be made, having Muzio at the head, and including Madame Colson, Miss Phillips, Miss Kellogg, Stigelli, Brignoli, and Susini; that the Academy of Music has really been leased to this company, and that it will be opened for their performances by the middle of November. This enterprise, however, has not yet taken definite form.

Messrs. Mason and Thomas announce that their sixth season of classical musical entertainments will commence with a concert at Dodworth's Hall, on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. The artists composing the club, are Mason, Thomas, Bergmann, Mosenthal, Matzka. The concerts will take place at intervals of three or four weeks, and during the season will be performed nine quartets, three trios, three sonatas for piano and violin, two quintets, together with a variety of solos for piano, violin, violoncello. A concert for which many have long eagerly looked, is at last definitely announced. Miss Carlotta Patti will make her first public appearance in New York at Dodworth's Saloon, on Thursday evening. Aside from the interest attaching to the debut of a member of a remarkable family, expectation has been raised by the reports which those who have heard her in private give of the uncommon musical ability of Miss Patti. She will doubtless be warmly greeted by a large audience. In this concert, Madame Colson, Madame Strakosch, Brignoli, Stigelli, Susini, Ferri, and Saar, will take part.—Tribune.

The Norwich Festival.

ABRAHAM AND UNDIENE.

This followed close upon the Worcester festival of which we gave an account last week. The novel features of this were a new oratorio and a new cantata, of which we find the following account in the Athenaeum, Sept 29:

Herr Molique's Oratorio was performed on Thursday week, at the Norwich Festival, with a success which must gladden every one desirous of seeing real merit acknowledged by genuine reward. It is a composition not to be dismissed with common-places, —one which few living musicians besides its writer could have produced.

The book of "Abraham" has many good points; not the least of which is that the words are directly derived from the Scriptures, without any admixture of inferior modern composition. It is, further, not too long. The departure of the Patriarch to the Land of Canaan his separation from Lot, his victory over the Kings of the Cities of the Plain, make up the first part of the Oratorio.—The second part is devoted to the destruction of the Cities of the Plain, the story of Hagar, and the sacrifice of Isaac, with a final Thanksgiving Chorus. Here, it will be at once perceived, are scenes admitting of great variety and contrast; but, in one respect, the selection might have been reconsidered to advantage. After the destruction of the Cities of the Plain, Abraham's part is principally one of trouble and agitation, as in the last two episodes mentioned. This damps the interest towards the close. Again, during the first half of the work the music for the soprano is of too small consequence or interest; the author having been too exclusively occupied with the protagonist, who is a basso, as in "Elijah." As in "Elijah," too, the occupation given to the other voices is fragmentary—no character being carried throughout the work. This (even with Mendelssohn's masterpiece as the exception in proof of the rule) has an inevitable tendency to weaken the interest, and "throw out" the comprehension of the listener. In no work of Art is firm-knit and continuous purpose so indispensable as in a story carried out without action or scenery, or change of dress.

We must now come to the music. It was not to be expected that at this stage of Herr Molique's career he should be able to add to the riches of his musical nature that which was wanting to them. He cannot be rated among the born melodists from among whom the greatest musicians have come. Nor like others, in whom the natural gift has been spare, has he been led by circumstance or self-knowledge to nourish an indication into a reality,—even as by the art of floriculture petals can be doubled, size enhanced, and a thousand new tints added to the original wild blossom. But those familiar with Herr Molique's manner, as one leaning towards what is intricate in detail, must have been surprised in "Abraham." The most stirring and vigorous portions of the score are the best. The war-scene (Nos. 13 and 14), a recitative, aria and chorus, is the most striking piece in the Oratorio. Among the others numbers which we prefer (for a reason presently to be stated) are the Quartett (No. 5),—the Tenor-song (No. 9), tuneable and exceedingly elegantly scored—and, the Chorus (No. 35), in which it is shown how grandeur, strictness and freedom can be combined. All the fugal movements are conducted with that grasp over resource which has no limit save in the hearer's patience. The music is throughout written with a master's hand, if not from a master mind. Every voice is displayed advantageously, without meretricious allurements being resorted to. The force of the choruses attests the excellence of Herr Molique's writing—since with every crudity admitted there must come a loss of power. The instrumentation is clear, rich, various—nowhere fantastic, nowhere dull,—in many of the songs admirable as an example of felicitous result produced by simple and unhackneyed means. The score should be in the hands of every student of orchestra writing.—The Oratorio, in short, from first to last, is, as we have heretofore said, sustained in a manner to claim more than common esteem and admiration.

With all this merit an objection must be urged against "Abraham." We recollect no example showing how a clever, conscientious man of talent can be penetrated, oftentimes to the verge of self effacement, by the spirit of a man of genius, more forcibly than this same Oratorio. By nothing more than the many essays put forth since "Elijah" appeared, have we been taught how entirely original a work that this is;—by none more emphatically than by "Abraham;" for since Mendelssohn wrote, no German has attempted an oratorio with claims, in any respect, comparable to those of Herr Molique. It is needless, and would be ungracious to specify the passages in which, not only a leaven of peculiar quality is to be tasted, but where, also, the very forms of rhythm and construction are to be recognized with a simplicity of reproduction remarkable in proportion as we believe it to have been unconscious. Herr Molique, be it remembered, does not range among the scholars to whom their own master is also model elect. To have been so powerfully tintured by the influence of a junior cotemporary, is a fact containing a testimony too significant to be passed over. One more remark—Herr Molique has not been sufficiently regardful of variety. All the choruses, save one, are in common time,—such examples of triple time as "Abraham" contains, being (with this exception) reserved for the solos.

The performance was one to satisfy the most fastidious and exigent of musicians. Not only did "Abraham" from the first to last chord, go without "stop, let, or hindrance," but it was executed with that ripeness and force which can only come of thorough study. The choruses were sung with enjoyment (another proof, by the way, of their being well written):—the principal singers, one and all,—Madame Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Wilbye Cooper, and Belletti, did the best of their best. It is impossible to sing with greater purity and pathos than did Madame Novello throughout the scene of Hagar in the Wilderness. A separate notice is due in highest commendation of Mr. Santley, to whom the long and responsible part of Abraham had been entrusted. The work, to conclude, was listened to with close attention, in places breaking out into applause. The composer was cordially welcomed on appearing in the orchestra, and enthusiastically cheered after the close of the oratorio.

It was not merciful on the part of the managers of this Festival to produce a second novelty in the evening—after a morning, during which attention had been so largely drawn upon as in listening to "Abraham." Mr. Benedict's "Undine" is, without question, one of the best of modern Cantatas, and their number is happily on the increase. These fairy legends have generally a strange attraction for composers,—this one, in particular,—though the spirituality and subtlety of La Motte Fouqué's delicious tale might have been fancied too exquisite in their delicacy for Music, for the same reasons as, to our thinking, make Hamlet, Mignon, Miranda, difficult of approach by the art. The above, however, may be but an individual conceit;—more certain it is that Mr. Oxford has treated the favourite subject hastily. There are waters and waters. "Undine," like "Lorely," is a spirit of lakes, streams and pools—not of ocean. "Tritons" and corals have nothing to do with whispering reeds and water-lilies, yet here we find them. In another respect, some want of thought is evident: a want that may have pressed on the musician more than either author or his comrades have been aware. A Cantata is not an opera. The less action that it contains the better, and the action must be described so as not to render personification and motion necessary. In spite of the capital groupings and gesticulations of the crowd on the stage, and Mr. Stanfield's pictorial scenery, the chorus, "Wretched lovers," in Gay's "Acis and Galatea," is more effective as concert-music than it was when forced into dramatic form by Mr. Macready. To illustrate from another period—disregard of this distinction, which, however it be, is, nevertheless one essential to be kept in mind—took away half its effect from one of Mr. Macfarren's very best works—his Cantata, "The Sleeper Awakened."

In "Undine," from the moment that action begins, it will be felt that the composer has lost some power, and that, having been compelled to write with the stage before his mind's eye, he has written that which requires action to complete its effect. No matter; "Undine" is, to our thinking, by many degrees Mr. Benedict's best and most spontaneous work. It is full of beauty—full of fancy. The overture is delicious as a prelude to a fairy tale of lakes and streams. The opening of the allegro may be expressly commended to those who are disposed to be rapturists (Miss Burney's Johnsonian word) over the overture to "Tannhäuser." The effect which Herr Wagner has there tried for is got here. The second subject is elegantly flowing; the third, marked scherzando (page 7 of the Pianoforte score), happily fancied, as an enhancement—not an intrusion. We know no modern overture better than this. The opening chorus (with the episodic entrance of Kuhleborn) is in the same humour, excellent and unaffected in variety. In particular, the passage, pp. 22 and 23, may be specified, and, as a matter of detail, the use of the harp throughout this chorus. Undine's solo with chorus is thoroughly graceful, though it will tax any voice less certain in its high notes than Madame Novello's. The Terzett (No. 4) is not less good. The Scena for the tenor (No. 5) is excellent as a piece of display for the tenor, with its intimation of the march (No. 5) which, when it arrives proves to be a new Wedding March. After Mendelssohn's this was difficult to find, yet Mr. Benedict has found it. The first movement of (No. 8) a contralto scena is again good and calculated to tempt every contralto. From this point the cantata becomes stage music till its very close—where the introduction of the single voice of the Spirit after the violent chorus which precedes it, is a touch of poetry after melodrama. "Undine" should keep its place among cantatas; it pleased honestly all who heard it at Norwich. It will please yet more on every repetition.—Athenæum, Sept. 29.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The charmed gifts. Song. H. von Bezon. 25

A simple but pretty parlor ballad.

I think of thee. G. Leander Eberhard. 25

One of the best of late sentimental songs.

O give me my dear sunny home in the South. J. W. Cherry. 25

A pleasing, heart-winning strain, worthy of the author of the popular "Shells of the Ocean."

The wise old bachelor. T. N. Towns. 25

A new, humorous song, which, if put in at the right moment, cannot fail to amuse.

The wishing gate. N. J. Spörle. 35

Another song of the humorous kind. The old superstition on which the text is built, is well-known. This song, differing totally from others of the same name, which were current years ago, tells of a young girl who did not wish wisely, but bethought herself only of wealth and station, thereby rendering herself miserable, when her wishes were granted. The music is capital. It is altogether very recommendable to ladies.

Instrumental Music.

Mazurka. Thekla Badarzewska. 25

Pretty, and not difficult. As something new from the pen which wrote the famous "Maiden's Prayer," this mazurka will at once command the attention of all amateurs.

Lucia di Lammermoor. Franz Nava. 30

Les Huguenots. " 30

New numbers of Nava's Operatic Favorites, a new and capital set, in point of difficulty about mid-way between Bellini's "Bada" and Meyer's "Repertoire."

Les Soupirs. Reverie caractéristique. F. Godefroid. 50

One of the most charming pieces of this composer whose "Dance of the Fairies" was made so popular once by Jaill. It has been heard frequently in the best musical society of all countries. It is endorsed now as a piece that will live and be studied by hundreds, which task will be found somewhat difficult.

Savin Rock Polka. Carl Trautmann. 25

Quite a pretty polka.

Sound the loud timbrel. (Sabbath strains.) Rimbault. 15

In Jewry is God known. " " 15

He was despised. " " 15

O had I Jubal's lyre. " " 15

It was a very good idea to familiarize these sterling old airs by placing them into the hands of the young, arranged as pleasing little pieces. They are also well adapted for the Melodeon, and will make such music for the Sabbath as nobody can object to.

Books.

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP. A collection of Choice Tunes and Hymns for Prayer, Class and Camp Meetings, Choirs and Congregational Singing. 50

A very compact and convenient 12mo. volume of words and music for the Methodist Church, and one that will prove quite welcome for public and private use. It contains nearly 300 pages of the best hymns and tunes, most of which are standard old favorites and the remainder those that will soon become such.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Bach and Mendelssohn

FROM A SOCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

I. (Continued.)

Music and German Burghership.

No artist of that period, in any department of art, so successfully overcame the inward corruption and ostentatious flourish of that day of big-wiggery, as Bach,—the honest, upright, lonely spirit, who yet needed that very loneliness in order to remain, musically speaking, honest. He, the German citizen, was never possessed with the notion of musical cosmopolitanism, that then haunted some of the greatest musicians—Hasse, for instance; and even Handel, for some time. Bach remained national to the back-bone—perhaps the only German artist on the boundaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, of whom this can be boasted, in the strongest sense of the word. How, indeed, could it possibly be otherwise? German burgherdom then began to be inoculated with those cosmopolitan fancies that gradually destroyed it.

To-day, when music itself has engrafted so many sickly, enervating influences on the imagination, it is good to remember, that in a far more corrupt time it was precisely music that sustained the health, freshness, and honor of the German world of art. And it was not Bach alone, who effected this, but a great group of masters with him, who at least worked on the same firmly laid foundation, even if they were outgrown by the proud height of his genius.

Among these masters, we may point to his sons; and Charles Philip Emanuel does not make an epoch in art-history, only because he was the son of such a father. Old Fink has said a true thing in regard to this remarkable musical group of the sons of Bach.

He says; "If the world could only see the admirable master-works of this great family laid together, it would be astonished at their immeasurable richness, and would admire their truly German profundity and strength."

It was by a peculiar accident, as it were, that one of Bach's sons—and the most gifted, the only one that can in any way be placed in competition with his father,—has furnished us with a negative proof of the truth of our conclusion; that only in the narrow circle, in the hereditarily bequeathed purity of family and citizen life, could the artistic greatness of John Sebastian Bach have acquired its solid individuality.

William Friedemann Bach "émancipated" himself from the restraint of a Cantor's circumstances; the solidity of citizenship, rooted in a happy family life, was treasore to him; the noble vagabondizing of a travelling genius was far more attractive to him; his great father's unassuming character was transformed in him to an experienced artist-pride; and when his enthusiasm ran out, he sought to find it again in the wine-glass. Instead of uniting talent with industry, both melted away to foam. In short, he was the origin of the modern-genial-art-proletarian.

Highly gifted as he was, at first the pride and hope of his father and brothers, yet all his talent completely failed; and while his works are hardly extant, his example has come down to posterity as a warning. He declined from that true Bach spirit, in which we recognize the strength and manhood of the good old citizen customs, raised to be an artistic power.

John Sebastian Bach was one of those wonderful spirits, who, like the Cid, can win a battle even in death. When he died, it must rather have been said of him that he closed one epoch, than that he commenced a new one. But when he had been dead almost a hundred years, he began to form a fresh epoch. What we recognize as the newest development of musical classicality, the reform that was commenced with Mendelssohn, has this peculiarity about it, that it returns to Bach, is nourished and strengthened by his spirit. The revival of his Passion-music was an event whose importance we do not yet understand. As the study of the newly revived Shakspeare lighted the revolutionary fires of the "storm and drive" period,—as this great literary event spread through the succeeding developments of the romanticists, and gave an impulse to the present,—so the study of Bach has led to a musical reform, less warlike than the literary one, to be sure, but on which a great part of our musical future reposes.

When one considers how few, out of the immense number of Bach's works, have become generally known, we must regard it as a fortunate thing that on the hundredth anniversary of the master's death, a Bach-foundation will be grounded, with the intention of publishing his entire work by degrees. When we remember how deficient is the ordinary knowledge of Bach's creations, and with what magic force the master attracts to him those who approach him in all sincerity, then we may feel a presentiment of the revolution which a new acquaintance with his works will create in the musical world—of course, in process of time.

That the present generation is desirous to study and capable of understanding Sebastian Bach's music, we hold as a favorable sign, not only of its musical, but also of its social strength and inclination. He who cannot appreciate the citizen Cantor, in the family circle, surrounded by his ten musical sons, supported by the worthiness of his position, and by the historical traditions of his art, cannot appreciate the genius of Bach. The celebration of the hundredth anniversary of his death comes just at the right time, for the events of the last year have encouraged us to a revivification in social life; and while we are striving to rebuild the noble edifice of German citizenship, a glance towards the artistic embodiment of its cardinal virtues; namely, fear of God, greatness in limitation, historical custom, and natural and moral strength, will inspire and support us.

Cotemporaries wrote: that when Frederick the Great, who could not possibly have had any sympathetic appreciation of Bach's artistic aims, had seen and heard the Thomas Cantor, he was "in great emotion." There is a deep meaning in this "great emotion." It was the emotion of a great man, who feels that an equally great man stands face to face with him. And it is an admirably naive description of the peculiar impression that Bach's genius makes on all susceptible minds; we are overcome by "great emotion."

And our entire musical development will be influenced by "great emotion," when once Bach's works, in their completion, as we can see before us, at a not very distant time, have found an entrance, and full scope for their unrestrained operation.

Musical Culture.

II.

INSTRUCTION.

Now and then a man appears in public either as a writer or a speaker, who, impelled by philanthropic motives, endeavors to demonstrate that the salvation of the world depends upon making the multitude musical. He considers the practice of music as of the highest benefit to humanity and demands that instruction shall be provided for every one, high or low, at public expense if need be. Our man even goes so far as to insist that the beggars from the streets shall be called in, and instead of receiving bread to satisfy their hunger and garments to clothe their naked limbs, shall receive lessons in music.

However extravagant this may appear, it cannot be denied that music possesses all the elements for being the art of the people. Still, it is of not so much consequence that every one should study music as that those who study it should do it rightly. On this the progress of the art, and the happiness of those connected with it, depend. No reasonable man will say that our age is poor in music; there is plenty of it; the complaint is that it is of too superficial a nature. We will leave it, therefore, to those philanthropists to teach the illiterate crowds singing or playing, or both together, if they think it possible; while we shall rest content, if for the present those only will come forward to be taught, who have the requisite means,—a certain degree of intelligence as well as talent, so that they may derive the proper benefit from the art, which they labor to acquire, and the art from them; and they are many. If their studies are conducted in the right manner, they will one day form the nucleus of a musically cultivated public, and we know not how much farther their influence, as prominent members of society, for the sake of true art may extend. We desire to see at least a similar good taste diffused in matters of music as in poetry and literature. This is possible, and we hope will become a fact sooner or later,

The instruction, therefore, should correspond with the importance of the subject and aim to impart a higher degree of culture than is generally the case. Leaving aside singing and the instruments which are now rarely practiced, we shall only speak of instruction on the pianoforte. This instrument has, in our time, risen to such universal popularity that "to study music" commonly means to study the pianoforte. It is the favorite instrument of professional musicians as well as amateurs, and justly so, for it is the most efficient for obtaining a comprehensive knowledge of the tone-art with all its branches. Its efficiency in this respect is proved by the circumstance that in conservatories and similar high institutions for the study of music every pupil is required to learn the pianoforte in addition to the instruments, for which his taste and talent peculiarly fit him. The principal virtue of the pianoforte lies in the fact that, besides the works expressly composed for it, any compositions, for any instrument or body of instruments, voice or voices, they may have originally been designed, may be represented on it, with all their melodies harmonies, counterpoints, imitations, &c. Paradoxical as it may sound, because of the colossal abuse to which it is daily doomed, the pianoforte is the true instrument for true music.

Instruction, then, has for its object to educate the pupil so that he shall be able to render, and what is no less important, to understand and appreciate the works of the best composers. These works, according to their contents, may be divided into two classes. In the first class belong those, that contain chiefly musical ideas, or thoughts, embodied in a form corresponding to their nature. The music is here a language, for which the instrument, if we may say so, serves as a tongue through which it finds utterance. The music may be dissevered from the instrument, may be taken abstractly, and it will remain as beautiful as before. Works of this class are at the same time inestimable studies to the student of composition for their perfection in form and style, and the masterly manner in which the manifold resources of the creative tone-art are employed. In popular language such compositions are said to be written in the classical style. Most of the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other masters, are in that style. Those of the second class are of inferior value regarded from a musical point of view; for, they rarely contain ideas or thoughts; the tone-art as a language of the soul is not glorified in them. In the former the instrument is made subservient to the music, in these the opposite takes place; there, we hear music through the instrument; here, we hear the instrument through the music. Nevertheless, they display the finest qualities of a modern pianoforte, and the manual dexterity of the player in an admirable manner; besides being excellent studies for the acquirement of an elegant touch, a brilliant execution, and similar properties of a finished player. Our time seems peculiarly favorable for their growth; they are heaped by thousands on the shelves of the publishers. Although, strictly speaking, this class of music is nothing but an excrescence on the tree of true art, still it would be one-sided not to notice it. The musician, who is no fanatic, but entertains broad and liberal views of his art, cannot but regard it as one of the remarkable phenomena of the musical literature of our time. Liszt, Thalberg, Doehler, Prudent, Goria, and a host of greater and smaller spirits have exclusively cultivated this, called the "brilliant style."

As material for study we take the works of both classes together and notice them once more in four distinct sub-divisions. In the first division we will reckon the pieces that are composed, or transcribed, for the pianoforte alone, that is, solo-pieces. They are the most numerous and for many plain reasons must be regarded as the most essential for instruction. The second division contains the pieces for four hands, most of which were originally composed for other instruments, and afterwards arranged for the pianoforte. If the arrangements are faithful to the original, and yet well adapted to the nature of the instrument, they are of manifold use. Such of them should above all be selected for study, as the pupil may have an opportunity of hearing performed in their original costume, if we may say so. A Symphony by Beethoven, for instance, studied in a four-hand arrangement at home, will afford both the highest enjoyment and instruction, when subsequently heard at a concert, represented by a full orchestra. In the third division belong the so-called concerted pieces, those in which the pianoforte is connected with one or more other instruments; such as Duos for the pianoforte and violin or violoncello, Trios, Quartets, &c. The study of this kind of compositions should be deemed of the highest importance; the accompanying instruments—the magic strains of the violin, the melancholy notes of the violoncello—will be most powerful in kindling the true fire in the pianist. The fourth division comprises those to which the pianoforte serves merely as an accompaniment. As every player should learn to accompany well, these compositions must be included among the necessary studies. One may render far greater services to the art as a good accompanist than as a soloist. Besides, the player will have opportunity to make the acquaintance of many a fine work in this way, and thus improve his taste and enrich his knowledge.

The works here enumerated and classified comprise the whole literature of the pianoforte. They appear in various forms, with all of which the pupil must be made acquainted; those alone excepted, that have become antiquated and are no longer of value to the musician of our time. As the most important of these forms the Sonata claims our attention first. It is a conspicuous sign of the superficiality which characterizes the musical doings of the present age, that the Sonata is so much neglected; and, if we desire to see good music more appreciated, we must turn our attention again to the study of this species of composition. The Sonata is the ground-form of all great works of instrumental music, such as the Symphony, Overture, Trio, Quartet, and the like, which, as every one is aware, are least appreciated in public, because least understood. It is, therefore, necessary to explain the structure of the form to the pupil; to point out the leading subjects and their manifold transformations, define their nature and explore the means by which the different character of each subject is effected; above all, the impression which the work as a whole makes, the poetic idea pervading it, should be understood. To develop the critical faculties of the pupil he should always be asked how he likes the piece he is studying, and be pressed to give the reasons for his favorable or unfavorable verdict, which are approved or rejected by the teacher, according as they hit or miss the truth; so that finally, by analyzing its beauties and defects, the piece is judged rightly. Although it is not advisable to attempt instruction in harmony and counterpoint when instruction in pianoforte playing is the object, still a striking harmonic passage may give occasion for some remarks on consonant and dissonant chords, the effect of which on the ear may be tried; while a piece written wholly or partly in the fugued style, will of itself require to show what a tone-edifice may be built of a few notes, how artfully constructed, with the aid of counterpoint. There are everywhere opportunities for useful and pleasant instruction, if the teacher only knows how to use them. So, for instance, already in the beginning, when the mode, key, tact and tempo must be considered, it is most instructive and necessary for the proper appreciation of the piece, to show that every mode and every key has its character, its own peculiar expression. In general, major may be defined as the hard, strong and cheerful mode, minor as the soft and plaintive one. Aside from the mode, the key exerts an influence on the character of a piece, so that, while in this key it is distinguished by a tincture of brightness, in another it appears more gloomy. And so with the different kinds of tact, the explanation of which will make it necessary to touch on that all-powerful agency, called rhythm, and to show its mysterious workings, its throbbings and pulsations, in the thousand shapes and figures into which it is banished by the magic wand of the skilful composer. And so, finally, with the tempo, the many gradations of which are indicated by those Italian words, such as Andante, Allegro, Andantino, Allegretto, &c. It should be practically illustrated how important the correct tempo of a piece is; how, when played too slowly, it loses all its spirit and becomes dull and monotonous; or, on the other hand, when played too quickly, its solemnity, its dignity and stateliness are gone. We need hardly add that in all cases regard must be taken to the pupil's capacity, and not more attempted than is necessary to thoroughly understand and appreciate the piece in question.

In a following article we shall briefly mention a number of other forms, which, though not so important as the Sonata, deserve to be known. This will, at the same time, afford opportunity for more remarks as to how the right culture may be attained through the right instruction.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAVES, A. M.)

III.

Beginners should of course, only be compelled to observe the grammatical accent; the oratorical accent can only be acquired after some years. Although one would suppose that every musician knows the former accent, it is strange enough that most teachers silently overlook it. We need only listen to an orchestra of any smaller town to perceive the want of grammatical accent. No inner connection keeps the instruments harmoniously together, everything is dispersed and scattered to be overthrown the next moment. This feeling of insecurity tormenting the listener, the indistinctness of chords even where no decidedly false-tone occurs, originates solely from ignoring or overlooking the accent.

Thus it is not at all sufficient to impart, once for all, this rule in a superficial manner, but its non-observance must, every time be strictly blamed as a fault; the teacher should stop the pupil, just as much as if a wrong note had been touched, and must make him correct and repeat the accent which has been overlooked or wrongly executed, till it stands in its right place.

Children understand the accent easiest when they are taught that it agrees with poetical rhythm. Circumscriptive or puzzling terms, as, thesis and arsis, used in Piano Instruction books in connection with this simple rule, are apt to be confounded or the accentuation is exaggerated by an affected stiffness. But, if you succeed in finding a well-known little poem of the same rhythm with this piece, you need only to recite it with false intonation to convince them of the intolerable effect of badly marked beats. Suppose a child plays his first little piece in common time and you tell him, the first and third beats must be marked more strongly by one degree than the other two, he will not understand the reason of it and plays alternately a staff forte or piano with great perplexity. The above mentioned method, on the contrary, settles at once in the mind. For example, one and three are intoned like the words, loving, better. You do not say loving, better, thus accenting the short syllable, nor do you place both syllables beside each other equally long in broad, sleepy tone. Just as in speaking you insensibly accentuate one syllable and drop the rest, so must you accustom yourself to give the strong beat its soft emphasis. If you exaggerate this pressure, the performance becomes rough and ugly; it sounds like the declaiming of poor actors who fall with a cry upon one syllable and whisper the other inaudibly. If it be omitted, each melody sounds like the stammering of children or the jargon of a foreigner, when speaking our language.

It almost always happens with the ignorant that the tone does not clearly correspond on the strong beat and that the next tone on the weak beat blunders in so much the more forcibly. To do away with this bad habit it is best to use again the first little hand pieces and the simplest "studics." Pupils bringing along the wrong accentuation as a rooted custom, can, indeed, only be cured by obliging them, for a while, to mark in an exaggerated manner the strong beat and to grind off the surplus accent afterwards. Treat their other mistakes meanwhile with some indulgence, but ridicule them mercilessly every time they declaim their fingers falsely.

The six-eighth time may be impressed upon children by such words as "heavenly, finally," to be declaimed several times instead of "one, two, three, four, five, six."

An anecdote has been published relating how the celebrated philosopher Mosos Mendelssohn wanted to learn the theory of music from Kirnberger, the latter vainly endeavoring to make the former understand that the 3-4 time differs from the 6-8 time. He should have simply said, "3-4 are three trochees and 6-8 are two dactyles," and his learned pupil would have understood this better than his nomenclature "triple time and square time."

Whoever has been early impressed with a correct musical declamation possesses this advantage, that the strong beat in his performance is felt like a soft pulse beating in a live organism without intruding upon and thereby interfering with the gracefulness of the performance. In the performance of those who learned this rule late the accent rather ticks like clock-work and makes the impression of its being an automaton. But I should rather endure this tastelessly violent accentuation than miss it altogether. How easily will those who feel the strong beat in their very nature, take part in four-handed pieces at first sight or in orchestral performances, while everybody else, lacking this guide must stop with the slightest mistake!

If you hear performers having a totally indifferent touch, you may, notwithstanding their remarkable skill, be sure that they have never heard anything about the difference of beats. If their attention is directed to it, they do not want to own their ignorance and throw the matter off as something immaterial, thinking the principal point to be "expression"; as if a person could play feelingly, in whose fingers false accentuation has settled!

Immense confusion has taken place in musical instruction in consequence of the ignorance of the earliest authorities establishing the theory of beats. Open their books on thorough bass and you will find the strong beat called thesis, while metrics designate the corresponding place in the verse as arsis. Although in vocal music its accents must coincide, this idea is allowed to contradict itself when applied to music or language. Old theorists give us an amazingly naïve explanation of it; they say, arsis and thesis mean rising and sinking. As with the strong beat the time-beater is lowered, it is self-evident that the accentuated note must be called thesis.

It it much to be wished that some musician of universal reputation would put an end to this ludicrous confusion of words and ideas by a public declaration.*

I remind you, finally, of a certain nicety in the observance of grammatical accent, viz., that each beat, be it strong or weak, is divided into smaller particles manifesting more or less weight among themselves. Passages of sixteenths or triplets, for example, gain much by our softly marking their little groups in "triple" or "square" time by an imperceptible pressure of the finger. But it requires a pretty skilled hand to execute such niceties of touch down to the best consequences, and the beginner may well be spared this requirement.

There is much futile talk in the musical world about touch; I wished, therefore, to remind you only of its defects mentioned above, because they are reiterated (with few exceptions) by all my new pupils. Those adhering to the Rococo-school of piano-performance, understand by a fine touch only a kind of half staccato in the runs which they are fond of comparing to a string of pearls. One might by this touch be just as well put in mind of a basket of dry peas being thrown down, not to speak of the tastelessness of this manner when applied constantly, it is perverse to attribute importance to it as a fundamental principle of touch, because the runs and ornaments for which it may be adapted are rather secondary, while grandeur and depth of feeling are realized by the performers only by correct accentuation.

* The theory of music has recently been brought to such a high degree of perfection that the works of "old theorists" are only fumbled over by such as are altogether aware of that "ludicrous thesis;" so that our present "theorist" wisely abstain from criticising former unindicative terms.—TRANSLATOR.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, OCT. 22.—The following is the programme of Miss Tillinghast's third Organ Concert, which occurred recently.

1. Fantasia upon a Russian Hymn, Composed for the Organ by.....Freyer
2. Concerto, in three movements, composed for the Organ by.....Mendelssohn
3. Credo.....Mercadante
Mrs. Paddock, Mrs. Mattison, and Mr. De Pasilo.
4. God Save the Queen, with variations for the Organ, by.....Bink
5. Consider the Lilies. Sung by Mrs. Thomas.
6. Grand March, from Tannhauser, arranged for the Organ.....Wagner
7. Hymn, composed by.....Neithardt
Sung by a male chorus of twenty voices.
8. Andante, from Symphony No. 1, of the Salomon series, arranged for the Organ by Pittman, Organist in London. Haydn
9. Introduction and Fugue upon the name Bach, composed for the Organ by.....Bink

These concerts have all been attended by highly appreciative audiences. They seemed always to regard the merits of the performance in a high degree commensurate with the merits of the programme. That shows for itself, as containing a good proportion of the "legitimate", instead of the round of "Operatic selections" so common.

We have a new "Philharmonic Society," of which Mr. Balatka, late of Milwaukee, is conductor. The chorus is not fully organized yet, I believe. The orchestra, unlike any other of home formation we have had, is complete in the several departments of string, wood and brass, and numbers over forty performers. They intend to give their first performance soon after the election.

The Musical Union are preparing to give the "Haymakers," under the direction of the author, Mr. Root, who remains after the close of the session of the Normal Institute for that purpose.

The Walnuth Co. (Wis.) Musical Association held their annual session at Elkhorn, commencing Oct. 16th, and continuing three days, under the direction of Mr. Tillinghast, of this city, assisted by his daughter as pianist. Mr. T. has for four years been a teacher of singing in the public schools of this city, but recently he resigned the post, designing to devote his time to holding conventions. On retiring he received numerous testimonials of esteem from pupils and teachers in various schools.

Mr. Bird, late tenor in the quartet at the 2d Presbyterian church, Dr. Patterson's, has become organist at the 1st. Presbyterian church, Rev. Mr. Humphreys.

The Sentry.

LORRA.

They're gone — the watchfires they have set
Glow round the mountain-passes yet;
Out through the darkness of the night,
They flash a silent, flickering light.

They shine on victory's distant track:
Whence none, alas! for me comes back;
They let me bleed to death to-night,
True sentry, on the field of fight!

Hushed is the tumult of the fray,
The powder-smoke is blown away;
Faint, broken shouts fall on my ear;
My comrades all are far from here.

Yet, though my comrades all are far,
There gleams full many a golden star,
And angel-bands light up, on high,
The eternal watchfires of the sky.

On, comrades brave, to victory!
Farewell, ye banners, high and free!
I can no longer be with you;
Another camp is near in view!

Private Soirees.

Private musical soirées are the infallible indices of the exact development of art in our own country. The gifted prima donna from the sunny clime of Italy, flits into the American arena upon the pinions of a reputation acquired under vastly different influences from those which compass us around; and the applause bestowed upon her achievements merely constitutes an index of our natural fondness for the art, and not of our actual progress in the mastery of its theory and practice. In order to determine properly the musical status of plain American John Jones or Cornelia Smiggers, in the mysterious depths of harmony, it becomes necessary to scrutinize closely individual efforts around the domestic fireside. We, for our part, have been, for some years, an interested "looker-on in Venice," in this very particular; and while, in our last issue, we presented an array of data, such as cannot have failed to impart a fair idea of art progress in our own city, this article may serve as a sequel to the foregoing, inasmuch as it may tend to throw still greater light upon the state of art in our midst at this very day. Philadelphia contains at this moment a large number, proportionably to its population, of lady and gentleman amateurs, whose studies and performances command the unqualified admiration of all true connoisseurs, and who, in some cases have elicited warm encomiums from such like artists as Thalberg, Gottschalk, Jaell, and others. And in substantiation thereof, need we more than advert to the recognized talents of the Misses H—, W—, E—, and others of the fairer sex; or to the splendid musical abilities of many professional and amateur gentlemen? The writer of this has latterly attended three delightful soirées, in which the performances of the above mentioned ladies, while they afforded him the liveliest gratification, simultaneously strengthened his confidence in the rapid and beneficial development of art within our own precincts. In one instance a young lady, who, four years since, rated an ordinary pot pourri à la Beyer, the uttermost limit of her progress, performed the piano parts to a trio, by Reissiger, and a Beethoven quartet with much fidelity to the text, and intelligent appreciation. In another, the evening's programme was composed of classical trios, quartets, and quintets, in each of which the hostess performed the piano parts most admirably, while she also regaled her company with such like solos as Liszt's arrangement of the overture to Wm. Tell, and Henselt's Invitation à la Valse. And in yet a third instance, a distinguished lady amateur in our midst read a classical duo for piano and violoncello, by Sterndale Bennett, with Mr. Chas. Schmitz, of this city. Other cases might be cited as tending to illustrate how private soirées are the most accurate indices of the true state of art in our midst. The private rehearsals and public performances of our Handel and Haydn and Harmonia Societies constitute another medium whereby the development of the divine art may be fairly determined; yet not so conclusive as the efforts and progress of individual amateurs within the precincts of the social circle. It is a source of the highest pleasure to find a more judicious sentiment among the majority of our teachers, in the matter of elevating the art standard, as compared to the same a few years since. Those who take an interest in this subject, cannot fail to remember how the profession was compelled to adapt its operations exclusively to the mandates and wishes of parents.

"Hurry my child up into some polkas and waltzes," was the invariable dictum of the parent, anxious to have said child figure in social reunions at the earliest possible date, "a fig for your prosy exercises!"

And thus the teacher, however his heart revolted from such a force-pump system, was compelled to sacrifice his own modus operandi to the will of his patrons. Gradually, however, a vast change has crept into social circles. With the advancing development of art, as brought about by the efforts of foreign and home artists, people at large have begun to experience more delight in a Beethoven sonata or Thalberg fantasia, than in the flippant productions of pretending dabblers; and a large proportion of parents seem perfectly willing to endure those prosy exercises, better aware than ever before of the greater benefit which must result from a perseverance with the rugged rudiments. Whoever doubts this position, has only to gain access to the many delightful private soirées constantly in progress within our midst.—Amateur's Guide, (Phil.)

CONCEITS OF CERTAIN ORGANISTS.—The taste of your organist must influence the character of your congregational singing. It is a sad reflection that your ranting organist, like your ranting preacher, is most admired by the mass of hearers. We have repeatedly heard loud praise of a performer for his wonderful execution on the instrument, when he had shown it by such feats as engraving on his chants rapid passages from "Rory O'More," or "Pop goes the weasel." Such a man may be efficient in an opera, but for church music he has no soul, nor can congregational singing ever flourish under his guidance. He is destitute of devotional feeling. "Now," says Mr. Latrobe, very justly, "of all inanimate creatures the organ is the best adapted to portray the state of mind of the individual who performs upon it. If pride and musical soporiness possess the seat of intelligence, the faithful instrument will be sure to proclaim it in the ears of the congregation. Every fond and frivolous ornament, proclaims his conceit, however he may seek to smother it under high sounding stops and loaded harmonies. A person accustomed to mark the style in which an organ is played cannot be insensible to the devotion or want of devotion of the performer—a fact worthy of the continual remembrance of every organist."

"What do you think of our organist?" asked a clerical friend of us not long ago, after his service, and waited for an answer of approbation. "My opinion is," was the astounding reply, "that he is neither more nor less than a puppy!" and immediately the gentleman himself stepped into the vestry where we were, with a doctor's hat in his hand and a silver-headed cane, and an air of unusual self-complacency. "A puppy!" said our friend after he had left, "I grant you that he is personally; but what do you think of his playing?" "That he is a greater puppy in his playing than in his person, if that be possible," was our very ungracious reply. About half a year ago we heard a somewhat celebrated organist in a go-ahead city playing all sorts of fantastic tricks with one of Tallis's sober anthems, when we ventured to inquire of him whether it would not be better to adhere to what was written. "O!" said he, shrugging his shoulders, and turning up his coat cuffs, "we go with the times here, sir! we go with the times!"

Your highflier of an organist is a pestilent fellow. He can carry with him the fanciful part of a congregation, and snap his fingers at the clergyman. It is not long since we heard a choir, under an organist of this kind, sing the "Gloria in excelsis" of Pergolesi as the congregation were leaving the church—a performance in decidedly bad taste, and of somewhat doubtful legality. "Well, James," we said to an old man who had been a famous singer in his day, and could give you interesting anecdotes about many an ancient Lancashire "Rorytory," "well, James, what do you think of this?—a fine display of skill, is it not?" "Why, sir," he replied, "the music seems grand-like; but I dunno see why Macaster Pack's omnibus has so much to do wi' it." "Pack's omnibus, James," we explained; "nothing of the kind; it is pax hominibus—it is Latin, James." "Lat'n," growled the old Protestant as he walked away—"Lat'n! waur and waur! blasts fro' Babylon, sir! blasts fro' Babylon!"—Fraser's Magazine.

AN AMERICAN PRIMA DONNA AIDING GARIBALDI.—At a concert given at Bristol, England, in aid of the Garibaldi fund, it was indebted for its clat, if not, indeed, for its origin, to the kind heartedness and patriotism of a cantatrice, who though not an Italian by birth, has won renown in what may be termed the very cradle of song—Milan. Madame Guerrabella, formerly Miss Ward, of New York, being at Clifton on a visit, and feeling her heart glow within her as she heard of the sympathy displayed by the English people on behalf of beautiful but too long oppressed Italy, generously offered an evening's services in aid of the fund being raised for the illustrious liberator; and the proffered favor being gladly accepted by the friends of Italian independence resident there, other aid was asked and secured, and the concert was arranged and announced. An English journal, in speaking of the concert, says, as might readily be supposed, Madame Guerrabella's performance constituted the principal feature of the evening. She combines with great natural attainments artistic powers of a high quality, and there is a dramatic fervor in her style which at once conveys an impression to the hearer that she would be found most at home on the lyric stage. Her voice has great compass and power, and if once or twice it seemed a little hard, we should be inclined to ascribe that circumstance to the fact of its being too voluminous an organ in so small a room. Her musicianship is undoubted, and gives her an immunity in essaying the most daring flights of fortitudo. She sang the well-known aria, "Ah forse lui che l'anima," from the "Traviata," with sweetness and expression; her rendering of the vivacious phrases of the song being particularly happy.—Horne Journal.

MUSIC IN GERMANY.—Every inquiry and research made in Germany yields, for the present, only one result so far as music is concerned. Not a name of the slenderest promise in composition is to be heard of. Even the open air bands (delight of enthusiastic English travellers unused to home music in the open air) which fifteen years ago were always giving out something new (for better for worse), must now, for overtures, recur to the weary platitudes of Reissiger and Lindpaintner, while a good new waltz, or polka, or polonaise, or mazurka, is no more to be heard. The spell of Strauss and Lanner, magicians of dance-music, has died with them. Most of all (we are assured) is the decay of the art to be felt in Vienna, in the management of whose splendid and subsidised opera-house there has been as much malversation of Imperial money as in other more important branches of Austrian finance. The German town, north or south, in which the greatest variety of operatic music may possibly now be heard, is Frankfurt. There only, during many years past, has the repertory of the theatre included Cherubini's magnificent, though difficult opera of Medea. Cherubini is elsewhere only known in opera, throughout Europe, as having written Les Deux Journées. At Frankfurt, for a Cherubini centenary, to be held this very day, his Faniaka has been announced; an opera rich in idea and science, though these were somewhat encumbered by the perverse nature of the rugged Italian to whose career, as a predominant composer, tact alone was wanting. There may come a Cherubini revival as well as a Gluck revival, though the former may possibly involve the necessity of a re-consideration, which the latter does not. Herr Silcher, one of the pleasant Swabians (and how pleasant the Swabians are as poets, singers, musicians, and comrades, from Herr Uhland downwards, every one conversant with Germany must know), is gone. His collection of national tunes should keep his name alive among all who love national music.—Musical Correspondent of the Athenaeum.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.—PROF. LOWELL MASON.—This well-known Musician has been in Chicago for several weeks, presiding over a Musical Institute. He is a decided advocate of Congregational singing in church, and has given his influence in that direction. He gave a lecture on this subject a week or more ago, in which he took the following sensible positions concerning Church music. We think all will endorse them:—

"Prof. M. was emphatic in his condemnation of all exhibitions of artistic music in connection with public worship. They were as irreverent and as much out of place as exhibitions of mere elocution in the prayers or the sermons. When he was in Dresden he inquired one Sabbath morning where he could go to church and hear the best music. 'Music,' said his host, 'you will hear no music in the churches to-day.' 'Why?' he replied with surprise, 'Is not singing a part of the public services?' 'Oh, yes, there are psalms and hymns sung, but no music. To hear music you must go to the gardens in the afternoon.' This was an important and proper distinction—music is an artistic performance—singing should be worship."

The essential requisites of good Congregational Singing are three. First, the whole congregation should enter into the spirit of the service, and let out their voices in full chorus. Secondly, they should have 'a good lead,' either a single voice, or what is better, a good choir; and Thirdly, the tunes should be simple and easy within the range of common voices, and not difficult in time. He defended the recent change of time in Old Hundred as published in some of the music books, because, first, this was the original time of the tune; it is found as far back as 1543 written in this time. And secondly, it is better adapted to keep the attention of the words than the slower movement which was introduced about 125 years ago. He did not quite convince all, however, that it is better to sing the doxology to the quick time. The slower form seems to some more reverent for a doxology.

MADAME L. GOMEZ DE WOLOWSKI, a prima donna who is said to have had great success at the Italian Opera in Vienna, as well as in Paris and Madrid, has arrived in this city, and will probably be heard in the Italian Opera before the winter is over. Her voice is described as a soprano-soprano, of extensive compass, fine quality and high cultivation, and she is said also to possess the charms of youth and beauty.—Phil. Evening Bulletin.

The little musical phenomenon, Martha S. P. Story, who has not completed her fourth year, played upon the organ in one of the churches in Essex, at public services on Sunday, Oct. 7, at the invitation of the organist. She played the first tune sung in the afternoon, accompanying the choir through the entire hymn of six stanzas, and playing the introduction and the interludes in such accurate time and with such expression and regard to pauses, that the congregation below did not for once surmise that the performance proceeded from any other person than the regular organist, who sat near her. She has now played upon the melodeon for more than a year, and is in the enjoyment of perfect health, having grown more than half a head since the commencement of her playing.—Salem Register.

PARTANT POUR LA SYRIE.—It is a well-known fact that the words of the above song, which during the last few years has enjoyed a new career of publicity, were set to music by Queen Hortense. It is not, however, so generally known, perhaps, that the instrumentation of the song was the work of an artist still living, very advanced in age, but still hale and hearty, in Germany. The ducal Capellmeister at Gotha, L. Drouet—a near relation of the postmaster at St. Menehould, who recognised and arrested the fugitive Louis XVI.—was, in his youth, a member of the band at the court of the King of Holland, and for some time music-master of Prince Louis, now Emperor of the French. It was he who scored the above song, since become so celebrated. The Emperor has not forgotten his former master, to whom, some year or two back, he forwarded a valuable golden snuff-box, set with brilliants.

MOSS-MUSIC.—"POEMS" BY SARAH GOULD.

Now radiant joy sits smiling in my breast,—
 These fragrant pinks and pansies fair, fresh culled,
 Wood Violets and Mosses, lately lulled
 In shady nooks, by rippling brooks, to rest;
 With the rich grandeur of each mossy crest
 So green and moist, the blossoms seem to lie
 With their bright hues, as lovingly they lie,
 Dasy from their own perfumes, unconfest,
 Green mosses from the brookside, mosses sweet!
 Say, have ye heard the singing of the Wren,
 The Thrush, or Blackbird, by your brook? oh, then:
 I pray you, if you can, some strain repeat:
 Bend closer still, bright mosses; now I hear,
 A bird like music, sylvan-sweet and clear.

Rimbault's History of the Piano Forte.

A musical work has just appeared in London, from the pen of Edward Rimbault, J.L. D., which gives a History of the Piano Forte and an account of the instruments of the same class which preceded it, namely, the Clavichord, the Virginal, the Spinnet, the Harpsichord, &c. As this volume relates to a branch of musical history which has not received much attention, and as the Piano Forte years ago attained the appellation of the "household orchestra," we shall make a compilation of some of its chapters, and give brief extracts from the pages.

For the true history of the Piano Forte we are carried back, as of necessity, to the wild regions of fable and mythology. Whether Mercury or Hermes invented the lyre we must ever remain in blissful ignorance; but there can be little doubt that the germ of the Piano Forte existed in the first musical instrument of stretched strings, no matter by what name called. Admitting it to have been the lyre, the advance from this primitive model to the harp is one that the imagination can compass without effort. Ages seem to have rolled away before any very sensible stride is manifest. The psaltery, dulcimer, and citole stands out in bold relief among the mediæval instruments that preceded the clavier. But what a mighty chasm yawns between! With the introduction of the clavier the Piano Forte is strongly shadowed forth. All the early instruments with keys applied, such as the clavictherium and clavichord (rectangular in shape,) seem to embalm the idea of the first square Piano Forte. The clavicymbal took another form, which subsequently grew into the harpsichord, the strings being disposed after the fashion of the harp. But, lest we should trench upon Dr. Rimbault's ground in defining the instruments of this period, we will let him speak for himself:—

"Guido is said to have invented the clavier, or keyboard; and it is not at all improbable that he was the first to apply it to the mediæval instrument of many strings; at any rate, the monochord seems to have been the same with the clavichord, and as such was the progenitor of the harpsichord, the spinnet, the virginals, and the Piano Forte of modern times."

At the end of the sixteenth century the virginal was the most popular keyed instrument in England, and was to be found in the house of almost every person of education. In the following century the virginal became common, the spinnet usurped attention, and this, in turn, gave way to the Piano Forte. The sounds of the spinnet were modified by having their wires carried over a bent bridge, whereas those of the virginal were stretched from the points of support to their screw pegs. It is quite clear that the harpsichord was only a large-sized spinnet with the addition of a second string to each note. Harpsichords were not much used in England before the latter half of the seventeenth century; it was then called the harpsicon and the harpsicol. The great power of the double string and the application of pedals to the instrument produced a wonderful reformation in the taste of the age.

The English harpsichords of the eighteenth century, notwithstanding the vast workshops of the Continent, took the lead; but just as these instruments had attained their greatest elevation, a note was sounded that predicted a thorough change in the principal of action. The quill was about to give way to the hammer; and in the course of about three years three makers, in three different nations born, put in an almost simultaneous claim for the invention of the Piano Forte. This, of course, gave rise to much disputation. Dr. Rimbault has devoted a liberal share of his pages to the examination of the merits of the various claimants, and has awarded a judgment quite in consonance with our views of the matter. He says:—

It is singular that these three ingenious men, Cristofali, Marins, and Schröter, should have conceived the same idea, within a few years of each other, and without any apparent communication or collision. But the priority is certainly due to the Italian maker, (Cristofali) whose claims are now fully established. The object of centuries was at length accomplished. The quill, pig's bristle, thorn, ivory tongue, leathern tongue, were soon to be banished. A small hammer was made to strike the string, and evoke a clear, precise, and delicate tone unheard before. The "scratch with a sound at the end of it" was doomed to a lingering fate. The harpsichord had been changed into an instrument of percussion, and it only remained for later manufacturers to perfect, extend and popularize the now "world-wide Piano Forte."

As the new instrument was viewed in the light of an innovator, its early steps were not rapid ones. There was a world of prejudice to remove, and a different mode of treatment to be adopted. In France the brothers Erard had to contend against existing interests, which at times seemed sufficiently powerful to drive them from the kingdom. But all turmoils have an end. In course of time horizontal grands, in a great measure through their agency, came into fashion. In England an impetus was given by the arrival of twelve German mechanics seeking employment, and who obtained from this circumstance the appellation of the "twelve apostles." Charles Dibdin is recorded as having been the first to perform publicly on the Piano Forte. This event occurred on the 16th of May, 1767, and is announced as follows:—

End of Act I. Miss Brickler will sing a favorite song from Judith, accompanied by Mr. Dibdin, on a new instrument called Piano Forte.

Mason, who was a poet and a musician too, paid considerable attention to the improvement of the instrument and projected models for the removal of several defects. The original scale was from F F (octave below that immediately under the base staff) up to F in alt, comprising five octaves; the first addition was of half an octave upwards to C in altissimo; then the scale was carried down to C C C. Thus by degrees the keyboard became extended. The compositions of Clementi tended very much to establish the Piano Forte in favor, while he also helped to improve the mechanism of the instrument. "The Piano Forte," says Dr. Rimbault, "was now firmly established in the public favor, and the date of Clementi's commencing manufacturer (i. e. 1800) gave the death blow to the old harpsichord."—Evening Transcript.

Music Abroad.

NORWICH FESTIVAL.—This began on Monday evening, Sept. 19, with a cheap concert, at which The Creation was given, with Mad. Novello, Sims Reeves, &c. On the next evening a miscellaneous concert was given, at which selections from Gluck's Armida were sung, and on Wednesday evening Stern-dale Bennett's Mary Queen. The Detingen Te Deum and Spohr's Last Judgment making the day programme for the day, as nearly as we can make out. On Thursday, Herr Molique's new oratorio of Abraham was performed, which is hailed as the most successful attempt at composition in this direction since Mendelssohn's Elijah.

BRUSSELS.—By the repetition of his Paris Concerts, Richard Wagner has produced a sensation here also, a fact that was inevitable, considering how the public are so satiated, as I have before mentioned, by the eternal monotony in musical matters. For a considerable length of time, his concerts were the sole topic of discussion in all the local papers, as well as in all the coffeehouses and other places of public resort. The majority of the patrons of music here have left the future to decide on the real value of Wagner's compositions, although they are convinced the composer is very anxious that his works should be appreciated by the present.

Good orchestral music is to be heard only at the concerts of the Conservatory, under the direction of M. Fétis. The band has made considerable progress during the past year.

M. Fétis does not, however, confine himself merely to classical masterpieces; so little does he exclude the productions of his contemporaries, that he performs even unpublished overtures and symphonies. It cannot, of course, be asserted that he is invariably lucky in his selection. During the last series of concerts we heard an overture to Shakespeare's Macbeth, by M. de Hartog, a Dutch composer, who resides in Paris, and composes for his own pleasure—and that of his friends!—and has already published several works. The composition of characteristic overtures to tragedies is something peculiar; the only models of this kind of writing, Beethoven's overtures to Coriolanus and Egmont, stands too high to be equalled by the efforts of mere talent, and what have we, now-a-days, among composers but talent at the very most?

Herr Meyenne, one of Fétis' newest pupils, may also, by the way, lay claim to the possession of this quality. He has now come forward, although somewhat tardily, with an unpublished symphony. It was successful, as was likewise, and perhaps more deservedly, a symphony by Samuel, which contains a great deal of originality.

There was a remarkable performance, at the last concert of the Conservatory, of the finale to the second act of Le Nozze de Figaro. Irritated at the mutilation of this magnificent piece of composition at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris, Fétis determined to let the public of Brussels—that is to say, the "small Parisian" public,—hear what was the real effect of it when played as Mozart wrote it, and he succeeded completely in carrying out his intention.

GRISI.—The report that Mad. Grisi intends to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre, proves, as we hoped it would do, for her sake, a mistaken rumor.—Athenæum.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.—This establishment is announced to commence its third season, under the management of Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison, on Monday, October the 1st.

ROTTERDAM.—A society has been formed to establish a German opera. Herr Skrus, of Prague, has been engaged as conductor, and has already arrived to enter on his new sphere of action. It is said that Mad. Prausse, from Prague, is to be the prima donna; Herr Grimminger, the tenor; Herr Brassin, the barytone; and Herr Carl Formes, the bass.

COBLENZ.—A short time since, Mlle. Marie Cruvelli gave a concert, at which she sang airs from Rossini's Tancredi, and Donizetti's Favorita, a romance from Verdi's Traviata, and two German songs by Schumann and F. Schubert. Her beautifully full alto voice and admirable style, especially in the Italian pieces, gained for her enthusiastic applause.

PARIS.—The Grand Opera still goes on with Semiramis, and the sisters Marchisio are still the life and soul of Rossini's great work. Pierre de Medicis makes an occasional appearance in the bills. Le Prophète, whose advent has been imminent for some time, is retarded by the illness of Mad. Tedesco. Meanwhile Guillaume Tell is in preparation, and Mlle. Carlotta Marchisio will sing the part of Mathilde, restoring the air and scena which had been omitted since the reduction of the opera to three acts.

Before I leave the operas let me mention that the manager of the Opéra Comique had determined to cast the part of Hoel in the Parillon, which, as I have said, he is about to produce, to Mlle. Wertimber, who had already played parts written originally for bass voices. Meyerbeer is said to have approved the arrangement. The opera in three acts by Scribe and M. Offenbach is in rehearsal, and it is to be produced with great splendor of scenery and decoration.

The Italian opera season is expected to be very brilliant this winter, and it is said the subscription list is already crowded with the highest names among the wealthy and the aristocratic.

The spirit of musical and theatrical activity last week has left us languid again. I have nothing more important to inform you of than the production of the Trouvère (Travatore) at the Grand Opera, with Michot for the first time in the part of Manrique, and Mlle. Barbara Marchisio in that of Azucena, also for the first time. Both debuts were successful, but especially the latter. The fine contralto voice of Mlle. Barbra, and her power of expressing deep emotion, brought out the characteristics of the gipsy mother with great force. M. Michot was much applauded in such passages as demand feeling and tenderness, but in the more vigorous portions he was not quite up to the mark. The Opéra Comique gave last Monday a representation extraordinaire for the benefit of the Christians in Syria. The bill was of the most miscellaneous composition, commencing with the Chaises à porteurs, followed by L'Etoile du Nord (first act), Ma Tante Dort (transplanted from the Théâtre Lyrique), the second act of Fra Diavolo, a scena and duo from Chateau Trompette, and three pieces from the Parillon. A new opera in three acts is about to be put into rehearsal at this house. The music is by M. Victor Massé, and the book by M. Dumanoir, who gives to his work the title of Le Lutrin.

I have already informed you how the company of the forthcoming Italian Opera here is composed. The opening night is fixed for the 2nd of October, and the first opera produced will be La Sonnambula, with Mlle. Ratta and Signor Gardoni in the principal parts. The next opera will be Flotow's Maria, in which Mario, Grazini, and Mlle. Edenska, the new contralto, will sing. I hear from Milan that M. Bottesini's opera, Il Assedio di Firenze, has at length been produced there, but did not meet with a very enthusiastic reception. The composer was applauded, but not called for at the end of the performance. The blame is kindly laid by my informant on the feebleness of the execution. Another young composer, M. Cagnori, author of the famous Don Bucefalo, has had a new opera performed at the Scala with great success. It is entitled Il Vecchio della Montagna. Mad. Carvalho has made her first appearance at Berlin in Il Barbiere, and she has made such an impression on the German critics that they proclaim her the Jenny Lind of France. It is a proof with how little disturbance of the ordinary course of things the Neapolitan revolution has been effected, that in the midst of the Liberator's triumph and the king's flight, a new opera has been produced by Signor Petrella. It is called Il folletto di Greasy, and met with the most brilliant success, the composer being called before the curtain, I am told, at least twenty times.

An interesting discovery has just been made in the royal library of Munich, consisting of an autograph piece by Mozart, not hitherto known to exist, and of which there is no mention in any list of his compositions. It is an Italian air for a soprano to words commencing Fra cento affanni e cento. From the inscription it bears, this air would appear to have been written by Mozart while at Milan, in the year 1770, when he was only fourteen years of age, and while his fourth dramatic composition, Mitridate di Ponto, was being played with striking success.

The Paris correspondent of a Belgian paper relates how a considerable stir is being made in diplomatic circles here, in order to have another posthumous work of the Russian composer Bortniansky performed. The Prince W—— is said to be at the head of this movement, and in order to popularise the music of this composer he is about to organize a number of concerts; to which end he has sent for a Russian choral society composed of artists whose execution is said to be unrivalled throughout the world. The Greek Church allows no musical instruments to be used in its religious services, and the choristers are therefore accustomed to execute pieces without accompaniment. It is only in Russian churches that the contra basso voice, less rare in Russia than elsewhere, is employed, the compass of which extends to the lower A, two notes below the C a vide of the violoncello. The effect of these voices singing an octave below the basses is beyond conception. They are, in fact, human double basses. In the choral troop brought to Paris by Prince W. are several of these contra bassi, among whom one in particular, M. Ivan Norrowine, enjoys a high reputation, and is destined, it is said, to make quite a sensation. The opera of Bortniansky, which it is sought to get performed in Paris, was found, it is said, among his papers. The libretto is by the celebrated Russian poet, Pouschkin. Several unaccompanied choruses occur in this opera, and these are the choruses which will be performed at the concert in question. Bortniansky occupied the post of chapel-master to the Emperor of Russia from 1782 to 1826, when he died. His music is chiefly dependent for its effect on the employment of choral masses, with all the resources of which he was thoroughly acquainted.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the 42d Psalm: "As the Hart Panta." By Mendelssohn.

Music Here and Elsewhere.

There is absolutely nothing to be chronicled of what has been done musically here. The disjointed parts of the various opera companies are giving operas and concerts in various parts of the country, but none of them come near us or give any promise of doing so. But, as they give no promises, they will have none to break.

Those, however, on whom we depend, and never in vain, for the regular home supply of the best music, seem to be stirring in good earnest. Their promises are never broken, and we know what to expect when we read their announcements.

First, the Handel and Haydn Society are in the field, offering us the best of the good things in their repertory. They ask, however, the guarantee of a subscription large enough to cover the expenses of a series of concerts, and no one can deem this request unreasonable. Having the advantages on the one hand of age and long established reputation, and on the other the advantage of the life and enterprise and fresh voices of its younger members, this Society has the means of giving performances in no respect inferior to those that have given it its reputation, and equal, if not superior, to any thing of the kind that can be heard in this country. For the particulars of their scheme for the coming season, we refer to their advertisement.

Then comes the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with the announcement of its twelfth season, to commence about the twentieth of the present month, for which their subscription lists are open at the music stores. The regular patrons of the Club need only this intimation to ensure their names being placed upon the lists at once. The concerts are to be given in the new and beautiful saloon of the Chickering, which will more than make good the loss of the old one in the Masonic Temple, which had become so endeared to all lovers of good music among us.

The Quintette Club have already commenced their soirées at private houses in Cambridge. There is no way so pleasant of hearing good music as this sociable way, in the midst of your own friends and neighbors, in your own parlors. This is the time to make arrangements for such parlor concerts among circles of personal friends and acquaintances, and we would call the attention of our readers in the city and its vicinity to the fact.

We learn that Dr. S. Parkman Tuckerman has been appointed organist at St. Paul's Church in this city. No one among us has given more attention to Church Music, especially to that of the English Church, than Dr. Tuckerman. He is also a most finished organist, and our readers doubtless will recollect with pleasure his agreeable letters, "A Tour among Organs," published in a former volume of the Journal of Music.

So having looked at the promises for the future at home, let us glance at what has actually been done elsewhere.

M. FLOTOW, the author of "Martha," "Alessandro Stradella," &c., is now engaged upon the score of a new opera, the libretto of which is written by M. Emile Pohl.

FLORENZA, who was well known here as a baritone singer in one of the Italian opera troupes a year or two ago, has arrived in Paris.

The German "Handel Society" has just delivered to its subscribers the 7th volume of the works of the great composer, which contains Semele, an oratorio composed by him in 1743, in the space of one month; the first performance took place Feb. 10, 1744; the text is taken from an old tragedy. To the full score is added a piano arrangement, by Richter.

NAPLES.—The order of the Dictator opens the theatres again. Madame Bina-Steffenone has been engaged and the barytone Guicciardi.

Franz Liszt has made a very brilliant arrangement for the piano of Meyerbeer's Schiller.

Marsch.—Thalberg has lately arrived in Paris.—Alfred Jaell is in Vienna.

M. J. Lotaky, who has long resided in Australia, has brought thence a National hymn, the origin of which is attributed to the Aborigines. It is said to have a fine melody, of very original character, and is shortly to be published. We hope it is better than the music of our aborigines.

TRIESTE.—The theatre opened for the season with I Puritani. Mad. Ortolani, "of the sweet and silvery voice," being prima donna. Tiberini, "the delicious tenor, and Beneventano, the barytone, justly celebrated in Europe and America" taking the principal parts.

VIENNA.—The Court Opera has taken up La Juive of Halévy, Wachtel singing the role of Eleazar. A Prussian architect, M. Langhaus, has made the plans for a new theatre for this city which, if they should be carried out, will give Vienna the largest and most beautiful theatre in the world.

BERLIN.—Here Madame Cash has had good success as Valentine in the Huguenots. (Would not this lady be an acquisition to some of our American companies at this time?)

For the anniversary of the birth of Schiller (Nov. 10) at the theatre of the Court opera, the cantata and march written by Meyerbeer for the great festival at Paris of the last year. During the march the principal personages that figure in the dramas of Schiller will be grouped upon the stage, a dialogue will then be recited written for the occasion by M. Pfan, and the performance will close with the cantata. Mad. Miolau-Carvalho continues her triumphs here, having sung in the Barber and Lucia, with immense success. Some critics say that her voice lacks volume and that she leaves something to be desired in situations that require passion and energy, but they agree with the general public which admits that no cantatrice has ever been heard in Berlin, possessing in so high a degree the true art of singing and who vocalizes in a manner so facile and so brilliant. It should not be forgotten that this public has heard Mad. Sontag and Jenny Lind.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The Italian opera opened Sept. 23 with the Prophet, sung by Tamberlik, Mad. Nantier-Didiés and Mad. Dottini. The house was crowded, and Meyerbeer's chef d'œuvre was received, as usual with the most enthusiastic applause. Mad. Lagrua made her reentrée as Norma, in which she won laurels last year. Tamberlik replaced Mongini, who, it is said, will not return to St. Petersburg, and Mad. Bernardi sang the part of Adalgisa, Debassini took that of Orovoso, which was too high for Marini.

SAN FRANCISCO—ESCOTT.—The opera season of the English troupe in this city has come to an end. Mrs. Escott was the prima donna of the company and appears to have made quite an excitement. We find in the S. F. Herald of Sept. 18 the following report of the last performance:—

At the end of the first act, Mr. William Lyster appeared with Madame Escott, and presenting her a splendid gold enamelled watch, ornamented with diamond sprigs and a superb chain, spoke to the following effect:

"Madame Escott—I am commissioned by a number of your friends and admirers to present you with this beautiful and valuable gift, as a feeble expression of their admiration for you as an artist, and regard for you as a lady. I also avail myself of the occasion to tender you my heartfelt thanks for your untiring exertions and great merit as prima donna of my company, and beg to add my felicitations upon the unequivocal success which has attended your efforts." Madame Escott, quite excited at the unlooked-for compliment, returned her acknowledgments in pretty much the following terms: "Mr. Lyster—I beg you to convey to the gentlemen, in whose behalf you now act, my most heartfelt acknowledgments for the precious and elegant gift, and assure them that it will ever be regarded by me with sentiments of profound appreciation and gratitude. Permit me also to return you my cordial thanks for your undeviating kindness and gentlemanly conduct toward myself from the time of leaving New York to the present moment." Then, turning to the audience, Madame Escott continued: "Ladies and Gentlemen—The memory of your many favors and repeated expressions of kindly feeling, will ever be cherished by me with truest gratitude. I thank you from the innermost recesses of my heart."

NEW YORK, OCT. 29th.—The musical season commenced last week, very unexpectedly, with a series of operas in which the principal parts were taken by Mme. Fabbri, Formes, and Stigeli. It can be imagined that with these three no representation could be bad, or even indifferent. But Robert le Diable, with which the season opened, was not as well given as it might have been. Formes, evidently presumed on his position of favorite with the public, and took no pains to overcome his old fault of false intonation, which has rather increased than diminished. Fabbri, as Alice, was pains-taking, as she always is, but the rôle was evidently new to her. Stigeli was the only one who was really good throughout. On Friday the same artists appeared in Martha, and the charming little opera went off with a spirit that made everybody enjoy it. The only thing to be regretted was the substitution of d'Ormy for pretty little Borkel in the part of Nancy. Her great, gaunt figure, and bold manner, was very inappropriate for the arch little soubrette, and she seemed to feel this, too, to judge from the stiffness of her acting at times. To-night the Huguenots are to be given, and for Wednesday the Freyschütz is announced.

Concerts are also commencing. On Thursday one was given for the début of Carlotta Patti, an elder sister of little Adeline. The young lady has a pleasing exterior, a fine voice, and excellent training; she sang several Italian airs very well, and was very flatteringly received. She was assisted by several artists of our standing Italian troupe; Brignoli, Ferri, etc., and Mr. Saar, who played several pieces of his own, fantasies on Rigoletto, and the "Abendstern" from Tannhäuser, an Etude, and his arrangement of Mozart's Minuet from the E flat symphony. The concert was well attended, and altogether successful. One cannot help wondering where will be the end of this talented Patti family. Its name seems to be Legion, and if it continues to turn out an artist every year or two, we shall fairly be flooded with Patis and Barilis.

To-morrow night Mason and Thomas give their first Soiree. Many of their hearers will rejoice that they have returned to Dodworth's charming little hall, where the music sounds twice as well as in all other rooms of similar size. The performance for to-morrow consists of a Trio by Beethoven, a Quartet by Schubert, Piano Quintet by Schumann, and a Piano solo.

The Philharmonic Society have had two rehearsals, and give their first concert on the tenth of next month. The orchestral pieces are Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Beethoven's second Overture to Lenore, and Mendelssohn's Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt.

NEW YORK.—The Tribune speaks thus of the début of Miss Fanny (Natali) Heron.

"A word must, however, be said concerning the début of Miss Fanny Heron. Her voice is a contralto, with a tendency to the mezzo soprano, rich in quality, full in tone, and remarkably fresh. She has also a sufficient facility in execution; and an excellent method. Her knowledge of stage business is very good, and her performance generally was marked by a rare intelligence. The part of the Page is an ungracious one for a débutante, the costume usually worn being, to say the least, not becoming to most women. In almost any other character, Miss Heron would have appeared to even greater advantage, than in the one she last night filled, and that, under the circumstances, she made so decided a success, shows clearly that she is an artist of great ability and much promise."

Jenny Lind Goldschmidt has just returned to England from a visit of some weeks to her native city of Stockholm, where she was cordially received by her friends, from whom she had been absent several years. Her successor upon the musical stage of Sweden, Louise Michal, whom the Swedish critics agree in considering little if any inferior, has lately been married to her cousin, and in imitation of her predecessor, now signs her name Louise Michal Michaeli.—N. O. Delta.

Miss Pyne and Mr. Harrison commenced their season of English opera at Covent Garden, London, on the 1st inst., with William Vincent Wallace's "Lurline." The house was crowded from the floor to the ceiling with a most enthusiastic audience. Mr. Henry Wharton, Miss Loffler, and Miss Albertazzi, were the new additions to the company. Miss Loffler, who possesses a fine contralto voice, is said to be a great addition to it.

THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES.—Many of our readers doubtless recollect a stout, plethoric German, with flushed and austere features—indicating a somewhat unisatiric turn of mind—who might have been seen promenading Chestnut street, a few years since, with measured tread, and clutching nervously a stout cane; airing himself upon the fashionable thoroughfare, or perchance dropping in at the music stores to gather the latest musical on dits. That individual was Charles Zeuner, a pupil and follower of J. N. Hummel—a man of large European reputation, and one of the profoundest theorists in this country. Later in life, this tone-master allowed his mind to become filled with spiritualistic hallucinations, even unto the distraction of the same; and he perished wretchedly at his own hands, during an aberration of mind of unusual violence. Without any next of kin, his property (about $15,000) reverted, as we have been informed, to Camden County, N. J., of which he had been a resident. Parenthetically, a snug outfit this might have proved to some worthy, struggling musicians; or to the impoverished widows and children of many an art-servant, who after a life of enthusiastic devotion and self sacrifice to the most refining of all professions, sank down into his grave, unrequited and unappreciated. No doubt the unfortunate Zeuner, in the healthy possession of his faculties, would have bequeathed his worldly goods in some such beneficent manner.

His musical library and MS. compositions were put up at sale in Camden and are now scattered to the four winds, in various hands. Mr. Wm. A. Newland, a musician for many years identified with the development of music in our midst, secured a score of the "Feast of Tabernacles," an oratorio of great merit; and discovering in each of its component parts, evidences of the splendid genius of its author, he has placed it in rehearsal, with a view to a public performance on Nov. 16th. Mr. Newland has kindly allowed us to peruse the score, and we can safely promise to those who may attend the concert, a musical entertainment of no ordinary character. The bass solos and choruses are fully equal to many from the greatest masters. Those who desire to realize fully what manner of man passed from our midst, when the words "Chas. Zeuner has shot himself" startled the community, will have an excellent opportunity in the concert thus announced.—Amateur's Guide, (Philadelphia.)

This was originally brought out in Boston some twenty-five years ago. The poem which Mr. Zeuner set to music being by the late Rev. Henry Ware, Jr. Many of our older readers will recollect it.

BUFFALO SANGERBUND.—At the election of officers for this Society, held last week, the following gentlemen were unanimously re-elected to office: Director, Wilhelm Braun; President, Otto Schuggens; Vice-President, A. Holzhausen; Secretary, C. Bruehl; Treasurer, H. Doerffel. The Society now consists of a hundred and twenty-seven members.

SINGING.—The following from an Animadversion on the Church Music, written by Aelredus, Abbot of Rivaux, in Yorkshire, who died, A. D., 1166, so well describes the kind of singing we too often hear, that we reprint it in the hope that some singers may have the power given them "to see themselves as others see them."

"Let me speake now of those who, under the shew of religion, doe usurpe those things for the service of their vanity, which the ancient Fathers did profitably exercise in their types of future things. Whence then, I pray, all types and figures now ceasing, whence hath the Church so many Organs and Muscical Instruments? To what purpose, I demand, is that terrible blowing of Belloes, expressing rather the crackes of thunder, than the sweetness of a voyce? To what purpose serves that contraction and inflection of the voyce? This man sings a base, this a small meane, another a treble, a fourth divides and cuts asunder, as it were, certaine middle notes. One while the voyce is strained, anon it is remitted, now againe it is dashed, and then againe it is enlarged with a lower sound. Sometimes, which is a shame to speake, it is enforced into an horse's neighings; sometimes, the masculine vigor being laid aside, it is sharpened into the shrillnesse of a woman's voyce; now and then it is writhed, and retorted with a certaine artificiall circumsolution. Sometimes thou mayest see a man with an open mouth, not to sing, but as it were, to breathe out his last gaspe, by shutting in his breath, and by a certaine ridiculous interception of his voyce, as it were to threaten silence, and now againe to imitate the agonies of a dying man, or the extasies of such as suffer."

In the meantime, the whole body is stirred up and downe with certaine histrionical gestures: the lips are wroathed, the eyes turne round, the shoulders play, and the bending of the fingers doth answer every note. And this ridiculous dissolution is called religion; and where these things are most frequently done, it proclaimed abroad that God is there honorably served. In the meantime, the common people standing, trembling and astonished, admire the sound of the Organs, the noyse of the Cymbals and muscical instruments, the harmony of the Pipes and Cornets; but yet looke upon the gesticulations of the singers, the meretricious alternations, interchanges, and inflections of the voyces, not without derision and laughter; so that a man may thinke that they came not to an oratory or to a house of prayer, but to a theatre; not to pray, but to gaze about them; neither is that dreadfull majesty feared before whom they stand, etc. Thus, this Church singing, which the holy Fathers have ordained that the weak might be stirred up to piety, is perverted to the use of unlawful pleasure, i. e., the vanity of the singers.—Banner of the Cross.

The scheme for the nineteenth season of the Philharmonic Society of New York is published. It comprises five concerts, which will take place on the 10th of November, the 22d of December, the 2d of February, the 16th of March, and the 20th of April. Each concert will be preceded by two afternoon rehearsals, and one which will take place in the morning. The former will commence at 3 1-2 o'clock, and the latter at 10 o'clock. Those for the first concert will occur on the afternoons of October 10 and 24, and on the morning of November 10. The first programme will include Robert Schumann's Symphony, No. 2, in C; Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora," No. 2, in C (first time); and Mendelssohn's Overture in D, "A Calm Sea and Happy Voyage." The rehearsals and concerts will take place at the Academy of Music. The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Theodore Eisfeld.—N. Y. Tribune.

Miss Kellogg, who made a kind of a debut at a matinee last season, in New York, will make her first formal appearance in opera during the present fall. She has been vigorously prosecuting her studies of late, and may be seen almost nightly at the Academy, listening and learning as hard as she can, while the great prima donnas display their different styles. Miss Kellogg's friends, and they are legion, predict for her a brilliant career.—N. O. Picayune.

The Conductor, Muzio's opera of Una Scomezia, written expressly for Patti, Brignoli, Ferri and Susini, will be produced at the Academy of Music during the present month.—Ibid.

For next year, on dit, Mr. Ullmann has engaged the famous London prima donna, Czillag; for 1862, Johanna Wagner and the sisters Marchisio. It is understood that Gye, of Covent Garden, having lost Mario, wishes to retain Tamberlik, so that his American engagement will probably go over to September, 1861.—Ibid.

Ullmann, besides Jenny Ney, above mentioned, has engaged Signorina Inclini, (why will she not be native and democratic enough to call herself plain Miss Hinckley,) the new American star on the lyric stage in Italy, to be here in the commencement of November, while the famous contralto, M<sup>me</sup>. D'Angri, is upon her way. Also, Carl Formes's brother, William, a baritone.

The Brooklyn Academy of Music is now nearly completed, externally; and (the New York Tribune says) it makes a much finer appearance than we supposed it could, judging from the elevation of the architect. But no one would imagine from any external indications that it was a building devoted to music and the fine arts. It is the most massive looking and imposing structure in Brooklyn, and there is none on this side of the East River that look so much like a monastic or collegiate building. Keeping out of view the purposes for which it is intended, it is a noble piece of architecture. We hope that some amends will be made in the interior decorations for its external solemnity.

M<sup>me</sup>. Anna Bishop has returned from her Southern and Western tour, and at last accounts is enjoying herself in the country near New York.—N. O. Picayune.

General Washington's Harpsichord, now the property of the Mount Vernon Association, has lately been re-varnished and repaired. It is a singular looking affair, about ten feet long, and varying from four feet to eighteen inches in width. It was sent on Friday to Mount Vernon, so that the Prince saw it.

SHEPHERDS' CHORUS.—The Ranz des Vaches echo from every Alpine height; but no idea can be conveyed in words of the peculiarity of these mountain choruses. They are not tunes or melodies, and are not governed by the ordinary rules of music; yet they have rules, and in their native air are thrilling beyond description. There is very little motion of the lips or mouth, and the breathing is scarcely perceptible. Their character varies in different parts of Switzerland, and corresponds to the character of the people, and also of individuals, being gay and lively, or sad and melancholy, with the temperament of the singer and the occasion which calls them forth. Sometimes two or three sing together, and keep time and tune, but it is not usual. It is the song of the solitary shepherd on the hills, and invented not for communication with men, but with the animals, who are his life-companions. The literal translation of the French and German word is cow rows, and evidently refers to the manner in which the cows arrange themselves when coming at its call. Those who are in the habit of marching farthest have bells, and the moment they hear the kührei they wend their steps homeward, and are followed by all in a row.—Cottages of the Alps.

The following is a list of the opera company which has been engaged for the Tacon theatre, Havana, for the approaching season. The prime donne are Lotti, Fanny Natali and Volpiti; contralto, Triex, Natali; tenor, Pausani, Volpani and Testa; baritone, Cresci and Manousi; bassi, Biati, and Rocco.

Two concerts given, by Camillo Sivori, the great violinist, at Milan, in aid of the cause of Garibaldi, produced fifteen thousand francs, (three thousand dollars,) which have been forwarded to the victorious commander.

THE LIBERATOR AND THE LEVELLER.—We hear from Paris that great preparations are being made for the production of Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera. The only person in Paris, to judge from the newspapers, who likes Herr Wagner's music (of which specimens, it may be remembered, were presented to the Parisians a few months since in a series of some half dozen concerts) is the Emperor Napoleon. The Emperor has had several interviews with Herr Wagner, and the result is that he is charmed with his music; though it is scarcely probable that at these interviews Herr Wagner either sang or played to his Majesty. On the other hand, it is satisfactory to know that Herr Wagner is charmed with the Emperor Napoleon. The Emperor has directed that no expense shall be spared in putting Tannhäuser on the stage in a style worthy of the great Republican and German Unitarian who composed it; and Herr Wagner has shown his appreciation of the great Liberator of oppressed nationalities by introducing into his perfect chrysolite of an opera the meretricious and altogether foreign element of a ballet, so as to qualify it for production at the Académie. This is very civil on both sides; and, even if Tannhäuser does not succeed in Paris) which, however, it must do if enough money is spent on it), the French Emperor will be sure to have some sort of success in Germany—that is to say, among the party to which Herr Wagner belongs, and over which he has an influence which will not appear unaccountable to those who have read any of his writings. We wonder what Napoleon I. would have thought of Herr Wagner's operas—supposing that he had heard them at a moment when there was no question about the possession of the Rhine country. He liked Méhul's Imto, which was written in the Italian style, but not Méhul's other operas; and, when he was asked why he had not appointed Chorabini director of his concerts, replied—ignominiously, but with a meaning that some will understand—that it was "because he liked music, not noise." It suits Napoleon III. just now to pretend that he likes noise, not music. However, we will say no more about Tannhäuser, until it is brought out at the Royal English Opera—which, it is said now, will open the first week in October.—Illustrated Times.

THE SIFFLEURS IN PARIS.—The late Parisian papers speak of a singular association which is organizing in that city, under the significant title of the "Blackbird's Club." It is actually composed of twenty young gentlemen, whose number may be increased to thirty, and who will distribute themselves, by bands of six, eight or ten, to attend all the principal performances of the theatres in the French capital. Their aim is to restore the whistle in all its pristine prerogatives, and to crush the organization of paid claqueurs who applaud so tremendously the artists whom they black mail, and the pieces, the authors of which are in their good graces. The blackbirds, who are all gentlemen of taste, and very well posted up about dramatic literature, will go to the theatres at the club's expense, and scatter themselves in the house two by two, in order to whistle or applaud according to their individual spontaneous best judgment, and without the least semblance of a preconcerted plan. But they will whistle only at the end of acts, for fear of troubling the performance.

At the last meeting of the club, an important question was the order of the day. What kind of whistle would the blackbirds use? Some were for a screaming one; but the majority decided in favor of a mellow one, thinking that their right was to criticize, but without offering any kind of provocation. We think that the Parisian theatres, pestered with low stipended claqueurs, will be highly benefited by the new organization; and as for the artists and authors whose misfortune may be to hear the almost forgotten sound, they may at least comfort themselves with the thought that they have paid nothing for their whistles.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Far away, my thoughts are far away.

Mrs. Bloede. 25

A taking song, written with more than common ability and offering many nice points to the singer.

Jeanie Wilton. Scotch Ballad. McNaughton. 25

The happy talent of the composer has already furnished the home-circle with many charming ballads, which will secure this very pretty new one a friendly reception.

I am thinking of my mother. L. Marshall. 25

A nice sentimental song. Easy.

Ever my spirit lingers with thee. Glover. 25

A song, which will be popular. It calls the popular "Ever of thee" pleasantly to mind, not on account of any plagiarism in the melody, but because of the similarity in the general construction and the excellency of the whole composition.

Instrumental Music.

Intermede Ball. New Dance. 35

With full music and figures as agreed on by the leading masters of the terpsichorean art in Paris.

Song of the Page, in the "Huguonots." Transcribed by Otto Dresel. 35

The well-known, beautiful Arie d'Entrée as a captivating piano piece. The peculiar difficulty of transferring all the beauties of an elaborate score to the piano, which is denied the power of "singing," are nicely overcome. The reputation of the composer is such, that something very fine may be expected.

La Rêve de Bonheur (Dream of happiness) Waltzes. Camille Schubert. 50

Very brilliant, yet only moderately difficult. Schubert is to Paris, what Strauss is to Vienna, or D'Albert to London. When the Parisians waltz, the music, in nine cases out of ten, is by Schubert. These sparkling waltzes are not yet as widely known here as they deserve to be.

Toast Galop. Arranged by Carl Zerrahn. 25

A favorite galop which promises to be very popular during the ensuing season.

Don Pasquale. Grande Fantaisie brillante. C. Voss. 75

One of Voss's best arrangements, of the difficulty of his Fantasias on Martha and Traviata. Players of some experience will not need to practice much on them.

First set of Mazurkas. J. Mikel. 50

Composed for the introduction of a new Mazurka step, taught in Paris, the full description of which is given with the music.

Books.

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP. A collection of Choice Tunes and Hymns for Prayer, Class and Camp Meetings, Choirs and Congregational Singing. 50

A very compact and convenient 12mo. volume of words and music for the Methodist Church, and one that will prove quite welcome for public and private use. It contains nearly 300 pages of the best hymns and tunes, most of which are standard old favorites and the remainder those that will soon become such.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Bach and Mendelssohn

FROM A SOCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

II.

Music and Polished Society.

To this portrait of the worthy German citizen and musician of the eighteenth century, we may oppose the sketch of a real son of the nineteenth; of a man, who belonged to "polished society" as much as Bach was a member of the citizen class — who possessed an appreciation of Bach, difficult to exceed: who was inspired and strengthened in the study of Bach's works, and who yet forms a direct contrast to the old master in his social and artistic personality.

Let us take twenty years ago. In the musical present the romantic school reigned like an elderly queen, who took little heed of her rising nobility, a musical "young Germany" that, like its literary branch in Paris, began to gain ground, with Meyerbeer as leader; he who strove, by means of every allurements, daring mixture of style, and distended forms, to bring new substance into the sentimental character of Weber and Spohr; while the enticing melodies of Rossini and Bellini were sounded through all Germany.

About that time there appeared a young man, whose aim attracted attention on account of its rarity; he cared little for Paris or Italy, passed over Mozart and Haydn, and went back industriously, of his own accord, to what Handel and Bach had written. He gave to the old forms of these powerful but austere masters, a more flexible form, a newer life; and strove to bring back the old, chaste earnestness to the music that had grown so frivolous. He even smuggled into the concert room the artistic woof of counterpoint, which had become, to the majority of musicians, a secret, like the lost art of Gothic architecture. But he did not stand still at pure, interwoven form; he wished to become a tone-poet, imbued with the spirit of his time; and all that "young Germany" called its own, rang through his classic forms in a wonderfully charming, intelligible, even coquettish, and sometimes peculiarly contradictory manner.

Then some of the connoisseurs turned up their noses; said they, "He is an uncommon man — what a pity that he is only an exception, a speciality." They meant to say that he was like one of those lovely flowering trees, that stand alone, and bear no fruit.

Twenty years have passed; we have buried, but not forgotten, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. With the word "speciality" his peculiar position is expressed. He has penetrated, not here or there alone, but all musical Germany has been more or less infected with this Mendelssohnian "speciality"; it did not break for itself a broad and sudden way, but penetrated through like a fine, busy May rain, and that, we all know, penetrates very deeply. Mendelssohn did not make "a sensation," with any single work, like Meyer-beer; yet he was hardly dead, when general consent pronounced him the greatest composer among all his contemporaries. In this our composer is alone among all musicians of later times. And what did he principally write? What others will not write, because people will not listen, works for the church, oratorios, cantatas, symphonies, quartets, and sonatas. Many German composers write such works from an impulse they cannot repress, yet with the painful conviction that such compositions must for ever sleep in their desks. Mendelssohn was almost the only fortunate one, who dared to write in this true form of the German spirit, and who brought out and published, even, such serious works: in his last days, he commanded music and the public, as a genial master always should, but so rarely succeeds in doing. He was too prudent not to fall in with the taste of his time, and too proud to let his concessions be plainly perceived. He often composed like a tone diplomatist. At last, certainly, it was no longer necessary for him to work diplomatically, for his own "speciality" had become the taste of the day, and hundreds followed in Mendelssohn's path, consciously or unconsciously; while now, there is not a singing society, in any country village, that does not hold it as a point of honor, to practice Mendelssohn's choruses — "the learned" Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn was the first composer for a very long period, who fixed German musical taste in a certain direction. A topography of German musical life would be quite in accordance with the spirit of the age. For our composers, unfortunately, allow themselves to be more conveniently grouped according to mountain-chains and river-valleys, than according to their artistic differences. Our musical particularity exceeds that of politics, for it is far more fortuitous and arbitrary than the latter. We have the music of Berlin, Leipzig, Vienna, Hamburg, &c.; but German music has become an idea, like the German kingdom. Since Mendelssohn's death, it cannot be said of any young composer, that he has a German public. Only two song-writers, and a few mediocre talents in the light operatic style have become popular. Robert Schumann is regarded, in the Elb territory, as a Messiah, at least by his companions in aim and opinion, but the Thuringian forest is the boundary of his fame. How many south and west Germans know anything of Schumann's greater works? I am no admirer of Schumann's muse, but while I wish that he had found correct critical appreciation, I also wish that people would learn to know him more generally. Richard Wagner is an art-extravaganza, but still a phenomenon who must be taken notice of. But how many musicians, how many operatic stages, always excepting a narrow circle, have taken notice, practical notice of his creations? Hebbel is something such a literary phenomenon. Almost every great theatre has experimentalized with his dramas, not to expound his literary tendencies, but because they held it as a point of honor, to take notice of this original poet. Such points of honor are scarce in the musical world. The difficulty of hearing one of Wagner's operas, has excited curiosity about them, much more powerfully than the combined forces of Wagner's own pamphlets and his friend Liszt's extravagant declamation could have done.

We have, then, lost a centralization of musical literature. The position of our poetic literature is consistent, compared with this division. The lyrists of Austria, Lenau, Grün, Zedlitz, &c. are as well recognized as our native born poets. Side by side with these lyrists, a group of Austrian song composers may be not unworthily placed. But with the exception of the weakest and most superficial among them, their names have scarcely reached the north; and yet we remember a notice that was given out, some years ago, by one of the first Viennese publisher, to the effect that he only published "Austrian music!"

Mendelssohn's lyrics alone, have become naturalized in every German country.

There are half a dozen "exchanges" for German opera. Berlin for the north-east, Hamburg for the north west, Frankfort for the south-west, &c. Success in one of these places secures the run of a new work — not in Germany — but in the valley, or mountain chain, which contains the subject cities of either of these exchanges. Here is musical topography again. An opera is brilliantly successful in the Frankfort state and sandstone system, while in the Munich chalk system, it falls to the ground. Germany no longer possesses a musical metropolis. At the close of the eighteenth century, Vienna held this position; earlier, Leipzig, Dresden, Hamburg, and other cities. Musical localities are growing more and more illiberal. He who would move musical Germany must find the Archimedian point, upon which to place the lever, outside of his own limits. Meyerbeer found this point in Paris. His success brought a number of German composers to believe, that in order to conquer German opinion, they must be, musically speaking, untrue to Germany.

Even in church music, which was once centralized even to torpidity, this division of interests is displayed. On a field, where even the great mistress of centralization, the catholic church, found it impossible to neutralize, how can we hope to succeed? Every cantor, every organist, every cathedral chapel-master arranges his preludes, motets, masses, and Ave Marias for himself, and no one troubles himself about others. How can a common artistic aim be built up on such a foundation?

And yet Mendelssohn did this. He created a universal movement in musical Germany, although he rested his lever on Germany itself.

But this was only possible to Mendelssohn, on account of the peculiar position which he occupied in the social and musical world. He was the first musician who made music purposely for "cultivated society" — in the good sense of those words. He was not a gnarled, self-concentrated German burgher, like Bach, but an accomplished, many gifted, many sided, refined man, accustomed to the highest society, personally known throughout nearly all Germany, and sought for in select circles. What an immense contrast between him and the old musician of the preceding century! And so Mendelssohn wrote in the spirit of this "polished society," that now, levelling and mediating, runs through every class. He rendered the ancient forms of chamber music more elegant and smooth, he restrained the æsthetic negligence of modern saloon pieces; he enlivened sacred composition with a spirit of subjective inward feeling; and one may truly say that Mendelssohn's chamber, concert, and church music may be successfully produced in refined social circles. And this is the leveling spirit of modern cultivation. A church piece, by Bach, would be profaned by an after-tea representation; but a church composition of Mendelssohn's would not be profaned at all, while it would elevate the mood of the tea-party. Mendelssohn is always spiritual, and careful in the form he selects. When he first appeared, it was something quite new to meet with an elegant modern musician, whose works could be enjoyed by a scientific connoisseur, without continually meeting some error in musical logic, or in proportion of form; a musician who set songs to music, without choosing only the most simple of texts; who wrote chamber music that was not tiresome, and saloon pieces that were not frivolous; a tone-poet of Jewish descent, who did not Judaize in his manner of writing, like nearly all the favorite Christian composers of the day.

It is the north-German, many-sided cultivation, which in our day is gradually smoothing itself, and casting off its rough national peculiarities, that has found its musical expression in Mendelssohn.

In little and isolated effects Mendelssohn was new and peculiar, but not in the great and the entire; he has not created any new species of musical form, but has reformed, and intelligently extended the old. Even in this the spirit of modern "polished society" is mirrored. Mendelssohn possessed the sure æsthetic and historic knowledge of each particular character that best suited any single musical form, and worked according to his conviction with the certainty of the learned master. Defiant self-will, hectoring upon the rights of its subjective geniality, and breaking the bonds of custom and tradition, is entirely foreign to him. Beethoven, in the "don nobis pacem" of his missa solennis, insists upon teaching us theological Germans, by means of a trumpet duet, that one may entreat God for peace, with trumpets and drums. Berlioz has imitated him in a Requiem, where he prays the Lord to give rest to the departed, with the great trumpet. Joseph Haydn, in the childlike joy of his heart, writes a Kyrie eleison, to which one might dance. Mendelssohn knew nothing about such bold touches of true or false geniality. He knew that such naïvetés and extravagancies would look very extraordinary in a cultivated man, who moved in "polished society."

Yet, notwithstanding this, Mendelssohn was no less characteristic and historic a personality for the present, than Bach was, in his time. No other art can point to a man, who, in his artistic creations, kept within the social life of our select circles, while he was thoroughly understood and honored by those.

While, one hundred years ago, people could not decide what to make out of the lonely, deeply thinking Bach, — with us, an immediate, general, and true judgment has been passed on Mendelssohn; and it would now be difficult to say anything excellent about him that is not already a current opinion.

Mendelssohn's influence must have become a universal one; for the "polished society" in the midst of which he worked and lived, and in the spirit of which he wrote, is the same, all over Germany. Bach, on the contrary, with his tenacious social limits, found his effectuality and renown as a composer, long socially and locally circumscribed.

It is said of Mendelssohn, often enough, that much, especially in his greater works, is diligently put together; and that his creations sometimes appear to be inspired by genius, when they are only the result of an uncommon talent; that he is far removed from the free geniality of a Mozart or Beethoven; that he is always wanting in that which fills up the measure of talent, so that it becomes genius, and without which talent is mere handicraft.

But Mendelssohn's best fame is not affected by this at all; I mean the fame of his pure, reformatory influence. For his calling he possessed the one grand qualification, which all might envy him. He was the fortunate one, who alone succeeded in remaining clear and earnest in his creations, and, at the same time, popular. His happy social position did not assist him in obtaining this rare good fortune, so much as his great gifts, and his untiring perseverance. Mendelssohn, the musical purifier, is missed far more painfully by the nation, than Mendelssohn, the creative tone-poet. Scarcely was his oratorio of "Elijah" in circulation, than musical unions in every place prepared to study this difficult, and — for amateurs — thankless work. Germany now possesses many composers, capable of writing an equally excellent work in this form; but not one other, on the mere strength of whose name such music will be thoroughly studied, (though enjoyed and understood by few) and will pierce into every corner where there is a musical society; the one man, who could break a pathway for earnest creation, is lost to us in Mendelssohn.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAVES, A. M.)

IV.

Playing with expression! How can we find significant words to make the pupil understand this vague term? It is easy for a vocal teacher, since the text of the songs furnished the best commentary for the melody. In instrumental music, however, we can apply poetry only comparatively, in order to bring it near to him who does not understand music as music, but feels interest in it only when it means something else in addition.

It is now the task of the more cultivated music teacher, to find out for grown up pupils that definition which is most accessible to their subjectivity. Music, as it manifests itself in the form of piano-performance, is now-a-days considered almost indispensable in the education of young ladies; whether rightly so, I will tell you in some other place. At any rate, talented and not talented are practising on the piano for years, and they, of course, expect that the teacher be conscientious in an art for which they sacrifice so much. All desire to play with expression, "and feelingly," while the very term "feeling" proves that we can not learn it, when it is not naturally within us. But if we place the word "understandingly" in its stead, it is obvious that this can be imparted to the pupil by the teacher. There are means of representing a certain sentiment in musical performance. Legato, staccato, forte, piano, and above all the oratorical accent serve that purpose. Wherever the composer has written these turns, it suffices to remind the pupil to observe such signs faithfully. But it is impossible to the composer to add for instance the degree of sforzando to each note, since the vast array of signs would completely puzzle our eyes. Thus we ever recur to the "feeling" which reveals to us how strongly we are permitted to intone without offending grace, how strongly we must intone, in order to exhibit the emotions inherent to the tone-piece.

Several oratorical accents will often occur in a single measure, each of which is to receive another degree of intonation. While the nature of the grammatical accent consists in its regular return, and the pupil soon understands it, the unexpected and unregulated character of the oratorical does not give the teacher a steady point to explain it to the pupil, so as to enable the latter to find it out himself the next time. It might best be illustrated by an analogy with declamation.

As to the teacher I suppose, of course, that the language of tones is disclosed to him. But even if he possess an excellent musical nature, thinking and feeling in tones, his pupils will not be benefitted at all by him, unless he knows how to communicate his inner views. He must consequently possess, besides musical cultivation a general education, above all the faculty of the utmost clearness and certainty in his teaching. He must have presence of mind sufficient to find at once, for each music piece, an analogy rendering the former intelligible to the pupil. He ought to have ready in his memory some appropriate poetical verses to compare with a musical passage the oratorical accents of which he is to point out.

This painstaking is hardly necessary with very talented pupils, and useless with those without talents. But between these there is a long series of middle degrees for which one and the same method does not suffice. Let us illustrate it.

Let us take one pupil with excellent ear, a fine timeist, with a light hand, but caring only for the most superficial waltz-compositions; let us then take another with naturally stiff fingers, and almost no really musical talent, but appreciating the noblest and greatest in music, if you bring it near her variously developed mind in some other way. You will readily perceive that you will have to talk differently with them. You can convince the former of the futility of her actual tendency only in a purely musical way, by repeatedly and practically explaining to her — by means of passages on the piano — the requirements of a good melody, harmony and fine rhythm, and by comparing genuine music with that which lacks these three fundamental conditions. As to the other pupil, you will have to demonstrate the affinity of the music piece in question with the beautiful in some other department, in order to win her interest for it.

We must, with all pupils of this latter class, try to investigate what are their other natural talents, fancies and attainments, in order to procure music on entrance by means of fancy, if it cannot be obtained in a sentimental way, or to borrow an analogy from the art of painting, if their sense of color and form should be more developed than the sense for tone and time. Thus every kind of knowledge of the teacher in other branches of education will promote the pupil, if he applies it in the right place, even more so, than if he had buried himself even so deeply in the musical grammar.

Many pupils possess but one half of musical talent, viz., conception, without the gift of representation, or vice versa. You will assist the former mostly by playing for him, the latter by oral explanations.

To a superficial young girl an isolated melody will appear so much more beautiful, because the want of the accompaniment without rhythm and constructed perhaps only upon two chords does not absorb her thoughts. Melody is, in fact, everything to her; the base is for her an altogether gratuitous supplement. They assert singularly enough of a composition rich and full in all its parts, for example of a fugue, that it has no melody. They do not see the forest on account of the many trees; for in the fugue each simpler art is a melody; but to hear four melodies at once is too much for their ears.

You must, from time to time, analyze an excellent composition for such pupils, and compel them to direct their attention to its inner structure. They will thus become conscious of the power of a harmonically moving base and of independent middle parts. Just as before they found each composition dry in which they thought the charm of melody was wanting, they will now not be seduced by a harmonically poor work because it happens to possess the cheap advantage of a pretty upper part. Finally, do not neglect to take up the test of rhythm by separating the theme from its melodic and harmonic dress, and reducing it to a single tone. If a rhythm is truly original and lively, it will still interest us if we drum it on the table with our fingers. The short comings of the invention will likewise appear, when its monotony is no longer varnished over by a variegated melody.

The pupil will thus obtain a starting point from which he himself may examine whether the music which pleases him stands the test or not. A great point is clearly gained, when he finds out that a certain music did not please him, because it was too high for him, and that, on the other hand, he must confess that he had been more delighted by common music. Self-knowledge is even in this particular case, like everywhere else, the first step to improvement.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Italian wing of the New York company is organizing for a series of operatic performances, beginning in Philadelphia about November 19th. Signor Muzio is to be the director, and Mme. Colson, Brignoli, Ferri, Susini and others are in the troupe. They are at present about to commence a series of concerts in the West, beginning at Pittsburgh.

On Rudimental Piano Instruction.

BY F. PRTERBILKA.

Mr. Editor: The letter of Mad. Johanna Kinckel published by you, Oct. 20th, suggests to me a few ideas, which may be new to many, but are the result of my experience for the last twenty or thirty years and have proved successful. The first maxim: Never give a beginner more material for thought or memory than is necessary for immediate use, or confusion will be the result. The names of the keys of the piano may be learned in one of the first lessons; but the scholar has no use yet for sharps and flats; therefore say nothing about them. The notes come next, but five are enough for at least three months, (I should rather say for one year,) therefore neither bass notes nor ledger lines are wanted. Why confuse a beginner with whole, half, quarter notes, or still worse, with hemi, demi, semi quavers? Notes of uniform length should be used exclusively, until they can be played in correct time with the metronome; then two, three, &c. to one beat, always with regard to strict accentuation and legato.

I am aware that no celebrated pianoforte school proceeds in such a manner, I therefore wrote my own instruction book and studies.* The best players and composers have produced the most useless pianoforte schools without exception; it is however, not at all surprising.

Now this ought to be the first lesson. The most perfect understanding must be given about the position of the hands and fingers, before anything need be said about keys, notes, rests, bar lines, ledger lines, &c. No need for opening the piano. Draw your chair to the table. Lay one hand down flat, rest part of your arm also. Extend your hand to the utmost—now draw the fingers towards you—straighten the thumb—keep the palm firmly down—by no means raise the knuckles. Now lift your third finger as high as you can but don't straighten it, keep it bent, draw it more towards you—now let it fall. After this finger has learned to be uplifted, without throwing the first joint outward, it is positively necessary that there should be no more interruption between the rising and falling. Thus each finger is treated. If the third finger is unable to rise place a little block of wood under it or the corner of a book and keep it blocked up an inch or more for a few minutes, while the hand remains flat upon the table and the other fingers rest upon their tips. If the fingers are all feeble, stiff or awkward serve them in like manner.

Second Exercise. Move two fingers one after the other, many times; a slight pause between the motion of each finger, so that four are at rest on tips in the aforesaid position while the two move alternately. This exercise may be written as follows:

x. 1. — 1. 2. — 2. 3. — 3. 4. — || x. 2. — x. 3. — x. 4. — || 1. 3. — 1. 4. — || &c.

Try each hand singly; then both together.

Third Exercise. The foregoing movement. The arm and palm at rest, the fingers all uplifted but well bent; only one finger touches the table and rises at the instant when the other descends. Let the finger fall loose like a dead weight without the slightest sign of pressure.

* Study with Amusement. A series of progressive lessons, calculated to render the fingers independent of each other, both hands even, the touch distinct, &c. Boston: O. Ditson & Co.

Easy and Melodious Studies, Ditto.

Fourth Exercise. The same movement continued, but with regard to a heavy and light stroke. In order to produce the former, lift the finger higher, but beware of pressure. Practice this with the bell metronome, and you secure at once correct time and accentuation.

Musical Culture.

III.

INSTRUCTION.

After the Sonata the following forms are to be noticed: the Rondo, Variations, Prelude, Fugue, Toccata, Capriccio, Etude; and those of modern origin, as the Concert-Fantaisie, the Lied ohne Worte, Nocturne, Elegy, Idylle, Berceuse, Barcarole, Pastorale, Ballade, Scherzo, Rhapsodie, and a host of others, which, though in substance songs without words, bear a particular name, according to the fancy of the composer. The various ballet forms in the brilliant style, as the Bolero, Tarantelle, Siciliano, Polonaise, March, Mazurka, Waltz, Galop, etc., must likewise be mentioned. The Opera, Oratorio, Cantata, and similar vocal and instrumental compositions also belong here, inasmuch as they are composed or arranged with accompaniment of the pianoforte.

To complete the table we cannot leave untouched that numerous class of pieces for the pianoforte, an immediate product of our manufacturing time, which have no form at all, but consist of a number of opera-melodies, or opera-nonsense, incoherently following each other. Among musicians these pieces pass under the name of Potpourris. As they are formless they tend to spoil the taste, and except for some special purpose, should be excluded altogether from instruction.

Every piece selected for study should above all have a clear and distinct form, and the difference between one form and another, the characteristic traits of each, should be explained. With the exception of the Sonata and Fugue, and those formed after them, the structure of the remainder is simple; instead of a thematic development of one or two themes or motives there, we have here a number of melodies connected together, one of which will always re-appear several times, simple or varied, and may be called the principal melody. In most of the ballet-forms, as the March, Polonaise, Waltz, etc., the different melodies are separated from each other by double-bars, and hence are easily distinguished; but this is not the case in the song without words, Nocturne and the rest, where they are sometimes so closely interwoven with each other that it is more difficult to know where one ceases and the other begins. At other times, however, they are kept apart by accidental passages, to which attention must be called; as, on the whole, the essential should always be distinguished from the accessory, or that which merely serves to offset and contrast the various melodies.

It is hardly necessary to say that every form must be delivered with due respect to its nature; that, while the performance of a Tarantelle, for instance, is characterized by wild haste and hurry, the Nocturne should be represented in the spirit of dreamy repose and tranquillity. Composers do not always respect the nature of a form, and sometimes write Nocturnes, that are as exciting as a dance, and Tarantelles as innocent as a Berceuse (Lullaby.) In such cases the cultivated player should know better, and by his judicious delivery, restore as much as possible the respective forms to their original character. In general, the pupil should be accustomed to a strong and distinct accentuation; the marks of expression should be strictly observed, as well as the many shades of loud and soft, from the thundering fortissimo down to the whispering pianissimo. It is also recommended that some pieces, if not all, be committed to memory; as it greatly contributes towards cultivating the ear, the memory and the other powers, on which a true musical culture is based. In pieces for four hands, where the pupil generally plays the primo, it is necessary continually to admonish him not to suffer himself to be wholly absorbed in his part, but to listen with equal attention to what the teacher is playing in the other part, the secondo; in this way only he can learn to understand the piece. The same applies to compositions for pianoforte and violin or other instruments. Finally, it would not be superfluous that the pupil should briefly be made acquainted with the lives of the masters, whose works he is studying, especially of those who have enriched the literature of the pianoforte with this or that form. For instance to Mendelssohn we owe the Lied ohne Worte; to Thalberg the Concert-Fantaisie; to Field the Nocturne; to Chopin a number of those just mentioned. Moreover, every master has his own peculiar style of composing, different from that of all others, which should be recognized. The number of players is legion, who have studied and enjoyed a composition for years, without ever caring to know aught of the man, to whose genius and labor they are indebted for so much pleasure and enjoyment. There are at present a number of small musical encyclopedias and hand-books, in which biographies of the most distinguished (and even of the undistinguished) composers can be found. Such a book every pupil should possess and become familiar with.

We have here attempted to indicate the way through which the musical education of a pupil may be effected. The small space of an article, does not permit one to mention everything that may promote this object; many efficient ways will suggest themselves to the intelligent teacher, who understands the disposition of his pupil, during the lesson. As for the techniques, most instruction-books are reliable guides. It is to be regretted that these books hardly so much as hint at the necessity of cultivating the musical faculties too. It seems to be understood that this is a thing, which makes itself alone. How the thing makes itself is manifest among others in the singular fact that there are many players able to execute a work of a high order in respect to its mechanical difficulties quite satisfactorily, who neither understand nor enjoy it in the least. Many have the technical skill to play Beethoven's sonatas, for instance; and they do play them; but as for their beauties, these compositions are like the book with seven seals to them; they are not musical enough to comprehend such tone-poems; their mechanical abilities have been fostered to the neglect of nobler powers. It is of course of the highest importance, especially during the first years of instruction, to lay the foundation for a faultless, sure and elegant execution, by innumerable exercises and pieces written for that purpose; so that when a piece of truly musical value comes to be performed, its beauties be not deformed by a clumsy delivery; but, nevertheless, the musical culture of the player must ever remain the last aim, and all else be considered as preparatory or auxiliary. And even during the first years much can be done, and must be done, to cultivate the musical sensibilities. From the very beginning, the pupil can be taught as well to understand and appreciate his pieces as to play them; since, as a general rule, the easier a piece is, the simpler is its style and structure. We must, however, concede that there are doubtless many, whom it is impossible to instruct in the proper way for want of sufficient talent; so that to endeavor to open their senses to the impression of a fine composition will ever remain a vain undertaking; while, provided as they are with a pair of soft hands, and nimble fingers, they might be trained to perform many a brilliant, though empty, piece with manual and digital skill; which in such a case would perhaps be the wisest course to adopt. But there are enough, endowed with a rich musical mind, which rightly cultivated would bear glorious fruits. The matter becomes more serious, if we remember that nearly all pupils depend for their musical culture solely on the instruction they receive; besides that, they have few, if any opportunities. How necessary, then, that instruction should fulfil its task! It is true that every great city has its concerts, where frequently the best kind of music may be heard; but a good degree of culture must already have been attained, before listening to such music becomes instructive. For the most advanced such opportunities may perhaps be turned to a good account, if the pupils are made acquainted with the pieces before they go to hear them, and the teacher endeavors to connect whatever instructive remarks he can therewith. Again, there are many of the most talented often so situated, as to be unable to commence taking lessons in early childhood, when the fingers may be trained to anything; they begin at a period, where the hand has attained its full size, and is incapable of such strength and flexibility as is required to perform all the arts of modern pianism; it is, therefore, in vain to attempt educating them for bravura-players. However, if the cultivation of their purely musical gifts is made the principal object, they will become players, whose intelligent, tasteful and expressive performance ten times supplies the lack of a brilliant, dashing execution, while the art to them is a perennial, inexhaustible source of the purest enjoyment. It is this kind of players, by whom Art gains and who in return gain from the Art. There is always much talk of the ennobling influence of music; much talk about the mental and moral improvement to be derived from it, which leads many good people to suppose all they have to do to avail themselves of the advantages, so cheaply offered them, is to commence playing the pianoforte in such a manner as best flatters their indolence and vanity. If it were merely for the practice; if the bare fact of playing an instrument sufficed,—many a street-musician would be a model of purity and nobility of mind. It is only when treated as befits her divine origin that music exerts that benign influence, which in all ages has been justly ascribed to her.

There is also much talk about the works of Handel, Haydn and Mozart in a way, that would imply, one needs only to play these masters, and then all is gained. Above all, when pianoforte playing is the subject, instead of Handel, Haydn and Mozart, make Bach, Beethoven and Chopin your motto, which sounds certainly more piano-like. However, here again, it is the way in which a work is used, that decides its value to the pupil, not the name of the composer.

A teacher who is himself possessed of genuine musical culture, will make better musicians of his pupils with the works of second rate composers, than the craftsman, who has his music (?) merely in his fingers, can produce with the aid of the best masterworks. The main thing is that the final aim be kept in view, which, as above mentioned, is to teach the pupil to play, to understand, to appreciate and to love the works of all composers, of our time as well as of the past. By such a course he will also learn finally to make his own selections, and his culture will be a sure guarantee that the classical compositions of Bach, Handel, Haydn and Mozart are not the last to which he will turn. He will also have learned that there are such as Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Weber, Mendelssohn, Heller, and others of less celebrity, who also have a claim to be heard. In view of the great improvements in the construction of the pianoforte during the last fifty years these masters had resources at their command, of which the former could not avail themselves. Moreover, music itself as the language of tones has assumed a more decided character since Beethoven; the effort to express ideas, or represent images, is more or less visible in the works of the composers last mentioned; so that the term "tone-poetry" is, literally, more applicable to the music of these than to that of older masters. Let instruction guard against onesidedness, prejudice and fanaticism! Let every work be judged and enjoyed according to what is good, true and beautiful in it, whether old or new; whether in this or that style; whether the celebrated work of a great tone-poet, or the modest production of an unknown musician. To inculcate principles like these is the first and last duty of the instructor.

J. J. Rousseau as a Composer.

LE DEVIN DU VILLAGE.

Some weeks since we protested against an injustice done to the memory of Hoffman, whose music is generally ridiculed, in the words of a celebrated French critic, as de la musique de littérature; the fact being that Hoffmann was a professional musician, orchestral conductor, and composer before he wrote any of those tales by which he is now chiefly and indeed almost exclusively known. However, we have shown our readers an article by Weber in which the composer of Der Freischütz expresses with enthusiasm his approbation of Hoffman's Undine, and if it delighted him, surely it cannot matter much, as far as Hoffmann's reputation is concerned, who is dissatisfied with it. There is another writer, greater than Hoffman, whose musical pretensions are never questioned in the present day, though numbers of his contemporaries refused to admit them, not on the ground that the music he gave to the public was worthless, but on the very simple plea that it was the composition of another person. We allude to Jean Jacques Rousseau, the author and accredited composer of Le Devin du Village; the Rousseau of Confessions, who reproaches himself so bitterly with having stolen a ribbon, passes complacently over a hundred acts of meanness committed by him, and ends by declaring that any one who may come to the conclusion that he, Rousseau, is un malhonnête homme, is himself "a man to be smothered" (un homme à étouffer).

Le Devin du Village is undoubtedly the work of Jean Jacques Rousseau, as far as the libretto is concerned, but it can be shown on better evidence, even than that on which the charge of ribbon-stealing rests (for which we have only Rousseau's own word), that the music was the production of Granet, a composer residing at Lyons.

One day in the year 1751, Pierre Rousseau, called Rousseau of Tonlouse, to distinguish him from the numerous other Rousseaus living in Paris, and known as the director of the Journal Encyclopédique, received a parcel containing a quantity of manuscript music, which, on examination, turned out to be the score of an opera. It was accompanied by a letter, addressed like the parcel itself, to M. Rousseau, homme de lettres, demeurant à Paris, in which a person signing himself Granet, and writing from Lyons, expressed a hope that his music would be found worthy of the illustrious author's words, that he had given appropriate expression to the tender sentiments of Colette and Colin, &c. Pierre Rousseau, though a Journalist, understood music. He knew that Granet's letter was intended for Jean Jacques, and that he ought to return it with the music to the post office, but the score of the Devin du Village, from the little he had seen of it, interested him, and he not only kept it until he had made himself familiar with it from beginning to end, but even showed it to a friend, M. de Bellissent, one of the conservators of the Royal Library, and a man of great musical acquirements. As soon as Pierre Rousseau and De Bellissent had quite finished with the Devin du Village, they sent it back to the post office, whence it was forwarded to its true destination.

Jean Jacques had been expecting Granet's music, and, on receiving the opera in complete form, took it to La Vaupalière the farmer-general, and offered it to him, directly or indirectly, as a suitable piece for Mad. de Pompadour's theatre at Versailles, where several operettas had already been produced. La Vaupalière was anxious to maintain himself in the good graces of the favorite, and purchased for her entertainment the right of representing the Devin du Village. This handsome present cost the gallant financier the sum of six thousand francs. However, the opera was performed, was wonderfully successful, and was afterwards produced at the Académie, when Rousseau received four thousand francs more—so at least say some authorities who derive their information from the books of the theatre—though, according to Rousseau's own statement in the Confessions, the Opera sent him only fifty louis, which he declares he never asked for, but which he does not pretend to have returned.

Rousseau "confesses," with studied detail, how the music of each piece in the Devin du Village occurred to him; how he at one time thought of burning the whole affair (a conceit by the way which has since been rendered common-place by amateur authors in their prefaces); how his friends succeeded in persuading him to do nothing of the kind; and how, at last, he wrote the drama, and sketched out the whole of the music in six days, so that, when he arrived with his work in Paris, he had nothing to add but the recitative and the "remplissage"—by which we suppose he means the orchestral parts. In the next page he tells that he would have given anything in the world if he could only have had the Devin du Village, performed for himself alone, and have listened to it with closed doors as Lulli is reported to have listened to his Armide, executed for his sole gratification. This egotistical pleasure might, perhaps, have been enjoyed by Rousseau if he had really composed the music himself, for when the Académie produced his second Devin du Village, of which the music was undoubtedly his own, the public positively refused to listen to it, and hissed it until it was withdrawn. If the director had persisted in representing the piece the theatre would doubtless have been deserted.

But to return to the original score which, as Rousseau himself informs us, wanted nothing, when he arrived in Paris, except what he calls the "remplissage" and the recitative. He had intended, he says, to have Le Devin performed at the Opera, but M. de Oury, the intendant of the Menus Plaisirs, was determined it should first be brought out at the Court. A duel was very nearly taking place between the two directors, when it was at last decided by Rousseau himself that Fontainebleau, Mad. de Pompadour (and La Vauvillière), should have the preference. Whether Granet had omitted to write recitative or not, it is a remarkable fact that recitative was wanted when the piece came to be rehearsed, and that Rousseau allowed Jelliotte the singer to supply it. This he mentions himself, as also that he was not present at any of the rehearsals—for it is at rehearsals above all that a sham composer runs the chance of being detected. It is an easy thing for any man to say that he has composed an opera, but it may be difficult for him to correct a very simple error made by the copyist in transcribing the parts. However, Rousseau admits that he did not attend rehearsals and that he did not compose the recitative, which the singers required forthwith, and which had to be written almost beneath their eyes.

But what was Granet doing in the meanwhile? it will be asked. In the meanwhile Granet had died. And Pierre Rousseau and his friend M. de Bolissent? Rousseau of Toulouse, supported by the Conservator of the Royal Library, accused Jean Jacques openly of fraud in the columns of the Journal Encyclopédique. These accusations were repeated on all sides, until at last Rousseau undertook to reply to them by composing new music to the Devin du Village. This new music the Opera refused to perform, and with some reason, for it appears (as the reader has seen) to have been detestable. It was not executed until after Rousseau's death, and at the special request of his widow, when, in the words of Grimm, "all the new airs were hooted without the slightest regard for the memory of the author."

It is this utter failure of the second edition of the Devin du Village which convinces us more than anything else that the first was not from the hand of Rousseau. But let us not say that he was "un mal-honnête homme." Probably the conscientious author of the Contract Social adopted the children of others by way of compensation for having sent his own to the "Enfants Trouvés."—Musical World, Sept. 29.

Letters from Adolphe Nourrit to Ferdinand Hiller.

The letters which, during the last few years of his life, Adolphe Nourrit wrote to Ferdinand Hiller,* are the purest reflex of the most secret emotion and inward struggles which agitated, and at length broke, the great artist's heart—they are the outpourings of a noble soul, gradually consumed in the flame of ambition and a passionate love for art, and laid open without the slightest reserve to the gaze of an intimate friend.

For the better comprehension of these letters, we will first present our readers with a few of the principal events in Nourrit's life, our authority being the excellent article by F. Halvén, "Adolphe Nourrit," in the Revue Contemporaine for May and June, 1860.

Adolphe Nourrit was born on the 3rd of March, 1802, at Montpellier. His father, Louis Nourrit, then only twenty-two years of age, possessed a fine tenor voice. He went to Paris, and entered the Conservatory. He was patronised by Méhul, and received instruction from Garat. In the year 1805, he appeared as Rinaldo in Gluck's opera of Armida. He remained at the Grand Opera. Not feeling any real passion for his art, in addition to exercising his talent as a singer, he traded in jewels, of which he was a good judge. His sole object was a quiet life and a certain income. He sent his son to the college of Sainte-Barbe, and afterwards placed him in a house of business. Adolphe became a good accountant, and when just seventeen, obtained a situation in the offices of a life insurance company. By his intelligence and industry, by the beauty of his writing and figures, and by his correctness in calculation, Adolphe gave the greatest satisfaction to his employers. His father was delighted, and he himself perfectly contented with his condition.

Suddenly, after his voice had fully changed, there was developed in him the germ, till then completely unsuspected, of a highly harmonious, pleasing, and yet powerful tenor, inclining to a barytone, and at the same time there awoke within his breast a strong love, slumbering up to that moment, for the art. Garat fostered both, calming the apprehension his father felt at the young clerk's resolution to devote himself to music, and on the 1st September, 1821, Adolphe made his first appearance as Pylades in Gluck's Iphigenia. His success was such as to decide his future career.

He now shared with his father all the tenor parts, and the name of Nourrit soon became universally famous, but to the public it represented only Adolphe. On the 9th October, 1826, at the first performance of Rossini's Siege of Corinth, father and son sang together, the former taking the part of Cleomenes, and the latter that of Neocles. Nourrit senior then retired and resided in the country, near Paris, but did not long enjoy the repose for which he had yearned. He died, still young, in 1831.

Every one knows how brilliant was Adolphe Nourrit's career at the Grand Opera in Paris. He reigned there as undisputed first dramatic singer, without a rival. His performances as Masaniello, Count Ory, Arnold, in Guillaume Tell, Eleazar, and Raoul were wonderful; in all these characters he displayed his great creative talent. It is not so generally known that he was, also, the author of two ballets, La Sylphide for Taglioni, and La Tempête (taken only in part from Shakspeare) for Fanny Elssler, the latter produced on the 15th September, 1834.

The last character Nourrit "created" at the Grand Opera was that of Stradella in Niedermeyer's opera of the same name, on the 3d March, 1837. The subject of the opera was taken from the well-known anecdote, according to which the bravos hired to murder Stradella let their poniards drop from their hands on hearing him sing. This scene, the principal one in Niedermeyer's work, takes place in the church. But Nourrit had long previously made up his mind to break off all connection with the Grand Opera in Paris.

It was on this subject that he wrote as follows, on the 26th October, 1836, to Ferdinand Hiller:—

"My dear Friend,—In the first place, receive my thanks for your welcome letter; I had heard of your indisposition and awaited with impatience the news of your recovery. You are now quite well again, and about to pass the winter agreeably in the bosom of your family, with a contented heart and spirit, engaged in pursuits which you like, and under circumstances which render you happy. I am delighted at this, though I am sorry at losing you; but we ought to love our friends for their own sake, and judge their happiness by their own standard.

"I have a great deal to tell you—a great deal—which will greatly surprise you; but we will take everything in due order, especially as I can begin with a gratifying piece of intelligence.

"My wife has been safely confined of a girl, who is lively and well; the event took place twelve days ago, and both mother and child are going on admirably. A great many persons made a wry face at the news of the arrival of a fifth little girl! We, however, receive with joy what God gives us, and offer him our thanks. May the little creature be like her sisters; may she be worthy her mother; if she is, we are sure there will be one more good woman in the world. There is a chance that our children's children will be better than we are. Hallelujah!

*We give this and the following letters in their integrity, because even the little details in them add to our means of estimating the character of Nourrit, both as a man and an artist.—Ed. Niederheinische Musik-Zeitung.

"But now—what I have to tell you, at present, is of an important and serious nature, and will, perhaps, affect you painfully. But I can at once quiet you; everything you are about to hear has been done solely out of consideration for my repose, my happiness, and, before all, my family.

"I leave the Opera and retire from the stage. Listen to the reasons which have induced me to do so.

"The management of the Opera has engaged Duprez, who, for some years past, has occupied the first place among the tenors of Italy. He naturally could not be contented with the second place in Paris; my position must therefore have been changed in order to make one for him. At first, I willingly and cheerfully consented to this, and, indeed, believed that I should, by a rivalry which would spur me on to fresh exertions, advance the interests of my art. But I too soon remarked the uneasiness of my family, as well as the apprehension of my friends, and my peace of mind was at an end! I have, too, had opportunities of convincing myself that I needed peace of mind to satisfy the demands of my art, that every care or anxiety is prejudicial to me, and that, in a word, I am not a man for rivalry.

"After reflecting maturely on my new position, I perceived that my future would not resemble my past life; that since the circumstances which favored my development no longer existed, I could not foresee to what ordeals I should still be subjected, both as a man and an artist; as I cannot be more than the former, it is clear that I can gain nothing in a conflict in which my opponent has nothing to lose. Besides, you already know that it was always my intention to retire early: early enough to devote myself to other pursuits. I have six children, and as long as I live, I will work.

"I am very well aware that I shall not find another career so brilliant, and consequently so profitable, as my present one; but in four or five years I should, under all circumstances, be obliged to give it up, and if I do so now I shall gain four years for my future.

"My engagement with the Opera ends in March; I shall give my farewell performance, take my pension—to which I am entitled by sixteen years' service—and close with a tour through the departments, which will bring in more in twelve or eighteen months than I could save in four years at the Opera.

"I shall then crawl like a snail into my shell, sing Hiller, Schubert, and all my dear German masters for my amusement, and devote myself to those studies to which I have always looked forward. It is true that I do not yet know in what form the fruits of my labor will be displayed, but when I once know what I want to know, when I have achieved for myself a higher value personally, it is impossible for me not to make my abilities available for the benefit of my family.

"I assure you, however, beforehand, that I shall busy myself only with art. Whatever you may think of my determination, believe me that I am not taking any rash and foolish step; I have sought the advice of all my friends, and did not decide until after a family council.

"I can assure you that since my resolution has been immutably fixed, tranquillity has returned to my house; my mother is happier, my wife calmer, and my sister fell round my neck with joy on hearing my decision.

"I have never striven to obtain great wealth; as, however, I have five daughters to provide for, I wish to place my retirement from the stage in such a light before the world as to command as much respect and consideration as possible. My present position is, on this account, especially favorable to me. All who love me approve of my intention; your approbation alone is wanting. I trust that you will not make me wait for it long, and that you will permit me to reckon on it beforehand.

"Farewell, my dear friend; if my reasons do not convince you, do not be in a hurry with your answer, for I am certain that in the end you will agree with my views.

Yours with all my heart,

AD. NOURRIT."

Things were certainly as Nourrit described them. Duprez came from Italy to Paris with all the advantage of an immense reputation; after long study he had gained in Italy that in which he had been previously deficient—but for which he was afterwards distinguished—great power of tone. In addition to this, he was more fortunate than Nourrit, in having had from his youth received a thorough musical education, and was then a most accomplished singer. Donizetti had written for him the part of Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor.

Nourrit's voice had certainly suffered somewhat; as far back as 1830 he had strained it too much in the days of the Revolution, on the stage and in other public places; and, at the period of which we are treating, his mental excitement, moreover, was not advantageous to the exercise of his art. But worse than all was the fact that this excitement cast a gloom over him, rendering him suspicious of others and unjust to himself. At one of his last performances of Masaniello, he remarked Duprez, of whose return to Paris (for after signing his engagement with the opera, Duprez had again proceeded to Italy) he was not aware, in a box with the manager of the opera. He instantly fancied they had both come to criticise his performance. His mental agitation scarcely allowed him to play out the first act; in the following acts, Lafond was obliged to take his place.

After the resolution which he took a short time subsequently, he really became, as he says in his letter, calmer; he sang the part of Stradella in March, and carefully and zealously prepared for his farewell appearance.

This took place on the 1st of April, 1837. He first played in the second act of Armida. The house was crammed to the ceiling, and the audience were indefatigable in showering upon him the marks of their approbation from beginning to end.

He began his tour by proceeding through Belgium and France. The success he everywhere met with led him astray; his resolve to devote himself to some other occupation was forgotten; the demon of the stage again seized on and carried him away. Nourrit determined to go to Italy, and replace at the San Carlo the man who had replaced him at the Opera in Paris.

While performing at Marseilles, he was seized with sudden hoarseness in the third act of the opera; pale, and with a look of despair, he left the stage. Two of his most intimate friends hurried round behind the scenes and found him in a state bordering on madness. He did not recognize them. With difficulty they placed him in an arm-chair, where he sat exhausted and without consciousness. Next morning, one of them went to see him. "How are you now, my dear Nourrit," he inquired. "Very bad," replied Nourrit, "I have not slept, and have wept a great deal; this very moment I was collecting all my moral energies to arm myself against evil thoughts. Life is becoming insupportable to me; but I know my duty. I have dear friends, a wife and children, whom I love, and for whom I must preserve myself—and I believe in an eternal life. With such thoughts a man can obtain the mastery over himself. I fear, however, for my reason—if I lose that for a single instant, it is all over with me. Last night, here in this chair, did I pray to God for courage and strength, and read this holy book." The book was The Imitation of Christ.

The consequence of this attack was that he fell seriously ill, and was obliged to return to Paris. In the bosom of his family he recovered his health, and busied himself at the Conservatory of Music. But he did not persevere; his plan of going to Italy had become a fixed idea, and his unlucky star enticed him onward.

He set out in the spring of 1838. He stopped for some time in Milan, where he frequently charmed the most distinguished society by his singing at Rossini's, and proceeded, by the way of Venice, Florence and Rome, to Naples.

On the 7th April, he wrote as follows to Ferdinand Hiller:—

"I trust, my dear friend, that since we bade each other farewell at Naples, you have sometimes thought of me; if not, you are an ungrateful man, for I have thought often, very often, of you. I have always looked back with delight to the pleasant week which we spent together in Venice, and remembered what a beneficial effect your company had upon me.

"I have not written to you before, because I wanted to wait for the termination of the business which Rossini took in hand for me, previous to my departure from Milan. We were not able to come to any arrangement with the manager of the La Scala; we should soon have agreed about money matters, (you already know that money was never the principal consideration with me), but he could not give me the guarantee I required for my first appearance, and, in addition to this, the presence of Donzelli, who is engaged for the autumn and carnival season, would have rendered my position a difficult one. Merelli must have a tenore sfogato, and that is notin my way. I thanked Rossini, therefore, for the trouble he had taken, and broke off the negotiation with the Milan engagement. For other reasons I am not sorry, however, that the management came to nothing. At the time of the Emperor's coronation as King in Milan, every one will be more taken up with the public festivals and ceremonies than with the theatre, and you know how important for me is the impression produced by my first appearance in Italy. I am not, on this account, the less resolved to follow up my Italian career: on the contrary, every step I take in this country enlists me the more in its favor, and I have a greater desire than ever to settle here and endeavor to regain the rank I held in Paris. The task is not an easy one, but it is that very reason which excites me.

"When we are not contented with doing things by halves, we often strike on more than one rock of which we had no suspicion, and frequently overcome one obstacle merely to perceive another which we have to conquer with a fresh effort of our energy.

"It would not, however, have been worth while to give up so brilliant a position as that which I enjoyed, to leave my home, to care nothing for the fatigues of a long journey, and to bear the grief of parting and absence, if such sacrifices were to be made for something easily obtainable. No, by my troth! What I want is difficult to effect, and it is for this I want to effect it. A man does not lay aside the habits of five-and-twenty years in a fortnight, change his nature, or transform himself from a Frenchman into an Italian. Yet I must accomplish this, and I am working at it, from morning till evening, with courage and delight. It makes me eighteen years younger to begin my career afresh, nay, to be obliged to go through a new course of musical and vocal instruction; but, instead of costing me an effort, this state of student-ship gives me pleasure. I do not shirk making myself very little in order to become greater; I stoop down, and take a spring, in order to rise as high as possible. Naples is an excellent place for me to gain the Italian accent, and get into the Italian ways; then again, if I must still remain separated for any length of time from my family, Naples is the place which offers the most healthy diversion, without taking into consideration the fact that the air cures sick singers, and must, consequently, be extremely beneficial to those who are well. Besides this, the people are very kind to me. Barbaja insists on my coming out here in Guillaume Tell, and I am only waiting till I have sung enough in Italian in order to be no longer obliged to sing in French; this is not a joke; the two manners and the two methods are so different, that, in my opinion, no one can sing both just as it suits his fancy. Donizetti supports me with his talent and with the influence his position give him. His advice is excellent, and I already feel how beneficial it is to me. He treats me as a friend and as an artist, paying me no compliments and suffering no fault to pass unobserved; I sing with him every evening. He corrects me in every turn which smacks of the French style, in every sound which does not agree with the laws of Italian intonation, and, thanks to his frankness, and talent as a singing-master, I hope that, in a month or two, I shall not be recognisable. I shall not be satisfied with people's saying, 'He sings in Italian very well for a Frenchman; I mean them to say, 'Any one would take him for an Italian.' These are lofty pretensions, are they not?"

"Adieu, my dear friend; think of me and write to say how far you have got on with your opera. I remain the whole summer in Naples. My address, &c. "AD. NOURRIT."

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the 42d Psalm: "As the Hart Pants." By Mendelssohn.

Soiree at Chickering's.

A most delightful and appropriate opening of our musical season was the soiree given by the Messrs. Chickering, on Saturday evening last, as a sort of consecration of their new and beautiful saloon, in the presence of a large invited company, representing the musical public of Boston.

The room itself deserves our first attention by the elegance of its arrangements and decoration, and its general fitness for the purposes for which it is intended. The coloring of the walls and ceiling is of chaste and delicate shades, tastefully and artistically set off and relieved by gilding and some admirably painted panels. The lighting was profuse and brilliant, giving the finest effect to the details of the architectural decorations. Flowers, too, of the most beautiful, upon the platform, added much to the general effect of the room. The chestnut seats are very comfortable, and graceful in their design. The acoustic properties of this room are excellent, both for the instrumental and vocal music, neither losing in the slightest, so far as we could perceive, any of their due effect. The only serious fault that we could detect was a want of sufficient and proper ventilation, which doubtless will in future be remedied. The central situation of this room and its convenience of access, added to its other excellencies, will make it a most invaluable addition to the number of concert rooms of Boston.

The Messrs. Chickering who, we all know, are the most genial and agreeable of hosts, with great good taste had secured the coöperation of the most efficient talent in the city, and offered to their guests the following varied and well selected programme:

PART I.

1. Fugue for Two Pianos, eight hands. . . . . Moecheles. Messrs. Lang, Leonhard, Parker and Dresel.
2. Scène Dramatique. . . . . Jeanne d'Arc à Rouen. Mrs. Harwood.
3. Larghetto and Tema con Variazioni. . . . . Mozart. From the Clarinet Quintet, Op. 108. Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
4. Liebe und Wein. . . . . Mendelssohn. Orpheus Club.

PART II.

5. Duet for Two Pianos. . . . . Mendelssohn and Moecheles. On the March from Weber's Preciosa. Miss Fay and Mr. Dresel.
6. German Ballad. Mrs. Harwood.
7. Pianoforte Solo. Variations Sériesuses. . . . . Mendelssohn. Miss Fay.
8. Allegro and Adagio. . . . . Beethoven. From the Quartet in B flat. Op. 18. No. 7. Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
9. "Hüte Dich." . . . . . Girschner. Orpheus Club.

We regret to have lost the first piece upon the programme, hearing only the hearty applause which followed its performance. Mrs. Harwood showed marked improvement and the results of careful attention, giving great delight to the audience by her songs which were followed by the most generous applause. Miss Fay, too, excited a positive enthusiasm by her brilliant execution, showing the rarest natural capacity and most delicate and facile touch, combined with a vigor and power rarely found in a lady executant. In the duet played by her with Mr. Dresel, she showed herself a worthy pupil of an accomplished instructor.

What need that we should speak of the Orpheus Club and the Mendelssohn Club, or say that they gave delight as always, singing and playing with rare precision and admirable effect? Nor need we say that the grand pianos were well worthy the "gold medal" that has been so often and deservedly bestowed upon the firm of Chickering & Sons, to whom we were indebted for this pleasant evening.

From Spohr's Autobiography.

From London, whither Spohr went in 1820, he reports of a visit made to Logier's pianoforte classes:

Logier, a German by birth, but a resident of England for the last fifteen years, gives instructions in Piano playing and Harmony after a method invented by himself. The first striking peculiarity of his system is that all the pupils, sometimes twenty or thirty play simultaneously. He has written three volumes of Studies for this purpose, which are built on very simple fundamental melodies, and represent all grades of difficulty. While the beginners play the simple melody, those farther advanced practice at the same time, more or less difficult variations. One would suppose that confusion would be sure to ensue; as, however, those pupils who play the same study are placed near together, you hear, as you pass through the hall, always one study predominate according to the place where you are. The teacher also sometimes stops half of the pupils, or even all of them except one, in order to examine the progress of a single one. In the first lessons Logier uses the Chiroplast, an instrument, by which the hands and arms of the children are kept in a good position, and which is removed, first from one, then from the other hand, when the children are far enough advanced to know the keys and notes. After that they are taught to pass the thumb under the fingers and to play scales. All this is done in the studies, the pupil playing all the time with all the others, and always in strict time. When a pupil is advanced to a new study, he does not succeed at first in bringing out more than a few notes, hearing so much rapid playing around him; but he conquers more and more and in much shorter time than one would suppose the new study goes as well as the last one. It is furthermore very remarkable in the method of Logier that his pupils in the first lessons are taught harmony along with the rudiments of music and piano-playing. How this is done I cannot tell. It is the secret of Mr. Logier. Those who have adopted his method of teaching here, have had to pay him a hundred guineas for it. The result of the method is really astonishing. Children of from seven to ten years, who have not had more than four months' instruction solve the most difficult problems. I wrote the common chord of C on the blackboard and named the key in which I desired them to modulate. Immediately one of the smallest girls ran to the blackboard, and, after a short meditation, wrote down first the figured bass and afterwards the parts in full. This problem I had repeated often with additional difficulties; I asked for modulation into the most remote keys where enharmonic changes were required, but the children were never once put out. If one of them was at a loss, another one would come to the rescue, and a third one would perhaps afterwards step up and correct the figured bass of the second one. Of all they did they had to give the reasons. At the close of the examination, I wrote a simple melody on the blackboard, asking the children to set the other three parts to it down on their slates. I told them I would copy the best setting in my musical album. The room was instantly all life and activity, and after a few minutes one of the youngest pupils, who had already distinguished herself before, brought in her slate. But in her hurry she had overlooked a parallel movement in octaves between one of the middle parts and the bass in the third bar. When I directed her attention to it, she turned red, took the slate, and, with tears in her eyes, corrected the error. As her solution of the problem had undoubtedly the best bass now, the teacher copied it off into my album. The lessons of the other children were more or less good, but all correct, and most of them written out in four different clefs. Each pupil played her lesson on the piano correctly and without hesitation.

Signor LUIGI MONTI, recently instructor of Italian in Harvard College, has a card in another column, offering his services as a teacher of music. Mr. Monti is a highly educated and refined gentleman, well known here, a political exile from his native land, who has cast his lot and made his home permanently among us, and who, like many of his countrymen, is compelled to make the accomplishments of prosperity serve a useful end in time of adversity and exile. We have no doubt that he will be found a competent and useful instructor in music, as well as of his native tongue.

We would call attention, also, to the advertisement of Signor BORRA, whose music classes have, for several years, been attended with much success.

A Russian opera by Bortniansky, is soon to be brought out at the opera of Paris.

Musical Correspondence.

HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS., Oct. 24.—It is the desire of several teachers of music to have your opinion, and also that of the best teachers in your city, on a matter which we think a humbug, and is doing the proper cultivation of music much harm.

Of late the Presidents of some female schools have succeeded in employing teachers who agreed to give lessons on the piano to several pupils at the same time, and in order to reconcile patrons to the new system, they tell them that it is the best method to teach pupils to keep time.

One system is to give a pupil three lessons a week, each one half hour long, for which they pay the President fifty dollars for ten months. A professor generally teaches twenty-five pupils for which he receives a salary of a thousand dollars for ten months. Under the other system the teacher gives one half hour lessons also, but teaches these pupils at once during that time: the teacher in that case can teach seventy-five pupils, for which he gets a salary of fifteen hundred for ten months. You see at once that the President makes two thousand dollars more by the latter system.

Now we wish to know if any teacher can instruct three pupils during one half hour, in playing on any instrument, as much as one can when he devotes the whole of that time to one pupil? Can he look to all the little, but important points, such as holding of hands, correct fingering, playing with taste, etc., etc., in three pupils at once? The only thing that is said in favor of the system is, that the pupils learn to keep time. What do you think of a teacher who can not teach pupils how to keep time without teaching two or three together?

By giving us your opinion on this subject, and aiding us to arrest such a system of teaching you will much oblige

SEVERAL TEACHERS IN THE SOUTH.

P. S.—Since writing the above, it has come to our knowledge that a teacher in the State of Tennessee, is teaching a new system of his own invention. His pupils neither learn the notes, nor the keys of the piano; the keys are all numbered, E is marked 1 (E being on the first line,) G 2, B 3, etc., the spaces are between the numbers, first space between 1 and 2, etc. How he manages about ledger lines we don't know, the pupil from whom we received this information not having progressed thus far. He also teaches several at a time.

[The inquiry of our correspondent as to the mode of teaching music described in this communication, is one that is worthy of attention and reply from those whose practical experience enables them to give an opinion of weight in such a matter. Inviting such answers, we refer our readers meanwhile to the opinion of SPORER, upon this question, in the extract from his autobiography in another column.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 5.—Mason & Thomas' first soirée, on Tuesday last, must have afforded great enjoyment to every member of the very attentive audience. The programme was almost faultless. Beethoven's exquisite little Trio, Op. 1, No. 3, full of Mozartlike grace and simplicity, yet foreshadowing all its authors for true greatness. The wonderful posthumous Quatuor of Schubert, and Schumann's beautiful Quintet, each in its way, a gem of purest water, nothing could have been more acceptable. The only number which we might have wished altered, was the piano solo of Mr. Mason. He played an Etude by Chopin, No. 11, Op. 25, in itself one of the least attractive of all, and, I regret to say, hardly made the best of it, although he surmounted very ably all its great difficulties. He was encored, and responded by what seemed one of his own compositions. In spite however, of this slight drawback, the concert was a most enjoyable one, and if the others of the series are equally so, we shall owe a great deal of gratitude to the artists who undertake them.

The short opera season came to a close last Friday. The Huguenots were very finely given on Monday, the Freyschütz on Wednesday, and on Friday Martha was repeated for Formes' benefit. There was some talk of a benefit for Stigelli next Wednesday night, when Fidelio was to be given, but no farther announcement having been made, it is probably deferred. A new season will commence next week.

At the Philharmonic Concert next Saturday, a new prima donna, engaged by Ullmann, makes her debut. Her name is Schroeder-Dummler, and she is announced as a soprano. Mr. Noll will play besides, a violin solo. What has become of "Trovatore?" or rather, why do we not hear anything from him? To his being in town, I can testify, having espied him at the opera: he should not play truant so long.

[We need not say that we are always glad to hear from Trovatore, and echo our correspondent's inquiry.—Ed.]

Musical Chit-Chat.

I am not sure that the famous French pianist, Henri Herz, ever really visited California during his trip, several years ago, through our country; but an amusing story, whose scene is laid in the Golden State, is told of him, and is worth repeating. He had announced a concert (so says the anecdote) in one of the newest cities of California, and had been obliged to send to San Francisco to procure a property necessary to the entertainment, viz: a piano. At the hour announced for the concert, the tickets were all sold, the house was crowded, the artist was at his post, and everything was in readiness—except the piano. In consequence of some inexplicable delay, the instrument had not arrived. Herz looked at his rough and bearded auditory in very considerable trepidation. What if the gold-digging dilletanti should take it into their heads to give him a taste of revolver or bowie knife, by the way of filling up the time? Heavy drops of perspiration stood on the frightened pianist's brow, and he began to wish himself in China, in Kamschatka—anywhere but in California. The miners saw his alarm, and kindly comforted him. "Never mind the cursed pi-an-ner," said two or three of them, soothingly; "we don't care for it; we came to see you. Make us a speech!"

Herz, with restored serenity, did the best he could. The spoken entertainment seemed to please the audience, and everybody, except the artist, had quite forgotten all about the piano, when its arrival was announced. A number of stout men carried the instrument into the hall, and placed it on the platform. It was a three-cornered, or "grand" piano, and Herz, promising himself to astonish these simple and easily satisfied inhabitants of the Pacific coast, seated himself on an empty whisky keg, (instead of the more civilized stool,) and ran his fingers rapidly over the key-board. Blum! blum! splash! splash! Not a sound did the piano utter, save that of keys striking in the water! The Californians who had brought the "box" from San Francisco, finding it very heavy, had floated it to town, and upon dragging it out upon the levee, had neglected to pour the water from the interior!—N. O. Delta.

MADAME MALIBRAN.—One day an intimate friend accused her of being generally too tame in the opening scenes of her character; her reply was curious. "I look upon the heads in the pit as one great mass of wax candles; if I were to light them up all at once, they would waste and soon burn out; but by lighting gradually I obtain in time a brilliant illumination. My system is to light up the public by degrees."

Malibran has been known to undergo the wear and tear of a five hours' rehearsal, with a song at some morning concert between its pauses, and then again in the evening, half an hour after having gone through one of her exhausting parts, to be found as energetic and animated as ever at a Philharmonic or Ancient concert, and then again she would leave for some private party, where after singing with a freshness little impaired, she would wind up the day's exertion, perhaps, by dancing the "Tarantella."

Mozart's newly-discovered opera, "L'Oca del Cairo" (The Goose of Cairo), has been published in the form of a piano score, by Julius Andre, in Offenbach.

ROSSINI.—The patriarch of song, Rossini, has been giving a series of musical soirées at his villa in Passy, and among the artists who have had the honor of exhibiting their savoir faire before the venerable maestro, were the sisters Marchisio. It was their second appearance in a private arena since their début in the salons of Mad. Orfila, and was no less brilliantly successful than the first. They sang the duo in "Semiramis," and also that in "Mathilda di Shabran," in which they never fail to produce the most captivating effect by the admirable blending of their fine voices, and the brilliancy and perfection of their execution. On the same evening, M. de Braga, the violoncellist, gave a touch of his quality by playing, with a very pure tone and exquisite expression, a melody composed by the maestro expressly for him, and called "Une Larme." M. Rubinstein the younger also displayed his powers on the piano. He appears to aim exclusively at brilliancy, rapidity, and feats of execution. M. Huerta, the guitarist, whom every one supposed to be dead, has appeared in the flesh at these soirées, as also have Ronconi, M. Castellani, the buffo, M. and Mad. Tiberini, Mad. Borghi-Mamo, and M. Delle Sedie, an accomplished baritone, whom the Victoria Theatre at Berlin has just carried off from the Scala at Milan. Apropos of the "swan of Pesaro," it is said that he has been very angry with the author of the programme of the festival-concert given at Bois de Boulogne the other day under the direction of M. Venoitte, in which one of the items (No. 10 in the second part) was "Un air classique par Rossini." This excited the wrath of the maestro, who, it must be here related, that the sequel may be understood, has been lately presented with a copy of his ancestral coat of arms, as recently discovered, engraved on a bell in the church of Cotignola. They were engraved on a seal, and accompanied by a pedigree drawn up by M. Luigi Cosmo Ferrucci, the learned librarian of Florence. The crest consists of a branch of a rose tree, on which is perched a nightingale, surmounted by three stars and a wreath of "palms." Alluding to this proof of the antiquity of his family, the maestro is said to have expressed his dissatisfaction with the Boulogne programme in these terms:—"Va pour le rossignol, les trois étoiles et les palmes de l'immortalité; je consens à les léguer à la postérité; mais je me refuse, et me refuserai de mon vivant comme outre tombe, au titre de classique et à tous les honneurs y attachés." ("The nightingale, the three stars, and the palms of immortality are all very well; I consent to bequeath them to posterity; but I refuse, and always shall refuse while I am alive and from beyond the grave, the title of a classic, together with all the honors thereunto belonging.")—London Musical World.

The salons of Erard have been the scene of a grand congress, or rather, the preliminary meetings for one, the object of which is the restoration of plain song and church music. An article in a class paper, called La Matrisse, under the title of L'Idée Mère du Congrès, has appeared, explaining fully the intentions of the association, which has received the patronage of the chief ecclesiastical dignitaries of the country. The first regular meeting of the congress will be held at the end of November in the premises of the Société d'Encouragement pour les Beaux Arts l'Industrie; and the editors of the above-mentioned journal have presented the association with a series of medals in gold, silver, and bronze, to be distributed as prizes for the best missa brevis, the best compositions for the voice and organ applicable to the celebration of divine service, of a simple and severe style, and easy of execution.—Musical Review.

PSALMS OF DAVID.—Great has been their power in the world. They resounded amidst the court of the tabernacle; they floated through the lofty and solemn space of the temple; they were sung with sorrow by the streams of Babel. And when Israel had passed away, the harp of David was still awakened in the church of Christ. In all the eras and ages of that church, from the hymn which it first whispered in an upper chamber until its anthems filled the earth, the inspiration of the royal prophet has enraptured its devotees and ennobled its rituals. Chorused by the winds of heaven, they have swelled throughout God's own on the sky and stars; they have rolled over the broad desert of Asia, in the matins and vespers of ten thousand hermits. They have rung through the deep valley of the Alps, in the sobbing voices of the forlorn Waldenses; through the depths and caves of the Scottish highlands, in the rude chanting of the Scottish covenanted; through the woods and wilds of the primitive America, in the heroic hallelujahs of princely pilgrims.—Rev. Henry Giles.

Paris.

Oct. 4.—News of all sorts is scant this week. The most prominent item is the assurance, which is very commonly promulgated and believed in, that Meyerbeer's long-talked-of Africaine is at last about to be drawn from her long captivity in the écritoire of her illustrious progenitor and proprietor. She is to be made over, after the horrors of that middle passage, a rehearsal, to be a possession of the world at large, or rather, she is to be emancipated and become a free citizeness of every civilized community, on the stage of the Imperial Opera in Paris. The name under which this opera has been so long talked of is not, however, to be retained. Meyerbeer invariably rebaptizes his productions on giving them to the world. It is to be entitled, say the gossips, l'Asro di Gama. The motive which has led the composer to consent at last to the production of his work, the composition of which is said to have preceded that of Le Prophète, is, that in the existing company, under the direction of M. Alphonse Royer, for the first time has presented itself that combination of talents and attributes, which the master judges necessary to give entire fulfilment to his intentions. The simultaneous engagement of Mad. Tedesco and of M. Niemann, the tenor, has brought about this tardy determination. M. Alphonse Royer has engaged M. Morelli, the baritone, who is to play Wolfram in Tannhäuser; but he is to sing in Guillaume Tell first, in which, it is said, he appears to great advantage.

The rehearsals of the Pardon de Ploërmel have commenced at the Opéra Comique. It is said that the air which Meyerbeer composed for the second act, and which Mad. Nanter Didiée sang when Dinorah was produced at Covent Garden, will be introduced on its revival here. Mlle. Darcier is to be entrusted with it. This young lady is the niece of the actress Mlle. Darcier, now retired from the stage, and become Mad. Mamiguard. Before appearing in Le Pardon she will make her début in Pre aux Clercs. I mentioned to you last week a disagreement which had taken place between M. Ernest Reger, the composer of Maître Wolfram, and the manager of the Théâtre Lyrique, who, finding himself trammelled with the previous engagement of his predecessor to produce a new opera by this composer at the opening of the season, had first got the day of production postponed by consent, and then sought to free himself from all definite terms on the subject. An action was threatened, which would most certainly have issued in an award of damages to the injured authors of the work. A better result has been obtained, however, by amicable negotiations. The opera, which is entitled Les Ruines de Baalbec, will be shortly produced without the intervention of any legal process whatever. The Bouffes Parisiennes is in a vein of wondrous good fortune. The twenty-first performance of Orphée aux Enfers, revived this season, have brought in a clear receipt of 40,060 fr. (£1,600), or about £80 per night.

The Italian Opera opened on Tuesday night with La Sonnambula. Mlle. Marie Battu and MM. Gardoni and Angelini were the principal artists. Next week I will tell you at length about the doings at this establishment.

Oct. 10.—The long-promised revival of Le Prophète at the Grand Opera is again put off, and with it the reappearance of Mad. Tedesco. The cause of this fresh procrastination is the illness of Mlle. Hamakers. Last Saturday the Théâtre Lyrique gave a representation extraordinaire, or, as we would say, a benefit in favor of the funds of the Association des Artistes et Musiciens. The performance consisted of the opera Les Rois d'Espagne, a comedy from the Gymnase, entitled Une Partie de Piquet, and a musical interlude contributed by the military band under the direction of M. Mohr. The rehearsals of the Val d'Andorre are nearly brought to a close, and the opera will be produced this week. M. Retz, the manager, has just engaged a pupil of the Conservatoire, Mlle. Baretti, for three years.

The series of Rossini's musical evenings at home at his villa in Passy has been brought to a close, the venerable bard and his lady having returned to their winter quarters in the Chaussée d'Antin. The baritone, Signor Della Siede, who sang with so much success in Rossini's and Mad. Orpila's salons, has returned to Berlin, where he is engaged for the Italian Opera there during the ensuing season. It is said that he is to return to Paris in March next, when he will appear in public.

The approaching marriage of Mlle. Virginie Ferni, the female violinist, is spoken of, to a merchant of Nice, to whom she has been affianced since her tenth year. She will thereupon retire into private life.—London Musical World, Oct. 13.

From the German, by Rev. Charles T. Brooks.

[ON LEAVING THE HOUSE.]

"Come forth, move on with solemn song!
The road is short, the rest is long!
'T was God that led us in at birth,
God leads us forth,—
Man's home is not this house of earth.

"Thou Inn of pilgrims here below!
Thou gavest joy, thou gavest woe:
Now, world, thy door forever close!
The mortal goes
Home to his heavenly repose,—

"Goes to a better place of rest;
His weeping friends pronounce him blest,
Good night! the noonday heavily
Did rest on thee,—
Farewell, the night is cool and free!

"Sound out, ye bells, with festal din,
And ring the blessed Sabbath in,
That calls, 'Here ends life's weary road;
Lay down your load,
And rest in Christ, ye sons of God!'"

[ON ENTERING THE GRAVEYARD.]

"Now, gate of peace, thy wings unclose!
Go in, to take thy long repose!
Ye slumberers in the earth's calm breast,
Grant this new guest
A little space by you to rest!

"How thick the graves around us lie!
Yet countless mansions shine on high;
And there already God's free grace
Hath marked a place
Where soon shall shine this faded face.

"His is the kingdom and the power;
'I come,' he cries, 'none knows the hour!'
Yea, come, Lord Jesus, speedily!
We wait for thee;
Come, make us thine eternally!"

Bach and Mendelssohn

FROM A SOCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

II.

Music and Polished Society.

He who would praise Mendelssohn as he merits, must not forget how many thousands have been attracted to the study of Handel and Bach, through him, and how, with his works, he opened out, for the whole nation, a new appreciation of these men, whose immortal fame will always be ours, yet whom we seemed for a time to have forgotten. Many, even, who cared to hear little else save Parisian and Italian music, have had new pleasure in German musical art awakened in them by Mendelssohn. Here we may plainly see how much more effectual is artistic creation, than all the preaching and theorizing in the world. Zealous critics had long thought to direct attention, with words, to the sublime models Bach and Handel offered us; but as soon as Mendelssohn set his exhortation to notes—or in notes—it succeeded at one blow.

Mendelssohn never betrayed his nationality; how few German masters there are, who can be placed side by side with him in this! Many write in an un-German spirit, and know not what they do. For of all arts, music is the oftenest pursued without thought, while poetry, painting and sculpture allow the changeful conditions of national life to flow in upon them, the majority of composers create according to chance, or, at the best, as a happy instinct guides them.

This is the principal reason why music, that otherwise might become so extraordinary a power, rarely works practically upon the spiritual life of the nation. Mendelssohn chose, consciously, the stand-point of national effectuality. There are some musicians who can forgive him all things but this!

With such a view of the case, it seems a rare accident of destiny—if not something more—that Mendelssohn did not produce an opera. Formerly, an opera might have been carelessly enough composed, and, for all that, it might succeed famously; but the case is altered now. Half a musical generation asked a deep, artistic completion for the opera; and Mendelssohn, the very man of men for this, the only man, perhaps, who could have entirely forced German opera from its incompleteness—must die, when the first act of his opera was yet scarcely finished.

That restorative tendency, by means of which German historical paintings has lately gained such triumphs, naturalized itself with music, in Mendelssohn; indeed, it is a characteristic sign of the musical present. As Overbeck, Veit, and Steinle painted the sacred histories, of which people did not want to hear any thing more, in the serious old style, so Mendelssohn wrote his oratorios and church compositions; but he did not stand still at the ecclesiastical, though he clung as obstinately as the painters to the antiquated; and his circle of view became wide as the world itself, his works more full of life, and more in accordance with the spirit of our own age, although he did not always succeed in making himself fully master of his powers. When a good historic school is founded in our music—and we may safely predict that the near future will see it—Mendelssohn will be named the precursor of that school. We would have the young generation swear, at the Master's grave, not to forget that this is the great heritage he has left to us; and to see to it, that to such an inheritance, an heir is raised up.

Mendelssohn's position in the history of music, may be compared with that which the Caracci occupy in the history of Italian painting. They also purified degenerate art, and returned to the study of the old classic masters, while, sustained by theoretic knowledge—like Mendelssohn—they created thoughtfully conceived works. Their aim has been styled an eclectic one. The same may be truly said of Mendelssohn, who with studied consciousness, united in one whole, the prominent characteristics of earlier schools; a union, which is new in its combination, if not in its parts. It betokens a season of decay, when artists feel themselves obliged to look backward, in order to gather inspiration for new creations, from the study of more fortunate predecessors. Is this also the case in the history of music? Does not the over-abundance of merely technical effects, the abuse of form, look desperately like the degenerate time of historic painting? the Caracci were not able to dam the in-breaking flood of destruction; will the Mendelssohnian school permanently succeed?

When Mendelssohn placed Handel, Bach, and Beethoven, as foundation posts of all further progress in modern music, he brought great changes, not only into production, but even into the current traditional aspect of things. The masters who were looked upon at that time, as peculiarly classic, namely Mozart and Haydn have been—and especially the last named—practically ignored by Mendelssohn. His entire direction is, in fact, an indirect polemic against theirs. This is easy to understand; for that very degeneration in modern music, against which Mendelssohn fought so manfully, is rooted, partly in a misunderstanding of Beethoven, and partly in the spiritless superficiality, which may be traced back, in a direct line, to the stupidly mechanical imitators of Mozart and Haydn. It is plain that such music, running into the sand of the driest triviality, must have been a peculiar horror to a man like Mendelssohn; and when the silly tone-play decorated itself with the spangles of German and French new-romanticism, it was difficult to subdue—for the Philister is immortal. But Mendelssohn was a re-action in himself; he caused us to forget the Viennese tone-school in Handel, Bach, and Beethoven. And we must acknowledge, besides, that, in spite of his classic spirit, he knew better how to set off the clear, delicately sensuous geniality of Haydn and Mozart, than all young Germany and the new romanticists together.

But his one-sidedness first revenged itself on him. For we painfully miss, in Mendelssohn, that which was the good characteristic of the Mozart and Haydn period, in opposition to that of Handel and Bach—namely, the harmonic rounding, and wise economy of the whole, and the youthful freshness of enthusiasm and inspiration. Mendelssohn's works are always plastic and harmonic in parts, but the plasticity of the whole is wanting. This failure displays itself most clearly in his "Elijah," where one beauty strikes another dead, where large groups are spoiled by admirable single characteristics, and thus the whole is dulled by a certain weakness of coloring.

On this account, Mendelssohn's lesser works, which we cannot charge with this defect, make a more decided impression than his greater efforts. Even in the excessive spinning out of the theme, to which a one-sided study of Bach and Mendelssohn easily leads, this want becomes a wise frugality. The further music moves from its natural simple forms, the more it becomes a mere learned composition, and the more broadly the theme spins itself out. Even more than in Mendelssohn, we may observe this in Spohr, and especially in the elderly Spohr. In the old times, the themes were short-breathed, broken up; Mozart and Haydn stretched them out into close, precise proportions that united roundness and brevity; while Beethoven, on this point, too often overstepped the boundary line of beautiful and correct proportion. It is always a sign of the commencement of a downfall in art, when its simple first forms begin to extend their latitude. And this is the Achilles heel of Mendelssohn's otherwise noble and harmonious technic.

We will throw one more glance on the reformatory mission of Mendelssohn.

Is it not a national disgrace, that the Germans should be contending with the Parisians in their superficial opera style, their Fancies, Studies and Rondos,—forgetting those sublime forms of art, springing from the depths of the German mind—the oratorio, the symphony, sonata, quartette? In this Mendelssohn was essentially a national composer; he made it the aim of his life to reinstate these noble forms in all their ancient honor. And so it happened, that he easily fell into frosty elegance, when he, at times, composed "saloon music." But when he composed a German song, a sonata, or a church piece, his heart warmed to his work. Let this be a lesson and a warning to others!

Mendelssohn did his best to give to his large works the greatest possible finish,—but he was notwithstanding, most finished in his smaller works—in his songs; and this is not his least fame. The German song, from the artless national melody, up to the verses of Heine, coquetting with the national style, and over-civilized at heart; has been as genially, as nobly sung by Mendelssohn, as by Mozart and Schubert.* The grey-haired Goethe once laid his hand on the boy Mendelssohn, in whom he took delight. And the serious old master, Cherubini, gave the youth, in weighty words, his recommendation to an artistic career; it must have been the Song Composer Mendelssohn, upon whom Goethe's hand rested, and of whom Cherubini pronounced prophetic words of praise. But we take it as a promising

* I have spoken, in another place, on Mendelssohn's success in the resuscitation of the German People's Song, as follows:

"Mendelssohn had a clear theoretic insight into the character of the national melody; he has even, as it is well known, written national songs, with the intention of concentrating in them the style and spirit of the popular melodies. We cannot find this in any of the great masters who preceded him. And again, he comprehended the people's song in its historical significance. As he was not only a creative, but also a critical and enquiring spirit, this comprehension was, from the beginning, a condition of the most remarkable characteristic of his artistic organization. The national song had been rendered insipid, by the imitations of the Viennese tone-school; the musical romanticists had perverted it with mannerism; but to him it was the most natural thing to go back to the purer original forms, that have been handed down to us from an earlier period. This was like the successful efforts of the sagacious poets, Arnim, Brentano, Uhland, &c., who transferred the simple form and manner of expression of the songs of the middle ages, to their new, thoughtfully written ballads; indeed, in singing the well-known Minne-song, or his song of "Parting," the same spirit is breathed around us, which we enjoy in the works of the above mentioned poets. We must not be surprised that this decisive change in the history of music took place some time after the literary revolution; it was long after the poets, that the musicians stepped out from the period of naïve creation, and decidedly fixed their position, in unity with the revolution in culture of the entire nation. And so it is, that through Mendelssohn, the German people's song, in a deep historical sense, has been re-found; and that, in him, the twilight impulses,—to seek in national melody, creative strength for musical production,—which seems to influence our newest music, ripened, in him, to conscious deed."

sign of the times, that the most national, tone-poet of the present has only been completely, freely, genially creative in the—little song.

The Holy Plays in Bavaria.

A correspondent of the Times writes from Munich, Aug. 28:—

Sir: I have just returned from witnessing the Passions-Spiel at Oberammergau, and I cannot resist endeavoring to furnish your readers with some idea of a performance of a most curious and remarkable nature, and which I have found both interesting and instructive in the very highest degree. The Passions-Spiel originated in a vow made by the inhabitants of Oberammergau, in 1633—on their deliverance from a plague which ravaged the whole district, but fell with especial violence on their village—to represent every ten years for ever the last scenes of the life of the Savior. At that time such representations were not uncommon; now this is probably the only one remaining. Oberammergau, as its name implies, is the upper one of two villages which lie in the plain or meadow of the Ammer, enclosed between some of the hills in the lower northern part of the Tyrolean Alps, 50 or 60 miles south-west of Munich. It contains about 1,280 inhabitants, living in some 200 houses, and, with the exceptions of the parson and his curate and the upper and under schoolmaster, there is probably not a single resident who is above the grade of a simple artificer. The theatre in which the performance now takes place is erected in the meadows just outside the village. It is a temporary building, formed of rough deal planks. The audience part is an enclosure of about 100 feet wide by 140 long, sloping gradually upwards from the stage. It is open to the sky, except at the back, where it is partly covered by a raised gallery of reserved seats, and is capable of accommodating, in all, between 4,000 and 5,000 persons. The text of the drama is the production of a priest, or rather, probably, of successive priests, of the parish. In regard to this considerable mystery is preserved, both as to its authorship and its contents. The songs of the chorus are printed and sold as a programme, but the parts of the solo performers are not to be obtained. Of course, a large portion consists of the actual words of the Gospels, but at least an equally large part is invented. The performance embraces the entire Sacred History, from the entry of Christ to Jerusalem to his appearance to Mary Magdalene in the garden after his resurrection, and every step in the narrative is preceded and illustrated by a representation of the scene or scenes in the earlier history which typified, or are supposed to have typified it. These are not, like the scenes they typify, accompanied by either action or dialogue. They are, in fact, tableaux, silent and rigid, and so far similar to poses plastiques—a term which I several times heard applied to them. They take place in the central hall, and during the three or four minutes of their exposure, the chorus, drawn up in line on the proscenium, sing verses explaining and enforcing the resemblance intended. Some of these were quite new to me, and most happily chosen. Thus, before the Last Supper, appeared successively two tableaux—1. The manna descending on the host of the Israelites. 2. The two spies bearing into the camp the huge bunch of the grapes of Eshcol. The agony in the garden and the betrayal of Christ were in like manner ushered in by—1. Adam gaining his bread by the sweat of his brow; 2. Joab stabbing Amasa under the rocks of Gideon, while in the act of kissing him; and 3. by Samson betrayed by his wife into the hands of the Philistines. The condemnation of the Saviour by Caiaphas, on the evidence of false witnesses, was preceded by the similar condemnation of Naboth at the command of Jezebel; the ultimate sentence to crucifixion, by the release of Joseph from durance, and his exaltation as governor over Egypt, and so on.

There were, in all, 25 of these tableaux, some of them containing more than 150 figures, and they appeared to afford great satisfaction to the spectators. I have said that these tableaux preceded the scenes in this sacred drama itself, typified by them. Of those scenes there were in all 17. I shall enumerate only the most remarkable though it is difficult to distinguish where all were so truthful and so forcible: 1. The Triumphal Entry of Christ to Jerusalem; the children and people shouting "Hosanna!" and strewing clothes and branches. This introduced the Saviour and the apostles, and formed in itself an admirable introduction to the whole. There were certainly not less than 200 persons in the crowd, including 70 or 80 children. 2. The long and animated debates in the Sanhedrin, including the furious evidence of the expelled money changers, and later the interview with Judas, when the contract was ratified between him and the priests by the payment of the 30 pieces of silver. Nothing could be more characteristic, real, and unaffected than these. 3. The Lord's Supper and the washing of the Apostles' feet. Here the table was arranged on the model of the well-known picture of Leonardo da Vinci. 4. All the scenes in which Christ was brought successively before Annas, Caiaphas, Pilate, and Herod. The "Ecce Homo" (copied, it struck me, from Van Dyck). The Scourging, &c. In some of these as many as 200 persons were at once on the scene, infuriated mobs of priests, money changers, Roman soldiers, &c.; and, violent as were the passions personified, there was not the least approach to rant, nor the slightest transgression into irreverence or improbability.

In the course of these scenes, a striking occurrence was the contrast of Barrabas—a brutal and squalid figure—with the noble form and countenance of the sacred sufferer—the latter formed more after the model of those of Albert Dürer than of any other painter,—at least such was my impression. Both Pilate and Herod were admirably represented, but especially the former. 5. The whole long procession, at the slowest pace, from Pilate's house to Golgotha, our Lord and the thieves carrying their huge crosses; his interview with his mother and the other women of Jerusalem. This contained the only legendary or traditional incident in the whole performance to which, therefore, the most rigid Protestant, as such, could object—namely, the wiping of Christ's face by St. Veronica; but there was no attempt to show the miraculous impression of the sacred countenance on the handkerchief which forms the point of the legend, and the action was in itself a most natural and becoming one. 6. Of the last dreadful scene—the uprearing of the three crosses with their living burdens, and all the cruel incidents of that most cruel and lingering death—I know not how to speak. I only know that irreverence or incongruity was a feeling which never once entered my mind. It certainly was not in any way perceptible on any of the faces within my reach, and the long-drawn sob or sigh which escaped from the whole mass of spectators, as from one man, when the sacred corpse was at last carried out of view, was one of the most genuine and remarkable tributes to the reality of the whole representation that can be imagined. The fierce blaze of the afternoon sun, in the full heat of which the two last scenes took place, gave additional vividness to the representation of sufferings which derived half their torture from the fever and thirst by which they were accompanied. 7. Whether it was that the subsequent scenes were really less forcibly presented or not I do not know, but certainly they did not equal what had preceded them. More artifice was necessary in the management of the tomb, &c., and of the supernatural incidents of the resurrection. There was an unnecessarily long scene between the priests and Pilate, and the illustrative tableaux seemed neither so good nor so appropriate as before. Perhaps the truth is, that after so tremendous a dénouement even that termination must have the effect of an anticlimax. At any rate, one was now hot and exhausted, and the termination of the whole at a few minutes before four was felt by every one as a relief. The performance began at eight, and thus lasted nearly eight hours, without any interval for refreshment. The only character which calls for any remark, as being, to a certain degree, different from the ordinary conception, was that of Judas. He was not exhibited as the hardened villain which we commonly take him to be steadily foreseeing and contemplating throughout the tremendous consequences of his treachery; but rather as a narrow-minded, impulsive, vindictive man, really puzzled and annoyed at what he conceived to be the "waste" of the 300 pence on the precious ointment, and stung to the quick by the reproof so publicly administered to him by Christ. Under the influence of these feelings he at last consents to the suggestions and entreaties of the priests and money-changers. But he never really believes that what does happen will actually come to pass, and his violent self-murder is the sudden result of his discovery of the certainty of the dreadful catastrophe in which he has been a chief actor. The minor details of the play were no less excellent than the more important matters. The music was truly admirable. It was composed or compiled by the village school-master, Dadler Rochus by name, for the performance in 1810, and was throughout melodious and grave, and in perfect keeping with the piece. Much of it reminded me of Mozart, though I failed to detect any appropriations of importance. The long-accompanied recitatives in which the chorus accompanied the tableaux were quite in the manner of Sebastian Bach. No use, however, was made of the chorales of the German school, of which the latter great master has made frequent use in his oratorios of the Passion. In the forms and colors of the crosses the paintings of the German school seem to have been mainly followed. The priests and their adherents appear in caps, turbans, and robes of the most curious forms, which have a wild Eastern kind of look, but do not appear to me to be accurate. At any rate, they were not the dresses of modern Orientals. The Roman soldiers, though exceedingly picturesque, were more like mediæval than classical figures.—The Times.

Johanna Kinkel's Eight Letters to a Friend.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAUBERT, A. M.)

V.

Recurring to a remark in the beginning of my preceding letter I declare it to be my opinion that all persons without a natural musical organization had better not attempt singing and playing rather than make us poor piano teachers martyrs of patience. Why music has become so exclusive a social fashion I am at a loss to understand. A "refined" house without a piano seems an impossibility. Girls incapable of reciting a poem correctly still learn how to sing. We can hardly make a visit without being visited by music, and what horrible music! Friends and enemies of music are equally offended by the sight of an opened piano with two candles upon it, when they enter a room for the sake of recreation. This music playing between conversation is a dissolving acid to talking. If you succeed in finding an intelligent individual with whom to talk over highly interesting topics, if copious thoughts throng in for mutual exchange, the most animated communications are suddenly cut off by the cry of terror: "Do you remember?"

You conquer your impatience, listen to the song that you have heard a hundred times with secret indignation, and then take up the preceding theme again. Before you have been able to answer satisfactorily a friend's important question, the air wafts from the piano the beautiful song, "Pop goes the—"

Finally, you lose the last bit of patience and the desire of devoting the slightest attention to so cut up a conversation, and allow everything to fall upon you you are an indolent prey to jingling, chatting, tea and cake.

This intolerable music playing intruded upon people without their being asked whether they like it is a chief cause of the dullness of most of our "society."

If a body wants to hear music let him go to a concert; if he seeks conversation, let him go into society. How mean is it to allure one into "society" by the prospect of conversation and force him to listen to music. They should at least honestly say beforehand that there will be music, so that he may betimes escape.

The musician daily surrounded by the dreamy life of sounds, needs for his recreation an absolute change from his sphere of spiritual dawn to the sunlit region of mind, where thoughts strike electric sparks upon thoughts. What an enjoyment is a well arranged conversation growing up like an artistic work! The French are undoubtedly masters in this respect, while we place musical evening entertainments in its stead. How many women are in great need of this art of nobler conversation, sharpening, as it does, the clear insight in all relations! But they sit silently with their knittingwork in society and let music operate upon their senses to save the trouble of thinking. Those on the next lower step chat gratuitous nonsense between the music and look in their incomprehensible rudeness upon it as a means of covering up the pauses that may arise in their talk. Society and music stand in the same relation as church and state, they fare better when sharply separated.

If "Society" is by all means to crave the alliance with some art in order to be elevated above the common style, let them choose poetry, it being rather more congenial to conversation than music. How little known are our greatest lyrical poets in comparison with the poorest song makers! No wonder; for custom allows our ladies only to make a show by singing and not by reciting or speaking in larger circles. How much more would poetry refine the ladies if they would as zealously patronize it as they now do music!

Is it not strange that a young girl sings unashamed before hundreds but cannot recite a poem before the smallest company without trembling?

And yet how little do girls know their advantage here! The selection of their favorite poet and the tone of their voices in speaking his verses would afford them a more immediate outpouring of their soul than the mysterious language of tones understood by so few.

It is an innate want of every girl's heart to represent her own sentiments in an ideal light. Thence comes that strong and anxious desire to sing, even where voice and talent are wanting. It is stimulated by an outside impulse frequently, I apprehend, leading girls without inner qualification for music to enter its temple; that is, we are so preëminently living in a musical age, that girls singing and performing on the piano enjoy an unjust privilege above their unmusical sisters. They are from early youth introduced in larger circles, attract more attention and marry sooner than others whose qualities remain unnoticed. Girls of cold hearts appear often more "souled" than others, because they express well drilled sentiments with a melodious voice although incapable of sentiment. Others who cannot invest themselves with such like prestige feel perhaps deeply, but their unmusical sounds render their sentiments a bitter irony.

The latter ought, for their own benefit, necessarily to take leave of the musical department and be made representatives of the rhetorical art.

You will look upon this letter as an odd deviation, since instead of promoting you (according to my promise) on the road of musical instruction, I declare myself for once against music. But I am aware that our art is undermined by the many unfit elements, and I would fain warn every mother not to sacrifice, out of sheer fashionableness, part of the life of her child to learning that art, if it does not possess natural talent or great predilection for it.

[We fully concur with the author; there is, unfortunately, a great deal of hackneying of music and jingling done. Indeed, where there is, as in large cities, ample and frequent opportunity of listening to fine musical performances in concert and theatres, "society" should be spared the annoyance of seeing music profaned and instruments tormented; but there are hundreds of towns, where no concerts or operas are given and where there are people anxious to hear music, contented with the lighter range of compositions. Now, if pieces of the latter kind and perfectly within reach of amateurs and members of a family are well played, it may be excusable for parents, who sometimes work hard to scrape together the teacher's fee and high-priced music-plates, to desire to hear their children play in company, the more or less deserved praise of which bestowed upon the little performer tends undoubtedly to encourage him (or her) to push forward on the hard road. But we should suggest that, wherever music is performed in family circles, there should also be a kind of due regard for other attainments; why should it be impossible, to perform some well learned compositions and to recite elegantly and correctly some excellent poems? Would not this do away with the author's just objection and at the same time popularize the fine arts, making them the "Penates" of Home? Just try it. —TRANSLATOR.]

Recollections of Mendelssohn.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

My first winter in Europe (that of 1844-5) was passed in Frankfort-on-the-Main. Among the advantages which I there enjoyed, not the least was that of educating, to some extent, a totally uncultivated taste for music—taste only, not talent—by hearing, habitually, the best productions of the best composers. The City Theatre at that time was noted throughout Germany for the classic character of the operas which were produced on its boards. It possessed an admirable orchestra, a company of singers, of whom, if none were great, none at least were indifferent, and a Director who consulted the interests of Art as the true means to advance his own. Not only Beethoven's Fidelio, all the operas of Mozart, including Titus and the Abduction from the Seraglio, and the master-pieces of Gluck and Cherubini, were given, but many forgotten operas of the past century were revived. My enjoyment of these works was of course more enthusiastic than intelligent, but, under the guidance of my friend and housemate, Richard Storrs Willis, I attained, at last, some appreciation of the characters of the various masters.

My highest measure of veneration was given to Beethoven, but, of living composers, none impressed me more profoundly than Mendelssohn. In him I found that rare union of imagination with the artistic sense (the classic instinct of proportion) which is the loftiest characteristic of genius. During the winter the Society of St. Cecilia produced his "Walpurgisnacht," the music to Goethe's words. I remember repeating to myself the opening lines, on the way to the concert-hall, and imagining a light, joyous air:

"Now laughs the May:
To forests gay
The ice no more is clinging:
The snow has fled,
And every glade
Resounds with merry singing!"

and I remember, too, the surprised delight with which I heard, instead, the long, ringing outcry of gladness, monotonous as sunshine, and as dazzling. Mendelssohn was then temporarily residing in Frankfort, and was himself present at the performance of this work. I was not, however, aware of this at the time.

Shortly afterwards, during the great Annual Fair, I was walking one afternoon with my friend Willis, along the northern bank of the Main. It was a deliciously warm, sunny day, at the close of March, and the long stone quay was thronged with thousands of strangers from all parts of Europe. Poles, Bohemians, Tyrolese, Italians, and Greeks, were scattered through the crowd, and their various tongues and dialects continually met the ear. Against the ancient houses, beside the water-gate, were booths glittering with gaudy wares, and surrounded with groups of peasants in holiday costume, and up the river, over the old sand-stone bridge, over the green meadows of Offenbach, rose the mountains of Spessart, a dim, purple background to that broad picture of moving life. As we pushed through the crowd, my eyes, which had been wandering idly over the picturesque faces and costumes around us, were suddenly arrested by the face of a man a little distance in front, approaching us. His head was thrown back, and his eyes, large, dark, and of wonderful brilliancy, were fixed upon the western sky. Long, thin locks of black hair, with here and there a silver streak, fell around his ears. His beard, of two or three days' growth, and his cravat, loosely and awkwardly tied, added to the air of absorption, of self-forgetfulness, which marked his whole appearance. He made his way through the crowd mechanically, evidently but half conscious of its presence.

As he drew nearer, I saw that his lips were moving, and presently heard the under-tone of a deep, rich voice, chanting what appeared to be a choral, judging from the few bars which reached me in passing. It was evidently—as I felt immediately—a soliloquy in music. I have not yet lost, and never shall lose, the impression it produced upon me, though I can no longer recall the notes. My companion grasped my arm and whispered, "Mendelssohn!" as he slowly brushed past me, and, for a single moment, the voice of his inspiration sang at my very ear. I stopped instantly, and turned; yet, so long as I could follow him with my eye, he was still pressing slowly onward, with the same fixed, uplifted gaze, lost to everything but his art.

I was twenty years old, and as enthusiastic and sentimental as youth of that age are prone to be. So I wrote the next day an eloquent letter to the composer, concluding with the request that he would send me a line, as a souvenir of the place and the season, in which I first became acquainted with his works. (If there was any indiscretion in this, I have since received ample punishment for it.) He replied immediately, in a very kind note, inclosing the score of a chorus in the Walpurgisnacht, in his own manuscript:

"Still shines the day,
Whence'er we may
A pure heart bring to thee."

Something kindly and cordial in his words inspired me with confidence to venture further. I had written several poems on musical subjects during the winter, and it entered my mind that I might use them as a means of introducing myself to his acquaintance. On second thoughts I selected the best—a lyric entitled "Beethoven," (which, I am now glad to say, was never published,) and set out for Mendelssohn's residence. He was then occupying modest apartments in the Bockenheimer Gasse, not far from the gate of that name. The servant ushered me into a plainly-furnished room, containing a grand piano and a few pictures and books, in addition to the ordinary articles. A moment afterwards, the door of an adjoining chamber opened, and Mendelssohn appeared. I explained, in rather an embarrassed manner, that I was the person who had written to him two days before, and begged pardon for the additional liberty I had taken. He at once gave me his hand, asked me to be seated, and drew another chair for himself to the little round table near the window.

I sat thus, face to face with him, and again looked into those dark, lustrous, unfathomable eyes. They were black, but without the usual opaqueness of black eyes, shining, not with a surface-light, but with a pure, serene, planetary flame. His brow, white and unlined, was high and nobly arched, with great breadth at the temples, strongly resembling that of Pœ. His nose had the Jewish prominence without its usual coarseness: I remember, particularly, that the nostrils were as finely cut and flexible as an Arab's. The lips were thin and rather long, but with an expression of indescribable sweetness in their delicate curves. His face was a long oval in form, and the complexion pale but not pallid. As I looked upon him, I said to myself, "The Prophet David!" and since then I have seen, in the Hebrew families of Jerusalem, many of whom trace their descent from the princely houses of Israel, the same nobility of countenance. Those who have read the rhapsodical romance of "Charles Auchester," wherein the character of Seraphael is meant to represent Mendelssohn, will find his personality transfigured by one of his adorers—yet, having seen that noble head, those glorious eyes, I scarcely wonder at the author's extravagance. The composer Benedict once told me that when he was pursuing his musical studies under Carl Maria von Weber, his fellow-student, the boy Mendelssohn, was a picture of almost supernatural beauty.

"You are an American," said he, after a pause. "I have received an invitation to visit New York, and should like to go, but we Germans are afraid of the sea. But I may go yet: who knows? Music is making rapid advances in America, and I believe there is a real taste for the art among your people." I assured him this was true, and hoped that he would still find it possible to visit us. "Are you a musician?" he asked. "No," said I, "I have devoted myself to literature. I have not achieved much, as yet, but I hope to succeed. I have ventured to bring with me a poem on Beethoven, whom, I know, you honor as a master." "Ah," said he, "let me see it!" He then read it through carefully, partly aloud, with a very good English pronunciation, and on concluding, asked, "May I keep it? Here is a stanza which I like especially." (Excuse me from quoting it.) "Oh, you must persevere! Let your Art be all in all to you. You have your life still before you, and who knows what you may make of it?"

I rose to leave, fearful that I might be detaining him from some important labor. He again shook hands, and said, playfully, "Now we know one another, you must come and see me whenever we happen to be in the same town. When you visit Leipzig, or Berlin, or Cologne, if you find I am there, come at once to my house, and we can have further talk, and become better acquainted."

I was never able to take advantage of this kind invitation. His cordial "auf wiedersehn!" were the last words I heard from him, and the spiritual beauty of his face is now, in memory, indeed, the beauty of an immortal spirit. Two years and a half afterwards (in November, 1847) he died, having not yet attained his thirty-ninth year.—Independent.

Married to Music.

An unusually comic "Marriage in High Life," on Saturday last week, took place according to the Morning Post, at another Temple of Hymen than St. George's, Hanover Square. The superior classes are now out of town, and nothing is going on at the crack matrimonial temple there but ordinary divine service. Edinburgh, not London, comprised the site of the sacred edifice wherein these nuptial rites were celebrated. The exalted couple were an Honorable of the harder sex and an Earl's daughter of the softer. The report of these aristocratic hymeneals states that the bride "was conducted to the altar by her guardian," a Duke, and that—"As the bride advanced to the altar, the organ played Handel's anthem, 'Exceeding glad.'"

The bride ought to have been much obliged to the organ. Of course, the anthem it played was performed chiefly with a devotional view, and not for a purpose analogous to that of a polka. Still, in advancing to an altar to be married before it, a young lady wants some support rather stronger than a smelling-bottle and the arm of her guardian. Common brides cry on these occasions, and sometimes faint. Nothing can be better calculated to fortify the heart and sustain the spirits of anybody in the immediate prospect of marriage than one of old Handel's anthems—let it be even a funeral one; they are all so jolly. Perhaps, however, "Happy we," from "Acis and Galatea," would have been more seasonable and suitable than "Exceeding glad!" Oh! say not that it would have been inappropriate to the sanctity of the edifice and the solemnity of the occasion. For read on, and you will arrive at the statement following—

"The marriage ceremony was then performed by the Very Rev. E. B. Ramsey, Dean of Edinburgh, and as the marriage party left the chapel, Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March' was played on the organ."

St. John's Chapel, Edinburgh, is indeed a Temple of Hymen. Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" is a movement in the secular direction considerably ahead, we suppose, of anything in the way of musical accompaniment to matrimony yet ventured on at St. George's, Hanover Square. What would the Bishop say if he heard that a marriage party had been played out of a London church with that jubilant composition—the gem of the music in the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Perhaps, that no tune in the world could have been more opportune; only in the next similar case he would rather have it played just outside the church door by a German band, or, with due respect to the high order of the music and rank of the happy pair, by the orchestra of her Majesty's Theatre.

Should, however, the Bishop of London not object to illustration of the marriage service by dramatic music, the example set at St. John's, Edinburgh, may be improved on at St. George's, Hanover Square. If the bridesmaids do not advance to the altar, they may at all events retire from it to the celebrated chorus and waltz assigned to their representatives in Carl Maria von Weber's immortal opera. Mozart in "Le Nozze di Figaro," might also be laid under contribution to supply harmonious embellishments for marriage in high life. Then Rossini and the rest of the Italian school could be unlimitedly drawn upon. Meyerbeer could furnish selections from "Robert le Diable," and there is no reason why "Satanella" should not be applied to the same purpose, except that "Satanella" is an English opera. Could not the whole matrimonial service be sung as well as said, responses and all; a musical clerk officiating for a bridegroom without ear?

But the worst of all this will be that the lower orders aping their betters, and at the same time actuated by their own inferior tastes, will also want to get married to music. Is there not a song called "Come let us all haste to the Wedding?" This is the kind of thing you would have at St. Giles's if at St. George's you permitted "Giovinette che fate." Then one thing would lead to another, and you would have couples in the costermongery line advancing to the altar whilst the organ played "Drop of Brandy," and dancing out of church to the "Devil among the Tailors."

St. John's chapel, Edinburgh, is, of course, an Episcopal chapel, and it is to be feared that the matrimonial music performed there, on the auspicious occasion of a recent "Marriage in High Life," will not, if it should come to the ears of the Scottish public, induce the national mind of Scotland to renounce its definition of a church organ as a "kist fu o' whistles."—Punch.

Macfarren's Robin Hood.

The production of this new opera at Her Majesty's Theatre is an occurrence worthy of more than ordinary notice, for this simple and sufficient reason, that Robin Hood is, we have no hesitation in saying, the greatest work that has been produced for the English musical stage since the days of Purcell. Indeed, we doubt whether it is right to make even this qualification; for though our immortal countryman ought ever to hold the highest place among English musicians, yet in his time dramatic music was almost unknown in England; and though his mighty genius carried him far in advance of his age, yet his essays in writing for the theatre are scarcely entitled, in our day, to the name of operas. The Tempest, King Arthur, Bonduca, and Purcell's other so-called operas, were merely plays with music introduced. None of the dramatis personæ sang a note; the music consisting of incidental airs, choruses, and other pieces, sung and played by performers who took no part in the action of the piece. Of the opera, properly so-called, music is an essential element; it is the language in which persons of the drama express their sentiments and feelings. It is as necessary to an opera as blank verse is to a tragedy; but as tragedy sometimes relapses from the dignity of verse in scenes where the dialogue is light and trivial, a similar relaxation has been allowed in opera, the performers, in such scenes, using only ordinary speech, without music. But this relaxation is not at all permitted on the Italian stage, where every word of the dialogue is uttered in music. So it is in the French and German serious opera, talking been admitted only into the opera buffa, and sparingly even there. In this country, in the progress of the stage, musical pieces called operas came into vogue, in which the actors themselves sang; but still the chief part of the dialogue was simply spoken, the performer every now and then breaking into a song, as is now done in the French vaudevilles. Such were all our English operas of the last and the beginning of the present century, including the works of Arne and his successors, down to Bishop. Since then the foreign models have been more and more adopted, and the language of the stage has been more and more associated with music.

Mr. Macfarren's Robin Hood is the most complete specimen of English Opera, in its modern shape, that we possess. The works of his greatest predecessors were produced in immature states of the art; and he has unquestionably carried away the palm from the most eminent of his contemporaries. Whether his rivals who are most competent to contend for it, will yet do so successfully, remains to be seen. Meanwhile he holds it by the general voice of the public. The composer has been fortunate in having for his collaborator, Mr. John Oxenford, whose poem is a rara avis among opera librettos. It is a pretty drama; elegant, interesting, and admirably suited to the requirements of the musician. For materials, Mr. Oxenford has had recourse to the fine old traditional ballads of which Robin Hood is the hero, and to Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, in which the gallant outlaw is so delightfully introduced. The plot and construction of its piece, however, seem to be original.

Mr. Macfarren is already well known, by numerous productions in various branches of the art, not excepting the stage. His Devil's Opera, Don Quixote, and King Charles the Second, are works of a high order and deserved success, but Robin Hood is a step much in advance of both. It evinces genius, matured by experience and study, and especially by the study of the national music of his own country. Mr. Macfarren emulates the modern foreign composers, Rossini, Auber and Meyerbeer, but does not imitate them. He has profited by the study of their works in acquiring their constructive skill, their power of combination, and knowledge of dramatic and orchestral effect; but he never forgets, or allows the audience to forget, that he is an Englishman, and that they are listening to English music. This gives a peculiar charm to the music of this opera, which distinguishes it from that of his contemporaries, who, while their clever, and often brilliant, productions show that their minds and memories are imbued with the foreign schools of music, betray an entire neglect of the rich stores of our own national melodies.—London Musical World, Oct. 27.

Musical Correspondence.

VIENNA, AUGUST 18th, 1860.—Among the many talented and considerable musicians of the present time at Vienna, Herr Johann Rufinatscha holds a place in the first rank. At the present time he is hardly known to the public, excepting as an excellent teacher of the piano and of harmony; but about 1848 and a little later he appeared as a composer, and met with great success. He gave two concerts of his own works at Vienna, and one at Innsbruck, (being a Tyrolese), others too perhaps. He produced overtures and symphonies as well as other orchestral works, and was, as before said, warmly welcomed by the public and the critics. He has various songs as well as piano music of the higher order already published. But concert-giving is a costly matter in Europe or certainly in Germany, if an orchestra be a necessary thereto; even under the best auspices and in the largest halls the proceeds of an orchestral concert is doubtful. Ten years ago the thing was on a much worse footing than at present, when music, good music is far more widely and assiduously cultivated. A composer too undertaking to bring his own works before a public, must deposit so much (no small sum) beforehand, in order to assure the authorities and musicians of their wages; in concerts like those of Liebig's in Berlin, the musicians on the contrary are paid much less for their time. At any rate Herr Rufinatscha was forced by his circumstances, and still more by long-continued ill health, to renounce the giving of concerts and even the devoting himself to composition, and turned in earnest to the collecting of a small property for his later days—this is at present the occupation of his life, although he continually writes smaller things, as for instance little pieces for the piano.

Herr Rufinatscha is the son of a landed and prosperous farmer, in the Tyrol close to the famous Stelvio pass, who was very much reduced by the wars in the time of Napoleon. The French and Bavarian soldiery committed enormous excesses, pillaging and burning houses on all sides and his among others. This young man was one of many children, and was intended for the church; but he early exhibited great inclination and talent for music, and at last left his father's house, when about fourteen years old, for Innsbruck, where he supported himself by teaching in various branches. Later he went with a family to Vienna, and there put himself under Herr Sechter, a famous and excellent teacher of harmony; he remained some time with him, giving piano lessons at the same time to earn his bread, and at last became much liked as instructor. Herr Sechter had a great regard for him and for his talents, by no means a common thing with the old master, if report speaks truly.

Herr Rufinatscha had composed, before studying music at all, a symphony, in which he had unconsciously obeyed the rules of the art. He then went on giving lessons and composing his greater works, and as already mentioned produced them in and about 1848.

As a teacher of piano he is widely known and stands among the first; but as a teacher of harmony he is particularly to be admired and prized. He understands the art and science of music utterly and entirely, he has turned it round and round and made himself conversant with it on every side, as well as with the different systems of teaching it. He leads his pupil gently from step to step, illustrating every moment all that he says, and finally without having seen the onward movement the pupil understands all. Understands all I say; all that one can understand without composing oneself, for the real and deep insight into the art can only be thus acquired. Herr Rufinatscha's patience and encouraging manner is of the greatest use in touching harmony, for the study is dry enough at first. He is a strenuous advocate of steady and hard work, in order to develop one's musical thoughts, and asserts that it is possible to do a great deal in music with no very great talent. Certain it is that one must work, and work in order to master the art, and to be free from every technical difficulty—then only can the musical thoughts have fair play, and present themselves in all their beauty.

Like very many alas! of the subjects of Austria and of other European governments, Herr Rufinatscha wishes to leave his country. Pecuniarily speaking he could not well do better than in Vienna, for he has very well-paid lessons, and only too many of them. But he interested himself in the movement of 1848, and was equally disgusted by the folly and wickedness of the so-called Liberals, and by the relapse to despotism. Ever since that he has been hoping and hoping for better times, and latterly despairing of them he has wished to go to America. He is the kind of man that we need, a thoroughly educated, enthusiastic, able musician, and a gentleman in thought, word and deed, which is more than can be said for too many musicians in Europe and in America; every one who has lived with this class has doubtless found as I have, many noble, kind, gentle, admirable men of great talent, but also some (always too many) who had few such claims to our respect. I have urged Herr Rufinatscha to go to America, because I thought he would be a real benefit to the progress of this art in our country, and because we have, in common with the rest of the world, too many purely technical musicians. But I should have urged him much more, had I felt any certainty of his finding the means of support. The flood of music which has been poured into our young and growing country, quite equals its present wants. When we devote as much attention to the art as the Germans do, we shall need more teachers and more players of instruments; and we shall need too more artists fit to drill and lead singing and orchestral societies of amateurs; which last field is the one most difficult to be filled, and for which Herr Rufinatscha is admirably fitted. If he should resolve to come, may he find lessons enough to live upon; this is all he desires, and then he will make for himself a sphere, and will with pleasure give orchestral concerts, if they but pay for themselves and leave him nothing. Like every earnest man he is anxious to do his work on this earth and to advance the standing of his art, and like every real producing musician, he is desirous of doing something more than the giving lessons, even though he gains not a penny by it. NEW YORK, NOV. 13, 1860.—Summoned like a spirit from the vasty deep, by the adjurations in the last number of Dwight's Journal, from "—t—" and the "editor," I resume again the pleasant functions of a New York correspondent of the musical paper, which during the last four years has taken the trouble to print my various communications. The last communication, however, that I sent to Dwight's never appearing in the columns of the paper, gave rise to the supposition on my part that my services as a scribbler were no longer acceptable; but the summons of "—t—" and its accompanying editorial comment have brought me once more to the surface.

Looking back during the period of some five or six months since I have written to you, I find that I have passed through some agreeable if not startling musical experience. Various brief opera seasons under transient Italian and German dynasties have come and gone. STROELLI whom I hailed with rapturous delight on his first appearance here, has become the tenor of a New York audience. FABBRI has appeared and established a good lyrical reputation. COLSON has sung and acted and dressed, and looked so indescribably bewitching, that with half the opera enthusiasts in New York I have fallen deeply—oh! so unfathomably deeply—in love with the delightful creature. ADELINA PATTI has worn her popularity not quite out—but sufficiently so to demand a change. CARL FORMES has returned, and D'ANORI has arrived, and that classic ruin FREZZOLINI, whose every operatic performance (notwithstanding her decaying voice) is positively worth shekels of gold, has flitted away down South, to Dixie, for all I know.

But not merely operatic experience have I had. A visit to the West has opened my eyes and ears not a little.

Were you ever in the Mammoth Cave? It is, with all its wonders, the most god-forsaken, dreary, gloomy spot mortal ever entered. Yet there is some strange mystic power in the place to transfigure the weakest, most wretched music into harmony fit for the celestial spheres.

After poking about in the bowels of the earth for three or four hours, visitors to the Cave arrive at Echo River, where they embark on a disgustingly muddy scow, or if the party is large enough, two or three wretched boats are brought into requisition. The women are all dressed in fancifully colored bloomer dresses, and with the uplifted lanterns, present a strange and weird appearance as the boat is pushed from the shore, and floats down into the black gloom, the lights reflecting themselves on the surface of the deadly still water, and lighting up with strange effect the arch of rock overhead. When they are fairly out of sight we enter the other boat, and ourselves push out into the dark stream. Dark, awfully dark it is. The dark river of Death finds on earth no more vivid parallel than this. You know in the first picture of Cole's "Voyage of Life" the gloomy river of the past from which floats out into life and light the little boat of the baby voyager. The stream issues from a dark, rocky cavern, mysterious and unknown. Such a stream is this on which we are embarked. Silent and gloomy, dark and mysterious, it serves as a type of the past and the future—of the past mystery whence all life evolves of the inscrutable future whether all life tends.

The feeling of security is not very great. The boats sink down almost to the water's edge, and the perpendicular slippery rock on either side offer no ledge on which a shipwrecked voyager might find a temporary footing. Above, sometimes so low that you must crouch to avoid it, and again so high as to be scarcely visible, rises the rock-roof, while the water in which you glide is thirty feet in depth, and as cold as the brow of a corpse. There is no sound but the rippling made by the boat; not a cricket along the shoreless stream, not a fish to plunge up and flash a moment in the air before returning to its watery home—no symptom of life—no sound, no motion save that made by ourselves.

Hark! there is a sound! Far off a delicate shade of music, so faint as to seem the ghost of some wandering echo. But by degrees it increases. It becomes clear and defined. Rich harmony trembling with strange sensuous wildness—fluttering around the rocky projections, swelling in waves of harmony to the arched roof above. Now it appears to come from one direction, now from another. Anon a higher note or strain is heard like some clear voice rising above a mighty chorus. Never did syren sing more magic songs to listening traveller, never did the mysterious maiden of Lurlei-burg chant more entrancing melody to the unwary boatman who floats along the moonlit Rhine.

Suddenly a turn of the boat brings you opposite a break in the perpendicular rock-shore, and perched upon a mass of broken rock you see a party of four negroes playing upon violins and a cornet. Those are the syrens, these the Lurlines of Echo River. Out on the earth's surface their music would be merely quaint and odd, but here, in the Mammoth Cave it is weird and unearthly.

Floating away, out of sight of the above minstrels, —who are in fact the barber, boot-black, or waiter from the hotel at the mouth of the cave—their music resumes its supernatural tones and effect, and so until we land at the opposite shore of the dark river, it haunts the ear with its peculiar harmony—while ever after it forms the most vivid reminiscence of a visit to the Mammoth Cave.

Visiting different Western cities I popped into various churches, and at St. Louis heard some very good music at an Episcopal church, but which one I forget—otherwise not much musical experience in my Western tour.

We will have the opera here next week, the season commencing with La Juive, sung by Stigelli and Fabbri. Colson was at last accounts at Cleveland, giving concerts with Miss Kellogg. Of the Philharmonic Concert Saturday night, “—t—” will undoubtedly give you an elaborate notice.

Mr. C. JEROME HOPKINS who is most indefatigable in the giving of concerts, has got a new project. He proposes to give a concert of church music, in which the choir of Trinity Church will take part, and chants be sung antiphonally, with twenty-five voices on each side. TROVATORE.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 1860.—Dear Sir: After a long silence the spirit again moveth. Positively, it has not moved before, since last spring. The only reason I can give for not writing is that there has been nothing to write, a reason which some think, has nothing to do with the question.

The Trinity Church people repeated their Grand concert and again for the third time filled our large hall. Better amateur music I never heard. It would be invidious to particularize, besides, such things are of little interest abroad. When I entered the room I thought one of the New York tenors was there, and looked and looked to see which one.

Our Philharmonic Society is in full blast. It promises to give us a Grand concert soon. In my next I intend to say something particular about it.

Nov. 2th and 8th Colson gave us two concerts, assisted by Susini, Brignoli, Ferri, Miss Kellogg, &c. Well, as your readers all know what kind of a concert that must be with those artists, there is no use of particularizing. Such artists must like to come to St. Louis, for they always draw at least a thousand people and that must pay; generally the audiences are larger.

Only one thing can we complain of. They hurry through every thing, plainly saying by their actions, “These people in the provinces do not form such a critical audience as the metropolis can turn out—so you go on and hurry it up, and I will hurry mine, and let’s get through.”

Colson gave two concerts and then Manager Boernstein engaged her for last eve to have one opera night and bring out “Don Pasquale.” We have no American Opera House or even a decent theatre. Herr Boernstein however has built a German Opera House that will compare favorably with any in the United States, except, of course, the Academies of Music in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. It is in all respects a very fine house, and reflects much credit on the proprietor and manager Mr. Boernstein, both for his taste and liberal expenditure. The audience assembled Saturday evening never was excelled on any similar occasion for numbers and appearance. Everything was as perfect as it could be. And the artists were themselves. And here at the close let me repeat my wonder why we have so few first class entertainments when they evidently pay so well. Yours, A. C.

New Instruments.

BY HECTOR BERLIOZ.

THE MELODIUM ORGAN.

This instrument has a key-board like the organ built with pipes. Its sound results—like that of the concertina—from the vibration of free metallic reeds, over which passes a current of air. This current of air is produced by a bellows, put in motion by the feet of the performer; and according to the mode in which the feet act upon this blowing mechanism, in certain conditions wherein the instrument may be placed, the sounds acquire more or less intensity.

The melodium organ thus possesses crescendo and diminuendo; it is expressive. Hence the name of “Register of Expression,” given to the particular mechanism it possesses. The fingering of the key-board is the same as that of the organ key-board. It is written on two lines, and even on three; like the organ. Its compass is five octaves.

This compass, however, is not limited to the above, for melodiums with more than one stop. The number of stops is very variable. The most simple melodium contains two different qualities of tone; the quality of tone of the coro inglese for the left half of the key-board, and that of the flute for the right half.

The others,—according to the will of the maker,—may have, by different combinations, bassoon, clarion, flute, clarinet, fife, and hantov stops (so called, on account of the analogy which then exists between the quality of tone of the melodium, and that of those instruments); and moreover, the Grand stop, the Forle, and the Expressive. These stops give to the melodium a compass of seven octaves, although its key-board has only five.

They are placed at the command of the performer by means of a mechanism like that of the organ, placed on each side of the body of the instrument, and put in action by drawing forward a wooden handle with either hand.

The melodium does not possess the moveable stops of the organ, the effect of which excites in many people a traditional admiration; but which, in reality, have a horrible tendency to noise; it has only double or single octave stops, by means of which each key makes speak, with its note, the octave and the double octave of this note, or the double octave without the single, or even the upper octave and the lower octave of this note at the same time.

Many ignorant players and lovers of noise, make deplorable use of these octave stops. Thence results also a barbarism, less, it is true, than that of the movable stops of the organ, which give to each note the simultaneous sound of the two other notes of the major common chord, that is to say, of its major third, and of its fifth; but still an actual barbarism, because,—beside the harmonic thickening produced,—it necessarily introduces into the harmony the most frightful disorder, by the inevitable inversion and spreading of the chords; since ninths thus produce seconds and sevenths: seconds, sevenths and ninths; fifths, fourths; fourths, fifths, &c.; and because, in order to remain in true musical condition with such stops, it would be needful to use them only in pieces written in counterpoint invertible in octave,—which is not done.

It is to the ignorance of the middle ages, groping blindly for laws of harmony, that we must doubtless attribute the introduction of these monstrosities into organs; which mere custom has preserved and transmitted to us, and which we must hope will by degrees disappear.

The sounds of the melodium being of rather slow emission, like the sounds of the organ with pipes, render it better adapted to the legato style than to any other; and peculiarly suitable to sacred music, to soft and tender melodies, of slow movement.

Pieces of a skipping, petulant, or violent character, executed on the melodium, will always attest—in my opinion—the bad taste of the performer, the ignorance of the composer, or the bad taste and ignorance of both.

To impart to the sounds of the melodium a religious and dreamy character, to render them susceptible of all the inflexions of the human voice, and of the majority of instruments, such is the object M. Alexandre has both proposed and accomplished.

The melodium is at once a Church instrument, and a Theatre instrument; a drawing-room, and a concert-room instrument. It occupies but little space; and it is portable. It is therefore a servant of indisputable utility for composers and amateurs.

Since Messrs. Meyerbeer, Halévy, Verdi, have employed the organ in their dramatic works, how many provincial theatres in France, and even Germany, not possessing organs, have found difficulty in executing these works: and to how many mutilations and rearrangements (more or less clumsy) of scores, this absence of organs has given rise! The directors of these theatres would now be inexcusable to tolerate such misdeeds; since, for a very moderate sum, they may have, in lieu of an organ with pipes, a melodium organ very nearly sufficing to replace it.

The same thing applies to small churches, where music hitherto has not been possible. A melodium, played by a musician of good sense, might and could introduce there harmonic civilization; and cause, in time, a banishment of these grotesque howlings which still, in such places, mingle with religious service.—London Musical Times, Nov. 1.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 17, 1860.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Two Mazurkas, by Chopin. Nos 7 and 8.

Our Foreign Correspondence.

Our recent letters from the editor of this Journal, dated Leipzig, Oct. 22, lead us to hope that we may soon have the pleasure of laying before our readers the continuation of his “Editorial Correspondence.” Mr. Dwight, (who wrote last from Frankfort), has since been in “Bingen on the Rhine,” then down the Rhine to Bonn, (where he found our “Diarist”), Cologne, Eisenach, and Weimar. He will pass the early part of the winter in Berlin and Leipzig, whence we hope soon to have regular communications for the columns of the Journal.

The Diarist has gone up the Rhine and on to Paris, on the scent of certain Beethoven treasures to be found there, and we shall doubtless soon hear from him in the gay capital of France.

BOSTON AMATEUR SOCIETY.—We hear of a movement for the organization of an Amateur Musical Society composed of gentlemen in this city, who propose meeting weekly for the purpose of practising the orchestral works of the great masters under the guidance of one of our best musical directors.

In some features this organization will resemble a club, which known to many of us as the “Boston Amateur Club” has existed here for many years (we think since about 1830) but has lately been discontinued. Most of the best members of the old Club, whose performances have been listened to by many of us with much interest, will compose the nucleus of the new organization with the addition of some fresh active members, and, if found necessary, some professional talent.

In one important point the enterprise will be new to us. It is intended to add associate members to the active ones of the association, somewhat on the plan of the Orpheus Club, so that those who cannot play may at least help pay and have the pleasure of being present at the musical and social meetings of the Society, by thus contributing a part of the material aid which every such enterprise requires. The members are gentlemen of the highest standing in this community, of culture and refinement. We understand that the first meeting for the season will be held on Monday evening next, to organize for the winter campaign, which offers an opportunity for new members to join.

It is desirable that as many musical amateurs as feel competent to take some part in an amateur orchestra, should make themselves known to the management of this new Association. And such are requested to leave a line addressed “Boston Amateur Musical Society,” at the office of this journal, for the purpose of communicating personally with some of its members.

Mr. Dresel's Soirees.

Mr. OTTO DRESEL gives this evening the first of a series of four piano soirées, at Chickering's. No one who recollects the concerts given by Mr. Dresel some years ago, who loves the best piano music, will need to be urged to attend the present series. We need not say that the rarest classics of the piano will be on the programmes of Mr. Dresel, who plays these masterworks not only with brilliancy but with the intelligence and conscientious fidelity of a thorough artist. The lovers of Chopin, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Beethoven will find in these concerts very much to be enjoyed.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB advertises the first Concert of the season for Tuesday evening next, offering an admirable programme, which includes some novelties, among them the eleventh Quartette of Beethoven. The concerts are to be given at Chickering's.

New Music.

We have received from J. T. BROWNE, Harp maker, 709 Broadway, New York, the following pieces for the harp:

The first Violet; Mendelssohn: arranged by Chas. Oberthur.

Zuleika; Mendelssohn: arranged by Chas. Oberthur.

Home, Sweet Home; by Bosio.
Airs from Traviata; by Chas. Oberthur.
Souvenir of Il Trovatore; by Bosio.
Annie Laurie; by A. L. Toulmin.
Souvenir Dinorah; by Bosio.
Souvenir La Juive; by Bosio.
Souvenir de l'opera Traviata; by Oberthur.
Willie we have missed you; Beautiful Star; by Bosio.

Reel Polka for the Harp; by Bochsa.
Marche de la Sonnambula; by N. C. Bochsa.
From HORACE WATERS, New York:
Virginia Polka, and Oliver Galop; by the blind negro boy Pianist, Tom.

Among the papers left by Spolr has been discovered an opera in three acts, written by the author at Gotha in 1808, with the singular title, Alrums, la reine des chonettes.

A musical curiosity is now on exhibition at Vienna—the harpsichord of Haydn. This historical instrument was presented to the composer by some English admirers, and is now to be seen at the establishment of M. Levy, publishers of music.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—Theatre Imperial de l'Opera.—Revival of the Prophète.—This opera has not been given for a long time, for want of a singer who could worthily fill the part of Fides. At last, says the Gazette Musicale, Madame Tedesco is restored to us, and with her the last chef d'œuvre with which Meyerbeer has endowed our lyric stage. The debut of Mad. Tedesco in Paris dates back to the month of November, 1851. She came from Italy; she had visited America and presented herself to us in the rôle of Catherine in the Reine de Chypre. In the next month she appeared in the part of Fides, and we then spoke thus of the manner in which she rendered it. "After Mad. Viardot, who had created it so admirably, and Alboni who has made over its physiognomy after her way, came Mme. Tedesco, and as should be, placed herself much nearer the second than the first. In her singing and acting she presents many analogies to Alboni. The richness of her voice is magnificently displayed in the arioso of the second act, in the invocation and the grand scene of the fourth, in the air and duo of the fifth. Mme. Tedesco showed herself expressive and dramatic in several portions of this fine rôle." After an interval of nine years our judgment has not changed. We need only repeat what has just been read, with this addition that she has made sensible progress as a singer and especially as an actress. Mme. Tedesco may flatter herself at a good fortune the advantages of which are inestimable on the stage. Since she left us her precocious enbonpoint has rather lessened than increased; her shape is less round, her figure less full, while on the contrary her voice always possesses the same power, the same compass, the same equal character. Nothing better satisfies the ear than her broad style of singing, so facile and bold that no accident troubles it. A little more accent and vigor and Mme. Tedesco would be the singer, par excellence: and could produce impressions as lively as she now does sweet and charming impressions. Meanwhile the public will testify warmly, whenever she may appear, the pleasure with which it hears once more an artist of such rare talent. And how can we speak of the revival of the Prophète without expressing once more the admiration which this immortal chef d'œuvre inspires, which came from the same hand that wrote Robert le Diable and the Huguenots? The truth is that musical conception has never risen higher, or embraced with more vigor, variety and richness, a poetical and dramatic subject. The Prophète grows with time as do all works which genius has endowed with the double privilege of strength and beauty.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mr. E. T. Smith's "Anglo-Italian Company," according to one morning contemporary, or, according to another, the "Grand Coalition Company," opened the campaign on Wednesday with the Trovatore in Italian, the principal singers being Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Lemaire, Signors Giuglini, Violetti, Francesco Briani, Soldi, &c., &c. The only new appearance was Signor Briani. This gentleman, who sustained the part of the Count di Luna, must not be judged by his performance on Wednesday, seeing that he was laboring under the effects of hoarseness. He seems to be an experienced artist, and acted with considerable fire and animation. Of the performance generally, it is only necessary to say that Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini were in great force; that Mad. Lemaire displayed much energy in the part of Azucena; that the band and chorus are just the same as during the regular opera season; and that Signor Arditi presided in the orchestra. The theatre has undergone considerable alterations. A capacious and handsome balcony has been erected in front of the grand tier, and several boxes on the first, second and third tiers are thrown open, and made into dress and undress circles. Moreover, the amber curtains have faded away before the crimson which were used last year in the cheap season, and all the splendid pile carpets have been removed to make way for less expensive and perishable oil-cloths and matting.

A greater and more legitimate success than that achieved by Mr. Macfarren's new opera, Robin Hood, on Wednesday night we never witnessed. The crowd was immense, the excitement unusual, and expectation on tiptoe. That Mr. John Oxenford was the author of the libretto gave a new interest to the performance, and all the musicians and poets in London, and many far from London, were in their places anxious and expectant long before the curtain rose. Moreover, the cast of parts presented an unusual attraction in itself. Mr. Sims Reeves, who, except during his annual visit to the National Standard, in the oriental suburbs, has not appeared for years on the London boards, was to play the principal character, and Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, who never appeared on the stage at all, was to make her debut. Mr. Stanley, too, and Mr. George Honey, from the Royal English Opera, were both included in the cast, as were also, from the same company, Messrs. Bartleman and J. E. Patey, and Mr. Parkinson, the tenor, a real Armstrong great-gun with the audiences at Canterbury Hall, Weston's, and the Pavillion Theatre in Whitechapel. To these were added Mad. Lemaire, whose pretensions as a contralto singer are by no means despicable. With all these causes of interest it was no wonder, indeed, that the excitement was very great and the congregation immense.

We are not going to criticise the music on the present occasion. A general notice of the performance is all we feel called upon just now to render. The story of Robin Hood is not, we believe, taken from any of the many ballads and legends appertaining to the stalwart treebooster of Sherwood Forest, all of which may be perused in Ritson's Collection. Mr. Oxenford's plot is entirely his own, and a very merry and exciting plot it is, clear to follow, natural in its incidents, with an appropriate and striking dénouement.

The distribution of parts was as follows: Robin Hood, Mr. Sims Reeves; the Sheriff of Nottingham, Mr. Stanley; Hugo, the Sompnour, Mr. George Honey; Allan-a-Dale, Mr. Parkinson; Little John, Mr. Bartleman; Much, the Miller's son, Mr. Patey; Maid Marian, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington; and Alice, Mad. Lemaire.

The pieces which received most applause on Thursday were the overture, encored and repeated; the duet for Locksley and Marian, "When lovers are parted," exquisitely warbled by Mr. Sims Reeves and Mad. Sherrington; song, for Marian, "True love, true love in my heart," the subject of which is frequently employed throughout the opera; Locksley's song, "Englishmen by birth are free," magnificently sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, who refused to accept the encore called for by the entire audience; the finale to the first act, commencing with the round, "May the saints protect and guide thee;" Robin Hood's song, "The grasping rascaling Norman race," another splendid piece of vocalization by Mr. Sims Reeves; the whole fair scene at Nottingham, a masterpiece throughout; Locksley's ballad, "Thy gentle ballad would lead me on," the most graceful and flowing air in the opera, and given to perfection by Mr. Sims Reeves; the finale to the second act, the most elaborate and powerful composition in the opera and Locksley's grand scena in the prison. These are by no means all the good pieces, but they appeared most to enlist the sympathies of the audience. Perhaps there is nothing more charming in the opera than the trio in the last scene, "By all the love that you have shown me," for Marian, Robin Hood and Sheriff which, we feel a sure, will become as popular as any thing in the whole work.

Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington literally took the audience by storm, not only from the brilliancy and exquisite finish of her singing—which everybody was prepared for who had heard her in the concert-room—but from the animation, ease, and reality of her acting. A slight awkwardness in certain situations excepted, Mad. Sherrington was perfect mistress of her movements and gestures, every one of which seemed instinct with purpose and meaning. That the lady had studied the tactics off the stage we are bound to suppose, or she is indeed the most extraordinary and gifted actress who ever trod before the footlights. Regarding her debut from any point of view, a greater acquisition than Mad. Sherrington has not been made by the English operatic stage for many years. Of Mr. Sims Reeves it is impossible to speak too highly. He was never in finer voice, never sang more magnificently, nor, in the course of his lengthened career, did he ever create a more profound impression. The music of Robin Hood is extremely varied, and whether as the sentimental lover wooing Marian, as the freeborn Saxon denouncing foreign oppression, or the doomed outlaw in the gloom lamenting his approaching fate, the singing of Mr. Reeves was equally admirable.—London Musical World, Oct. 13.

On Monday night an audience less numerous than appreciative was entertained with an unusually fine performance of Donizetti's always welcome (however somewhat hacknied) Lucrezia Borgia. The three chief personages were assumed by Mlle. Titiens, Signor Giuglini, and M. Gassier; and it must be admitted that the German, Italian, and French artists worked together as heartily, and with as much consentaneousness of purpose, as if they had been compatriots, instead of belonging to three different countries. To complete the medley of nationalities, Mad. Lemaire, an Englishwoman, we believe, though married to a Belgian, stood forth as Gennaro's faithful friend, the vivacious Maffeo Orsini, and delivered the sparkling "brindisi" with a great deal of animation.

Perhaps in not one of her parts, unless we except her magnificent Donna Anna, does Mlle. Titiens support the credit, now almost unanimously accorded her, of being the worthiest claimant to the "mantle of Grisi," more triumphantly than in that of the wicked and passionate Duchess of Ferrara. She has all the personal, physical, and mental requisites for the characters, which she looks, sings, and acts alike to perfection.

The Huguenots was to be given October 26th.

Robin Hood was to be repeated on Saturday, Tuesday, and Thursday, and is underlined to be given three times a week until further notice. The attraction, so far from abating, appears nightly to increase, and there are literally no places to be obtained unless secured some days previously.

Robin Hood continues to draw immense audiences, and the interest the performances created on the first night increases with each successive repetition. As the music is heard oftener, its beauties become more apparent, and its purpose is rendered more distinct. This is the best compliment that could be paid to the opera, and proves that its merits are not superficial, nor its attractions merely of the ad caplandum kind. So great indeed is the success, that it weakens in some respects the prestige of the alternate Italian nights, and Mr. Sims Reeves, Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, &c., now warble to more multitudinous ears than Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, even with the aid of Don Giovanni.

Don Giovanni was given on Wednesday by the Italian company, the cast differing from that of the regular season in two essential particulars only, Mlle. Parepa appearing for the first time as Zerlina, and Herr Hermanns as the Commendatore.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—The chief incident of the week has been the production of the Crown Diamonds on Tuesday evening.

Dinorah was given for the first time this season, on Wednesday, and introduced Mr. Chapple, a barytone of provincial name, in the part of Hoel. Mr. Chapple may be congratulated on his first appearance. His voice, not powerful, is very agreeable in quality, and of considerable compass in the upper register, as the music of Hoel necessitates. He has evidently had stage experience, as he walks easily and without being constrained, and his gestures and movements are unforced. Some allowance must be made for a first appearance, but, taken altogether, the new barytone was a decided hit. The part of the male goatherd was sustained by Miss Leffler, who sang the air written for Mad. Nantier-Didée very charmingly. The young lady, however, must learn to infuse a little more vivacity into her action. A goatherd is not necessarily a tame person, more especially when addressing his companion on so exciting a subject as that of love. Miss Leffler is a novice, and therefore we tender her our advice, hoping she will profit by it. Miss Louisa Pyne never sang more delightfully. She warbled indeed like a lark, and gave the shadow song to perfection. Mr. Harrison's Corentino is perhaps his best performance, hilarious without being obstreperous, humorous without coarseness, and quaint without queeriness, to speak in Johnsouian phrase.

PEOPLE'S PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—A series of concerts under the above by no means unpretending title, was commenced last week at Exeter Hall, with a band of eighty and a chorus of nearly two hundred performers, Dr. James Peck conducting. To bring together so large a cohort of voices and instruments, in all respects efficient, was a manifest difficulty, seeing that all the available talent had been secured for the operas. The band includes some first-rate players, among whom we may mention Mr. Willy, who presides over the first violins, and M. Lavigne, the eminent oboist. The chorus the first night were "all abroad" in the finale to Lorely, but were more satisfactory in Mendelssohn's part-song, "O hills, O vales." The programme of the first concert, which we give in extenso, will afford some idea of the sort of entertainment presented:

PART I.

Overture; "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn
Part-Song: "The Departure"....."
Concerto, violin, E minor....."
M. Victor Buson.
Finale; Lorely....."
Mad. Catherine Hayes.
Italian Symphony....."

PART II.

Overture; "Oberon".....Weber
Prelude; "Robert le Diable".....Meyerbeer
Introducing the two favorite airs, "Quand je quitte,"
"Robert, toi que j'aime."
Mad. Catherine Hayes.
Solo, Flute; "Mulbrook".....Bucher
Mr. Benjamin Wells.
Waltz; "Elizabethan".....Strauss
Madrigal; "Down in a flowery vale".....Pesta
Overture; "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini

Paris.

Oct. 18.—Since my last, Mad. Vandenhoevel-Duprez has made her début in another new part at the Grand Opera, that of Lucy in the Bride of Lammermoor, and I may add that her success was in every way as complete as her warmest friends could desire. It is somewhat curious that the association of the name of Duprez with Donizetti's opera dates as far back as the creation and production of the work itself. It was written in 1835 at Naples, for Gilbert Duprez, and on the 9th of January, 1851, it was selected as the medium for presenting Mlle. Caroline Duprez to the public for the first time in the Salle Tentadour, when she appeared side by side with her father, who resumed his old part of Edgar, in order to become sponsor at his daughter's theatrical initiation. The part of Lucy brought good fortune with it, good fortune then, which as might be expected, has not deserted it now that it is again essayed with matured talents and all the confidence gained by a series of successes. Mad. Vandenhoevel was recalled at the close of the mad scene, and also after the farewell duet with M. Michot, who was the Edgardo on the occasion. After a protracted delay and a succession of disappointments, Mad. Tedesco has at last made her appearance in Le Prophète, and was warmly received by her admirers.

At the Italian Opera Il Trovatore has been revived, and Mad. Penco made her first appearance this season as Leonora, meeting with a most enthusiastic reception. Mad. Alboni, in Azucena, of strong passions and swart and matronly beauty, shared the chief honors of the evening with the baritone Graziani. M. Pancani, the new representative of Manrico, had also cause to congratulate himself. Without the sweetness of Mario, or the vigor of Tamberlik, he is, nevertheless, a tenor of considerable merit, singing with taste and lacking neither power nor energy. For some time past it had been announced that M. Calzado, the manager of the Italian Opera, had obtained, or was about to obtain, a renewal of his privilege or license. The fact is corroborated by the official announcement that his privilege has been extended to October, 1861. It is said that Ronconi has been engaged for ten nights; if the news be true, the subscribers are fortunate. The Barbieri is announced for the beginning of November. The cast will include Mad. Alboni, Gardoni, Badiali, Zucchini and Angelini. Mad. Alboni is also to appear in the Concentola, which has not been given these two years. Gardoni, Badiali, and Zucchini will be grouped around her. Two other operas are announced as shortly forthcoming, Il Matrimonio Segreto and Ernani. MM. Pancani, Graziani and Angelini with Mad. Penco will play the principal characters in the latter.

There has been a paragraph current in the French papers lately, calling to mind the once celebrated flautist, Drouet, who, at an extremely advanced age, now occupies the post of chapel master at Gotha. His name has chances of becoming historical. It was he who harmonized and orchestrated the new national air, "Partant pour la Syrie," which Queen Hortense had composed; and it is said to have been his brother who, being postmaster at Ménéhould, recognized and arrested Louis XVI. during his attempted flight. The French government has been mindful of M. Drouet's title to its sympathies, and he has lately been presented by the Emperor with a snuff-box set in brilliants, the invariable form in which inscrutably enough Imperial gratitude or favor expresses itself. By what capricious fiction is it supposed that those who have deserved well of their country, or attracted the attention of the rulers of the world by their special merits, should be snuff-takers? I suppose in royal minds there is a special significance attached to a snuff-box, as with the Red Indian the pipe is a direct allusion to peace. As the one talks of smoking the calumet of peace, the other would speak of their protégés as taking the snuff of distinction. But to return to the venerable M. Drouet, I believe he is now in England, on a visit to his son, who is educating at York.

Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, who is back from her Berlin engagement, sang the other day at the church of Notre Dame de Grace, at Passy, on the occasion of the marriage of Mlle. Amélie Heugel, daughter of your French contemporary and composer, Le Mendicant, with M. H. Chevalier, the sculptor. The event was especially honored, and received the highest musical sanction by the presence of Rossini and Auber. Both these great masters of their art expressed their admiration of Mad. Carvalho's talents, as displayed in the Ave Maria of Gounod, in which she was accompanied by the violinist Hermann. M. Lefebvre Wely presided at the organ, and M. Nollet played the harp part. This was followed by a Salutaris, the composition of the former, and executed by his wife, the organ being taken by M. Auguste Durand.—Cor. of Lond. Mus. World.

NAPLES.—The San Carlo opened the season with Rossini's Semiramide. Auber's Muette de Portici (Masaniello) and Meyerbeer's Prophète, are in rehearsal, and will be given shortly. Neither opera has ever been heard in Naples. It will be interesting to behold Masaniello treading his native stage for the first time. The performance of Auber's masterpiece is expected to create an enormous sensation, and it is to be produced with great magnificence. The revolution has done good to music at all events, and to the Terpsichorean art as well, if it be true that the Dancing Academy, abolished by the prudish Bourbons (who also locked up the Venuses), is about to be reestablished.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson &amp; Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The old grey step by the cottage door.

J. H. McNaughton. 25

One of McNaughton's popular home-ballads, companion to "When there's love at home," and "My own fireside," of which love of home is the principal subject. The airs are pretty and the piano-accompaniment very easy.

Go it while you're young. Comic Song.

T. G. Booth. 25

Lively with a taking air. A good song, for gentlemen particularly.

Reflection. (Abschied). Song. Francis Abt. 25

One of the latest songs of this melodious composer. It will be found full worthy of the author of "When the swallows homeward fly."

Just as I am. Sacred Song. J. R. W. Harding. 25

A ballad of fine sentiment, set to a fine melody.

Instrumental Music.

Dead March in "Saul" and Peace, troubled soul, arranged for five or six instruments by Burditt. 60

Sultan's Polka and Lone starry hours, arranged for five or six instruments by Burditt. 60

Arranged for Flute or Clarinet, Violins, Cornet and Bass, in an easy style, suitable for amateurs.

La Nostalgie. (Longing for home.) Fantasia on Swiss Airs. Maurice Lee. 40

A charming piece of very moderate difficulty, introducing the prettiest of those widely known Tyrolean songs of home. A good piece for instruction.

Lullaby. (Chant de berceau). By Von Weber.

Transcribed. E. Henritz. 30

Weber's charming Cradle-song, arranged as a brilliant piano-piece. It will be much played, and please a miscellaneous company as well as the "Maiden's Prayer," especially if the air is known already.

Rocky Point Quick March. O. J. Shaw. 25

A racy, spirited march, not difficult.

Alessandro Stradella. F. Beyer. 30

A new number of Beyer's Bouquet of Melodies, that favorite set, in which all the gems that opera-goers treasure, are introduced in an appropriate setting. Stradella, by Flotow, second only in reputation to "Martha," sparkles with pretty melodies.

Ever blessed child rejoice. Duet from Mendelssohn's "Athalie." Transcribed O. Dresd. 25

This will be a favorite number of a series of melodies by Mendelssohn which Mr. Dresd has arranged for the piano. These are some of Mendelssohn's most beautiful inspirations. They are not more difficult than the Songs without Words.

Books.

THE OPERA OF DER FREISCHUTZ. Arranged for the Piano Forte by Alfred Devaux. 2,00

This is the fifteenth of Ditson & Co.'s Edition of Standard Operas. As the production of one of the most distinguished musical composers it is well known to our readers, while in reference to its typographical execution, it is sufficient to say that it is fully equal to that of the previous volumes of this elegant and popular series.

Musical Culture.

IV.

PUBLIC PERFORMANCES.

Public performances can do much for diffusing musical culture. This has never been doubted; on the contrary, it is the custom with managers and agents to assure us in the most emphatic language that their chief object, in opening this or that series of concerts or operas, is the improvement of the public taste, and that for this reason they have spared neither trouble nor expense to procure the first class of talent, and the first class of every thing besides. The fact, however, is that these performances are frequently of such a nature as must necessarily tend to lower instead of elevating the taste. We shall leave this kind of public performances to their fate and direct attention to the institutions, that are founded on such a basis, and managed in such spirit that there is reason to expect they must exercise a wholesome influence on the community, in which they are established.

The OPERA would be the first entitled to our regard, since of all it is the most powerful for cultivating the people; but, unfortunately, there is none. The modern Italian opera, with which we are regaled in this quarter of the globe, deserves no mention as an institution for the advancement of true art. This is too well known to need one word more. Until there shall be a national English opera, an opera founded on English life and language; above all, an opera, the music of which is a faithful representation of the libretto with all its scenes, situations, phases, passions and emotions, a musical drama in truth, — until then we can do nothing, but like the daughters of Zion veil our faces, strew ashes on our heads and — hope!

We have, therefore, only to consider the various concert performances, vocal and instrumental. When, as the first condition for obtaining its end we require of a performance that it come as near perfection as possible, we are reminded of the undeniable, though often forgotten fact, that the performance, so to speak, has absolute power over the life and death of a work of the creative tone art. A miserable performance will "murder" any composition, whatever life and beauty its author may have infused into it; as, on the contrary, an excellent performance may sometimes impart life and beauty into a dull piece. The composer, of all artists, has this great disadvantage, that his creations must undergo a second birth through the performers. How different with the painter, with the sculptor, and even with the poet, who send their works out into the world, and all may look at them, but none dare deform them! If this be borne in mind, it is evident how much depends on the performance as regards the proper appreciation and enjoyment of a composition by the audience.

It may be fairly presumed that no musical society, however long and firmly established in a community, ever made the gradual improvement of the public its object. We should probably hear from all, to whom such a proposal might be made, that the public is a "many-headed monster," ungrateful, like the frozen serpent, which bit the poor rustic in his benevolent attempt to warm the reptile and awaken him to sensibility. Who will say that this is altogether a false accusation? If then the societies have their own improvement and advantage more at heart than that of the public, it seems but natural that, if they can combine both, they will be gainers by it.

In the selection of the compositions to be performed publicly, the greatest mistakes are frequently made. Especially when the object is to introduce the works of a composer, of whom there is as yet little, if anything, known, and whose style is moreover strikingly original, the greatest discretion is necessary; or the attempt will fail of success. If the selection is to be made from the old masters, such pieces as appear old-fashioned should be avoided; as, in selecting from the compositions of modern composer, those should be left aside, which in too high a degree represent the "music of the future"; a term, which, as our readers know, is ironically applied to many productions of the new German school, denoting that they are beyond the comprehension of the present generation. Whoever is acquainted with musical literature will also know that among the works of almost all great composers, there are some, which, although of much interest to the student, are unfit for public performances. In general, no composition answers this end that must be heard several times before it can be understood.

Many concerts would be more effective if they were shorter. The public is a dyspeptic; it cannot digest much solid music at once. At the Symphony concerts of the royal orchestra in Berlin, performed before a most selected and cultivated audience, the programme always consisted of only two or three numbers. First, a short Symphony by Haydn or Mozart; secondly, a larger Symphony by Beethoven or some later composer. Sometimes an overture, or a classical violin solo, was put in between the two symphonies. Compare to this the programmes of such concerts as they sometimes give in London during the season, which exhibit from thirty to forty pieces. Only an English constitution, sustained by large quantities of roast beef and porter, can sit out such monster concerts. To them, performances of such infinite length are seemingly "just the right thing"; for, we always read that they were crowded to excess.

With the better classes of our singing societies it is the custom to perform publicly almost nothing but Oratorios. The performance of an Oratorio commonly lasts from three to four hours; while as a composition it belongs to the most scientific class. It can hardly be expected of a man, however great his love for music, to sit listening for so long a time with undiminished attention to fugues and canons, only now and then relieved by an air, which, moreover, generally opens with a long recitative. We must remember that the Oratorio as a musical dramatic poem rests wholly on long by-gone times; that, consequently, it has not the interest for us as for an audience of Handel's and Bach's time. Through the genius of Mendelssohn it has in some respect been modernized and the interest for it partly revived; still, we hear continually that the time demands its right as before. The immediate consequence is that occasionally only an Oratorio is produced by the tone-poets of our age. The more circumspect rather choose to compose Cantatas with secular subjects; which, moreover, do not constrain them to write in a style in which they feel they cannot vie with the old masters. However, as there are few Cantatas with English text, and as societies must have works to perform, they will not neglect the Oratorio; and they will do well. An Oratorio like the Messiah or St. Paul is worth a great number of modern Cantatas. But as we have to do with the public performances here in so far only as they promote musical culture, the absolute value of a composition decides nothing. With this view a selection of some of the clearest and most effective choruses and airs, arranged as a miscellaneous concert, will frequently prove of much more usefulness than the whole work. Judicious selections from classical operas with English text, and from the mass of beautiful songs for mixed chorus by Mendelssohn, Schumann and other recent composers, would likewise prove so. It is superfluous to add that, if the concert is to be a sacred one, the pieces intended for performance should be of a truly religious character; so that in such cases neither Cantatas, nor Operas and worldly songs, afford the proper material.

With orchestral concerts the main feature of the programme is the SYMPHONY. Not long ago a discussion was going on in this paper, as to the best place for the Symphony. As local causes frequently influence the arrangement of a programme, nothing positive can be said about it. It were a mistake, at all events, to give the Symphony at the close of a long concert, when the attention of the audience is already much exhausted by the preceding pieces. The aim should be to perform it where there is reason to suppose it will be best enjoyed; without regard to custom or tradition. When a Symphony, or any other important orchestral work, is to be performed, which embodies a poetical subject, you should never omit to explain the latter on the programme; a brief extract from a good criticism on both the work and its author would likewise contribute to interest the audience and aid them to understand and rightly appreciate the work. Jullien, whenever he performed Beethoven's C minor Symphony here in his concerts seven years ago, used to call special attention on the programme to the Scherzo, as "descriptive of an advancing army." Though this was rather a prosaic conception of that wonderful Scherzo, still it had this effect, that this movement was listened to with more interest than the rest.

It is a good idea, as has sometimes been carried out in our orchestral concerts to make up the programme by works of one composer exclusively; the anniversary of the master's birthday, or a similar event, frequently furnishing the occasion. Those among the audience, who desire to learn, will here find an opportunity more fully to observe the composer's style, or his versatility as revealed in forms of an entirely opposite nature; provided the programme is arranged judiciously. Equally interesting and instructive are historical concerts, illustrating the progress of the Art down to our time. We remember with great pleasure such a concert—which, however, was purely vocal—given, some years ago, at the Tremont Temple, in Boston, by the choir of the Church of the Advent. Every piece was introduced by some remarks on its style, its composer and the period it was to illustrate, delivered by Mr. A. W. Thayer. It is a pity that such instances are not more frequent.

Orchestral concerts are seldom given without solos for the voice. In regard to these it is above all recommended that the singers pronounce the text distinctly, so that we can understand what they sing. The habit of delivering songs with Italian or German words to an audience speaking English deserves to be earnestly condemned. It is like striking reason and common sense in the face, whatever the advocates of this unnatural custom may say. In a bravura-aria, where the exhibition of vocal skill is the aim, it is of little consequence; but in a song the words are as important as the music; and sometimes more so. The only excuse that can be offered for the practice, is the scarcity of songs with English text, suitable for public performances.

To the various chamber concerts, as Quartet, Trio, Piano Soirées, &c., most of the preceding remarks will also apply. They play a noble part in the history of modern music. This class of concerts, more than the others, has always been conducted in the spirit of true art. The music performed is of the highest order; and frequently accessible to amateurs, in its original form, for study. In respect to musical culture they cannot but exercise a wholesome influence. The latter may not always be felt so soon; it requires many strokes to make an impression on cold iron; why should less (strokes with the bow) be required to make an impression on cold minds? These concerts, particularly, need encouragement.

BENDA.

Rossini and his Works.

Our Paris correspondent furnishes us with the following agreeable chit-chat about the great composer of "William Tell," and "The Barber," and about Bosio, the admired prima donna:

The long and pitiless persecution on the part of the authorities of the musical world, which Rossini unwisely laid so deeply to heart as to resolve, in the plenitude of his magnificent powers, that he would compose no more, having given way to a juster appreciation of the chef d'œuvres which he has given to the world, some of his great works are now performed every winter at the Italian opera of Paris. At present the Cenerentola is the attraction with Alboni for Rosina. The other evening a gentleman, who had been listening with the utmost delight and admiration to the exquisite variations introduced into the famous rondo by the highly accomplished but enormously fat cantatrice, the crescendo of whose triumphs as a singer are matched by a steady increase of embonpoint, which threatens to expand her to the proportions of an elephant, inquired of a friend beside him, "by whom those variations were composed."

"By Rodes," replied the friend. "Ah, of course, it is very natural that they should need a Colossus to execute them!" returned the amateur. This same splendid chef d'œuvre, La Cenerentola, was first brought out in the Valle Theatre at Rome during the carnival of 1817, two months after the production of Otello, one year before that of the Barbiere, three months before that of La Gazza Ladra, seven months before that of Arsina, and ten months before that of Mosé in Egitto! This was the richest and most active portion of the master's life, and it is believed that no similar example of musical fecundity can be found. His genius exerted itself with equal richness and facility in all styles, tones and manners; the tragic, the comic, the sacred, the profane, the picturesque; in these marvellous compositions we find the expression of all human emotions, smiles, tears, joys, sorrows, terrors and aspirations, and all this produced with such unexampled rapidity, in the midst of the incessant insults and clamors of hostile critics versed in the arts of torture, and the yet more cruel indifference of the public. On its first appearance the Cenerentola was brought out with a cast of third-rate performers, and was a total failure. At the close of the season it was brought out again in the same style, and with the same success. On the following night, Rossini, who would have preferred seeing his opera heartily hissed rather than received with the utter indifference with which the public had hitherto treated it, hired a score or two of the hangers-on who figure so conspicuously amongst the machinery of the modern stage in Paris, under the name of claqueurs, in Rome under that of lazzaroni, and desired them to be on duty during the evening's performance.

"Which passages do you wish us to applaud?" demanded the leader of the band.

"You are not to applaud at all," replied Rossini: "you are to hiss vigorously, indiscriminately I don't care where, so that you make noise and confusion enough to rouse the house and cause the representation to be brought to an end."

"Very good," said the leader, "if that is all you want, we will take care to satisfy you."

Before the performance began the lazzaroni were at their posts, and the dull apathy of the audience was soon broken up by the roar of hisses that accompanied the progress of the work. Disturbed by the persistence and violence of the hissing, the public began to resent what seemed like a determination, on the part of his enemies, to deprive the new composer of a chance of making himself heard; and as they were now really listening to the music for the first time, and endeavoring to judge for themselves of its merits, the admirable beauty of the work, despite the weakness of its execution, speedily roused the enthusiasm of the audience in its favor. Loud bursts of applause now drowned the storm of hisses sent forth by the lazzaroni; the rondo was encored, and the opera terminated amidst a tempest of popular applause. Five years afterwards it was brought out in Paris, and met with a very cold reception—critics and singers were banded against the brilliant innovator, and determined to shut him out from public favor. It was not until Signora Monbelli, whose singing of Rossini's masterpieces, and especially of the Cenerentola, had won for their author the suffrages of all Italy that Rossini began to be understood in Paris. Since then his creations have had for interpreters Malibran, Sontag, Grisi, Centi, Borghi-Mamo and Alboni; Levasseur, Lablache, Rubini, Pellegrini, Tamburini, Ronconi and Mario, who have won their most brilliant laurels in the service of his muse. The late Bosio, also a reigning favorite at the Paris Opera, had just been making a successful campaign in St. Petersburg, when her death occurred in that city. One evening, when she was at a private party, at the hotel of a Prince, a passionate lover of music, and himself a musician, she noticed a beautiful Havana lap-dog, scarcely larger than a ladies' fist, and white as snow, curled up in one corner of a sofa. "What a lovely little creature!" cried the singer in raptures, "and how intelligent it looks!" She then took up the little animal, caressed it, and replaced it on its silken couch. Madame Bosio, soon afterwards, at the Prince's request, sang a favorite air by Glinka, the Mozart of Russia, and author of the fine opera, "Dead for the Czar." The song was received with enthusiastic applause, and the Prince, addressing the fair artist, demanded, "What can I do, madam, in acknowledgment of the pleasure you have given us by singing that beautiful air of our national composer?" "Give me your little dog, Prince!" replied the artist. "You shall have him to-morrow, madam," said the Prince. The next day, a servant brought to her house the little animal she so much wished to possess. As it was very cold, the Prince had wrapped the little fellow in an Indian Cashmere shawl, worth fifteen thousand francs, and he begged the artist to accept the dog with his wrapper. Certainly a most ingenious method of making a princely present.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAVERT, A. M.)

V I.

An increase of music cultivating individuals would just now be less needful to the artistic world, than an increase of such as understand how truly to enjoy and judge music. Since the beginning of the history of music, the same talk of the dilettanti has been reiterated time and again, that the apex had been reached by some idol, and that the modern can compose no more. It is a pity that by this musical conservatism many a talent is stifled.

All such as are incapable of viewing the art in its ensemble and outlines, stick to the names of celebrated men. The "professional" leaders in smaller towns to whose judgment the public adheres, blindfold, generally choose unto themselves a few musical celebrities always headed by Beethoven, whom alone they consider fit for consideration, and any musician loses, with them, his rank who permits the musical "rest of mankind" to stand beside the former in their dignity. They are wont to talk very unconsciously of the many "false fifths" to be found in recent compositions, confounding it with what they once heard of two pure progressions of fifths. The children of these professional leaders are born and raised in this comic presumption, and want to perform the "Sonata pathétique," before they have understood the scales.

Lest the following generation inherit the same night-mare we were sighing under during our own aspirations, it would be best to introduce the knowledge of the history of art in wider spheres.

It is not the exact connoisseurs of the ancient who oppose the modern in a hostile manner, but the ignorant and incompetent ones. Those who are vociferating most loudly for Sebastian Bach, and pretend to like nothing better than a fugue, are the ones who, on a prelude and a fugue of the "well tempered piano" being played to them, will say in all earnestness: I like the former fugue best, the latter was not quite as "fine."

They understand by the "former" fugue the prelude which they, on account of its popular runs, understand better than the real fugue. This curious fact occurred to me almost every time when I performed a prelude and fugue of Bach to some such leading "connoisseur."

If you blame, for very substantial reasons, some slight defect in a composition of Beethoven, they are impertinent enough to represent to you, that the coming generation only will be able fully to understand this master; but if you play for them some little known piece of the great master anonymously, they find it "very trivial."

All this will cease of itself if the historical development of music is studied. How often do past centuries present an apparent climax, above which the contemporaries admit of no gradation; but how has not the succeeding century put to shame such a superstition! It is just as true moreover, that the spirit most strikingly exhibited by some composer, is that of an entire period and that both always mutually influence each other.

If we want to judge fairly of a master, we must study the work of his contemporaries, and the connecting links of his epoch with the others, as thoroughly as we do the works bearing exclusively his name. The rimbus of a single head may thus, indeed, disappear, but we gain a whole and general view instead.

You may object that the time of a pupil cultivating music as a secondary department, is not sufficient to allow him a synopsis of its entire domain, without interfering with his progress in playing. Consider, however, that it is of more importance to develop the pupil as a really musical individual, than to increase the number of piano-virtuosi; for the latter are, next to the bravura singers, the most unmusical people in the world.

A piano virtuoso employs almost all of his time in acquiring the velocity of fingers needed for his immensely difficult and otherwise altogether worthless pieces. He seldom obtains, besides, understanding and judgment, for, by means of exclusive intercourse with a great many trifles, he becomes obtuse and indifferent to the highest in art wherever he meets with it. Such purely technical men are generally the vainest, most shallow and intolerable persons with whom the entire starry sky turns solely around their "turns" and trills. The most sublime thought leaves them cold because it is not expressed in sixty-fourths, and they regard as a hypocrite any one finding delight in so simple music. They have never reflected on the origin of music, its development and connection with other conditions and facts in the field of art; it suffices for them that the piano has been invented; this fully answers their aspirations. I have met with concert-giving virtuosi who have never heard the name of Handel. One of them thinking Handel was a recent composer, remarked on hearing one of his compositions for the first time; "this young man will hardly be successful."

If every body devoting a few hours daily to musical technics, would employ but one half hour in the study of the history of his art, the trifling loss in velocity would amply be remunerated. Our dilettanti should certainly understand how ridiculous it is to "ape" virtuosi, and rather direct their ambition to the scientific part of music.

But whoever wants simply to learn to play a few piano-pieces, should at last refrain from judging and discussing, lest he cut a terribly ludicrous figure.

PERSONAL.—One of the private visits in which the Prince of Wales indulged, while in Boston, was one to the great piano factory of the Chickering.

New Instruments.

BY HECTOR BERLIOZ.

THE OCTO-BASS.

M. Vuillaume, a musical instrument maker of Paris, whose excellent violins are so much esteemed, has just enriched the family of stringed instruments by a fine and powerful member,—the octo-bass.

This instrument is not—as many imagine—the low octave of the double-bass; it is but the low octave of the violoncello. It consequently descends lower—by a third—than the four-stringed double-bass.

The left-hand fingers of the player not being sufficiently long, nor sufficiently strong, to act fitly on the strings (for the octo-bass is of colossal dimension,) Mr. Vuillaume has contrived a set of moveable keys, which, pressing the strings with energy, bring them on to frets placed on the neck of the instrument, for producing the tones and semitones. These keys are moved by levers, which the left hand seizes and draws up and down behind the neck of the instrument: and by seven other pedal-keys, upon which the foot of the player acts.

It suffices to say that the octo-bass cannot execute any rapid succession; and that it must have assigned to it a special part, differing in many respects from the double-bass part. Its compass is an octave and a fifth only.

This instrument has sounds of remarkable power and beauty, full and strong, without roughness. It would be of admirable effect in a large orchestra; and all Festival orchestras, where the number of instrumentalists amount to more than one hundred and fifty, should have at least three.

We shall not here contest the opinion that tends to consider the recent inventions of instrument-makers as fatal to Musical Art. These inventions exercise, in their sphere, the same influence that all marches of civilization exercise; the abuse that may be made of them,—that even which indisputably is made—proves nothing against their value.—London Musical Times, November 1.

The Opera Comique.

ITS RISE AND PROGRESS.

GRÉTRY.

André Erneste Modeste Grétry was born at Liège on the 11th of February, 1741. His father, who was of noble blood, but poor, had a situation of first violin in the chapel of the cathedral, into which he got his son received, from the age of six, as a chorister. The child had a pretty voice, which he lost as he grew to manhood; his master had forced him to sing during the period that his voice was breaking. This master, who was extremely brutal, declared that little Grétry was incapable of learning music. The father of Grétry did not share this opinion, and withdrew him from the chapel of the collegiate church, in order to confide his education to a more amiable master, named Leclerc, a professor of ability, with whom the child made rapid progress. As he very early showed an aptitude for composition, a professor of learning was given him—the organist of the cathedral. He had also a master of counterpoint, but as soon as he was able to write music with a certain facility, not desiring to push his studies any further, he applied himself to composition. "I had not enough patience to restrict myself to my lessons of composition," said he in his Essais sur la Musique; "I had a thousand ideas in my head, and the impulse to make use of them was too strong to be resisted. I composed six symphonies; they were executed in our town with success. He was persuaded that it was indispensable he should go and study in Italy, and for this reason he wrote a mass which obtained for him a place in a college at Rome, founded by the citizens of Liège. He then proceeded to the eternal city, in company with a dealer in relics. He studied there under the guidance of Casali, a celebrated contrapuntist, whose advice he failed to follow with sufficient assiduity. A certain number of essays in vocal music, and several symphonic pieces, brought him so far into prominence that he was intrusted with the task of composing the music for two interludes for the Alberti theatre. An Englishman with a passion for music (Melomane) offered him a pension if he would go with him to London, and Grétry was about to start, when an attaché of the French embassy, named Mellon, showed him the opera of Rose et Colas. Monsigny's score taught him what our Opéra Comique was, and inspired him with the determination to give the preference to Paris. On his way he passed through Geneva, and there he had played an old piece, Isabelle et Gertrude, to which he had written new music, at the same time giving a few lessons to gain a living. It was in Switzerland that Grétry became acquainted with Voltaire, who urged him to proceed immediately to Paris, which he did. There he made haste to study our language, at the Théâtre Français, where he regularly attended the performances until a libretto should fall into his hands from the skies. He was of a weak constitution, which caused his friends to fear that he would not live long, a prediction which was happily falsified, for Grétry died when he was past 72. After the following fashion did Grimm speak of him:

"Grétry has a gentle and refined countenance, with the rolling eye and pallid air of a man of genius. He is an agreeable companion. He has married a young woman with a pair of very black eyes, which is a strong step for a man with such a chest; but he is in better health since he has married."

Another contemporary, Bachaumont, in his secret memoirs, says, at the date of December 14, 1769:

"It is with sorrow that the lovers of the Italian Theatre, who had conceived the greatest hopes in respect of Grétry, that Pergolese of France, perceive that this composer is on the point of being mown down by the scythe of death in the flower of his age. His chest is attacked, and the kind of life he leads contributes not a little to aggravate his condition. It is admitted pretty well on all hands that he was calculated to operate a revolution in the music of that theatre, the coryphæe of which appear but mediocre persons by the side of this writer."

Such was the great artist whose gradual success I am about to attempt exhibiting to the reader. Grétry had first to surmount the immense difficulty against which beginners so often struggle in vain—finding a libretto. This first herculean labor accomplished, another scarcely less hard to overcome presented itself—to meet with a manager who would consent to produce the work of an unknown composer. Now this is what happened to Grétry. I had previously said that Phillidor had been unable to find him a poem, and for two years all research was vain, but Grétry at last laid his hand on a librettist, who, like himself, was unknown, and who gave him a libretto founded on a tale of Marmontel, Les Mariages Samnites, which the Italian theatre refused, the subject being considered too serious for the style to which that establishment was devoted. It was then arranged for the Royal Academy of Music, where it was also refused. An attempt was made to produce it at the Prince de Conti's, but the execution was so bad that it was abandoned. One person alone did not share the general opinion, and this was the Comte de Creutz, the ambassador of the King of Sweden. He invited Grétry to dine with him to meet Marmontel, and placed the two guests side by side. These two men made acquaintance, and the poet, after receiving rather coolly the advances of the composer, was at last won over to him by his witty conversation. Over the dessert he promised him a libretto.

He kept his word, and on the 20th of August, Le Huron, by Marmontel and Grétry, was enthusiastically received by the public of the Comédie Italienne. The composer had introduced several pieces from the Mariages Samnites. Grimm speaks of the first performance in the following terms, after rendering homage to the good execution of the opera, due principally to Caillot and to M. and Mad. Laruelle:

"M. Grétry is a young man who here makes his first attempt; but this attempt is a masterpiece which, beyond gainsay, raises its author to the highest rank. In all France Phillidor alone could measure weapons with this man. You find in his operas examples of every style."

Not so good a harmonist as Phillidor, and perhaps with less facility than Monsigny, he possessed in a high degree the art of stirring the emotions of the crowd. He had imbibed from the society of men of letters, which he esteemed more than that of his colleagues,* a correctness of feeling and a degree of truth in translating the thoughts of his collaborators, which had caused Sédaine to say of him, on hearing Le Huron, "That's the man I want." They were born one for the other, for although the poet was not much of a literary man, and the composer by no means a profound musician, both had vivid feelings, and possessed the art of communicating their impressions to the public.

After Le Huron, Grétry brought out Lucile in January, 1769. The words by the good man Anseaume. After the performance the authors were called for: the composer alone was named, the poet desired to remain anonymous. "He is wrong!" cried some one in the pit. This naïve observation must have been singularly flattering to Anseaume, who heard it from the prompter's box, where he was modestly enconced. "This romantic piece" says a contemporary, "exhibited the rare spectacle of an audience

*It was to him that Voltaire said, with more malice than truth, "You are witty, sir, and yet you are a musician." This, by-the-by, was meant as a hit at J. J. Rousseau, who was well able to return it.

melting into tears. The composer has seconded the poet to a marvel, and violently stirred (brise) the hearts of his hearers by ariettes full of passion. Every one left weeping and enchanted; so that the piece is looked upon as crowned with the greatest success. It is in this opera that the famous quatuor occurs,

"Où peut-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?"

Le Tableau parlant, of which Anseume also wrote the words, and which was produced on the 20th of September, 1769, placed Grétry completely in the highest place among the usual composers of the Comédie Italienne. This one act, which is still a stock piece, contains some genuine melodies, which rendered Grétry's work popular. All the world knows the duo between Colombine and Pierrot, a little masterpiece of grace and handling.

Grétry produced two operas in 1770, Sylvain and Les deux Avares. These two pieces met with success, especially the second, played for the first time December 7. The overture was much applauded, being phrased in the manner of a musical dialogue, to use the expression of a critic of that day, who discovered in the score pieces of the most profound workmanship. The comic duo, "Prendre ainsi cet or, ces bijoux," is especially worth mentioning. The following year witnessed the first appearance of L'Amitié à l'Epreuve, of which the libretto was by Favart. This piece met with no success; the authors cut it down into one act, and it was performed in this shape in 1776; they then expanded it again into three, adding three new characters, and it was thus transformed that it appeared in 1786.

Zemire et Azor was played the first time in November, 1771, at the court theatre, in the palace of Fontainebleau, and the work pleased so much that the illustrious audience demanded a second performance. The piece was in four acts, and Marmontel had written the words. It owed its success to the score. The operas of Rameau had advanced musical education in France previous to its development by Gluck. People were beginning to look at something beyond the words of comic operas; as early as 1768, Bachaumont, who makes no pretensions to musical knowledge, wrote, in speaking of a new piece but little admired, Le Nouveau Marié, the words of which were not very good, "The music is by a composer who is little known; and it is known that it is generally under the auspices of the latter that the poem finds acceptance."

Zemire et Azor was performed by the Italian actors, that is to say, by the actors of the Comédie Italienne, on the 16th of December. The town did not fully ratify the decree of the Court. However, every justice was rendered to the work, although with less enthusiasm than at Fontainebleau. The authors were called for; Grétry appeared alone, Marmontel thought it incompatible with the dignity of an academician to show himself. The tumult rose to a frightful pitch. The management then sent forward an Italian actor, much in favor, Carlin, who played the Harlequins, and by a few pleasantries he succeeded in turning aside the wrath of the public, who at last withdrew. In this opera clarionets were heard for the first time in the orchestra of the Comédie Italienne.

After Zemire et Azor, Grétry wrote several scores which turned out less felicitous. L'Ami de la Maison in three acts (1772). The composer had in this piece to contend against a subject somewhat gloomy and cold, but nevertheless acquitted himself with talent by the aid of those simple and touching phrases which sprang up abundantly under his pen, and which were of infallible effect. In short it was still good and genuine music.

Le Magnifique followed L'Ami de la Maison. Sedaine had taken the subject from La Fontaine's tale, or, perhaps, from Lamoignon's comedy. There are seventeen pieces in this score, which is in three acts. It was coldly received on its first performance (March 4, 1773), but in the course of time the public gave it a better reception. A marvellous valet's song, and the scene of the "Quart d'heure de silence," were especially applauded. Both are little masterpieces of style.

La Rosière de Salency, acted on the 28th of February, 1774, was the work in which Mad. Trial drew particular attention to herself. In this opera, the air, "Ma barque légère" deserves mention. La Rosière de Salency was played first in four acts, and subsequently reduced to three.

La Fausse Magie, in two acts, saw the light on the 1st of February, 1775. The words, the least felicitous of any written by Marmontel, militated considerably against the effect of the work. Among the most pleasing pieces of the score is the duo of la soixantaine.

"Quoi, c'est vous qu'elle préfère!"

Les Fausse Apparences, better known by its second title, L'Amant Jaloux, was first played before the court in 1778, and produced afterwards in Paris on the 23rd of December the same year. Mad. Dugazon obtained great success in it in the part of Jacinthe. There is a pretty trio for three soprani in this opera; it was one of those which Grétry himself preferred, and in which truth of expression is carried to its furthest limits. In reference to this he says, in his Essais sur la Musique, "The part which seems to me to have been most effectively dealt with in the following air, 'Plus de sœur, plus de frère,' is the suspension after these verses:

"Mala si quelque confidente
Malicieuse, impertinente, Cherchait à tromper mon attente—"

The two following notes, played by the orchestra, ascending by semitones, express the face made by Lopez. I might have made him sing these two notes to the exclamation 'oh!' but silence is more eloquent." One sees by this passage with what minute care Grétry scanned the verses he was about to set to music. Like the fox in the fable, regretting in his heart that he was not a profound musician, he compassed the design of making posterity acknowledge that the qualities which shone in him were those which alone deserved to be prized.

After having arranged the music of a burlesque drama, in four acts, entitled Matroco, he sought to prevent its production, fearing a failure. Retarded, in the first instance, by the illness of Mad. Trial, the first performance did not take place till 1778. Les Evénemens Imprevus, a piece in three acts, of which Hele,* the author of L'Amant Jaloux, had written the words, appeared on the 13th of November, in the year 1779. A few pretty airs obtained for it what is conveniently called a succès d'estime. Aucassin et Nicolette, in four acts, and in verse, by Sedaine, met with the same fate, despite the talent of Mad. Dugazon, who was, according to contemporary testimony, charming in the part of Nicolette. She was obliged to yield it to another for some time, owing to her health, but she resumed it in 1782, at which period the authors reduced their work to three acts. The pieces which pleased the most were the first air of Nicolette, the duo of the sentinelles, and the arietta of the shepherd. It is worthy of remark, that works in four acts have seldom held their ground at the Opera Comique; it has also been found necessary to cut them down into three, ere the public would adopt them completely.

Colinette à la Cour, a lyrical comedy in three acts, by Lourdet de Sauterre,† produced the 1st of January, 1782, added little to the glory of Grétry. L'Embarras des Richesses, by the same author, was equally wanting in success. The title supplied the wits of the day with an opportunity of making fun at the expense of the author. The following verses were printed about it:

"On donne à l'Opéra
L'Embarras des Richesses
Mais il rapportera
Je crois, fort peu d'espèces.
Cet opéra comique
Ne réussira pas.
Quoique l'auteur lyrique
Ait fait son embarras,
Embarras d'intérêt,
Embarras de paroles,
Embarras de bullois.
Embarras dans les rôles;
Enfin, de toute sorte,
On ne voit qu'embarras;
Mais allez à la porte
Vous n'en trouverez pas."

La Caravane du Caire, represented before the court on the 30th of October, 1783, was more favorably received. The overture is one of Grétry's best. A fine chorus "Après un long voyage." La Caravane was played in Paris on the 15th of January, in the following year. A somewhat singular incident occurred on the occasion. The quarrel between the Gluckists and the Piccinists was about this time at its highest pitch. The partisans of the Italian composer fancied that they would detect in Grétry's manner a certain relationship with that of Gluck. Both composers proposed to themselves, before all else, to arrive at truth in dramatic expression. The Piccinists formed a league to hiss the new opera. The police put a stop to the frightful uproar occasioned by this cabal, by turning the ringleaders of the riot out of the theatre, and the Caravane was allowed to proceed on its prosperous march from performance to performance.

On the 18th of March, 1784, appeared Theodore et Paulin, a score in three acts, the words of which were by Desforges. It met with no success, and

*This Hele, or d'Hèle, was an Englishman. He came to Paris in 1770. Being in a state of great destitution, he was obliged to borrow a few clothes from a friend in order to make a decent appearance in public. He had recourse to the assistance of others for the verses in his operas.

†Lourdet de Sauterre, born in Paris, 1732, died ibidem, 1815.

Grétry withdrew it after the first performance. Regretting, however, the loss of his music, he found a fresh employment for it in L'Epreuve Villageoise, two acts, which Desforges had constructed out of an episode in Theodore et Paulin. "This niaiserie,"* says Bachaumont, on the 25th of June, 1784, "had yesterday the greatest success as regards the music, which is picturesque, simple and rich, without any display which would be out of place and foreign to the character of the subject." Such, in fact, are the principal merits of this score, which continues, with so many of the composer's works, a stock piece of the Opera Comique and the libretto of which is, indeed, a niaiserie of the most pleasant and of the most dramatic description, whatever Bachaumont may have written to the contrary notwithstanding.—London Musical World, Oct. 20.

Musical Correspondence.

AMSTERDAM, OCT. 21, 1860.—When musical students from America choose their residences in Europe for the purpose of study and of enjoyment in their own art, they almost invariably pitch on Leipzig or Berlin. They very rarely go near Vienna, perhaps seldom know what that city offers in comparison with the others. Vienna has a great name in music and musicians. Leipzig has the same; since the death of Mendelssohn and of Schumann no great light has illuminated Leipzig. The new director of the Conservatorium in Leipzig, Reinicke, has an excellent reputation as thorough musician and as composer of much merit. But according to the account that one hears, the Leipzig Conservatorium has been deteriorating for some time. Of course excellent teachers in all branches (except singing) are to be found in both Leipzig and in Berlin; no one can doubt that.

But the presence of such a man as Mendelssohn, very remarkable for his great industry and thoroughness in his art, gave an impulse to all musicians, teachers and students in a city, whether they belong to the Conservatorium or not. Such an advantage none of the cities in Germany or elsewhere can now claim; therefore, let us examine the other advantages of one of them at least.

In Vienna are most excellent and able teachers of harmony and counterpoint, such as Simon Sechter, Johann Ruffnatscha (already mentioned in another letter), Johann Herbeck and many others; on the violin, Josef Hellmesberger, director of the Conservatorium and teacher therein, Professor Böhm, Moritz Kässmayer, and lastly a young man of much talent, Josef König, as well as many not here named; on the violoncello, Heinrich Röber, one of the famous Hellmesberger quartet, which played with Viextemps last winter, Schlesinger, Frits, and also many more; on the horn, Professor Richard Lewy, of the Conservatorium; on the piano, Julius Epstein, a young man of great talent, the first piano-player in Vienna and very much liked as teacher, recommended, too, by Madame Clara Schumann, in preference to any other there, Professor Pirkbert, of the Conservatorium, Dachs, Pacher, Anton Halm, Bagge, editor of the "Deutsche Musikzeitung," Debrois van Bruyck, a composer of much promise and an excellent musician, and again last but by no means least, Johann Ruffnatscha, very excellent in this branch. The Piano professorship of the Conservatorium was, a short time ago, vacant, Droyschok, von Bulow, and Madame Schumann being spoken of as possible or rather probable candidates. Droyschok is said to have the intention of settling in Vienna, as also Liszt since his abandoning Weimar. Rubinstein is at the present time there, having passed the summer in the neighborhood, while working upon his opera. In singing, Vienna is fully supplied with teachers, and if they be not all they should be, it is because the art of singing is improperly taught almost everywhere. Salvi, (the tenor of some years since in America, I think) has a large singing school which is apparently successful; then Marchesi and his wife have sent forth many good pupils, Ernst Förchgott, a singer of very great understanding and feeling, who has an excellent method, Professor Richard Lewy, said to be excellent in studying opera parts with advanced pupils, as well as many more; it is hardly worth while to make a long list of teachers, and I have only named some of the best in each branch, but any one will believe that Vienna is well stocked with capital instructors in music.

In concerts the Austrian capital offers much, and though the price of tickets is not small, (as indeed it is nowhere in Europe excepting at the coffee concerts), yet a musical student can easily obtain free entrance almost everywhere. Firstly, Josef Hellmesberger gives two series of quartet concerts, one of six and the other of four to six performances, every winter, at which are played quartets, quintets, trios, sonatas for the piano alone or accompanied by violin or violoncello, mostly of the old masters, Mozart and Beethoven predominating, but also several other novelties yearly, of Viennese or German or other composers. Ten years ago last winter Hellmesberger began these concerts, and he has now a room overfilled with the best musical public in Vienna. He has gone steadily on from the earliest works and has by great care and perseverance brought his little band to rendering Beethoven's last quartets in a wonderful manner; the knowledge and appreciation of this kind of music by his audience has grown with the time, and they now give him their heartfelt thanks for his deserts. His quartet is, I fancy, hardly surpassed anywhere at present. The piano music is played by the best Viennese artists and by the great pianists who are by chance in the city; as, for example, Madame Clara Schumann, Rubinstein, Drey-schock, von Bulow, and the like. There are a shorter series of chamber concerts by other still younger artists, as well another series of quartets. Besides all these are innumerable chamber concerts, as for example of the four pianists above mentioned, five or six apiece, of Piatti, the great violoncellist from London; of Servais, also a great violoncellist; of Laub, the first violinist of Berlin; of Vieuxtemps, of Stockholm, the best singer in the world; of young artists in any branch in order to show themselves to the Viennese public, of the well-known established favorites there, of many, many people "for a charitable purpose," where the first players are often to be heard; in short, far more chamber concerts than even the most assiduous and enthusiastic student can hear.

There are four great orchestral concerts given by "The Society of the Friends of Music"; and last year, five (in the coming season, ten) orchestral concerts given by the orchestra of the opera, at all of which the highest order of orchestral music is played. The performances of the last named or Philharmonic Society were really spotless last winter, conducted as they were by Carl Eckert, their director, and playing for themselves as a body. There are three concerts of the "Singverein" and three of the "Singakademie," the former under the direction of Herr Johann Herbeck and the latter of Professor Stegmayer, kapellmeister of the opera, and of Franz Maier, a rising composer. These societies are composed of ladies and gentlemen, and give oratorios, old church music as well as that of the more modern composers. Both societies are about two years old, and have won for themselves much credit for their performances in so short a time, though not yet on a level with the great "Singakademie" at Berlin.

Then Vienna numbers four societies of men; the principal one is still the Männer Gesangverein, under the conduct of Johann Herbeck and Hans Schlager, numbering over two hundred singing members. A second society, treading on the heels of this old and renowned club, is the "Akademischer Gesangverein," composed of the students of the Vienna University; this society has been exceedingly well drilled and brought before the public by a young lawyer, and has by its fresh voices and fire won great applause. These two and the other like societies gave altogether five or six public concerts yearly and twice as many other performances, to which admission is readily obtained by a musician. Of course their singing is excellent, for nothing else in this comparatively simple line, would be received by the public. In addition to all these concerts are several occasional matters every year; as for instance during the "Schiller Festival" more music than one could bear was to be heard; and something is always turning up.

Of course it is very easy to become a singing member in any or all of these societies, and thus an immense amount of music may be heard and studied, for each society sings once a week. There are two amateur orchestral societies, which also meet every week for practice and give public performances now and then. In addition the Conservatorium gives two concerts yearly of mixed performances, orchestral, vocal and on the various instruments. In the churches the masses of the old masters are continually to be heard; especially in the "Court-chapel" the music is excellent. This is an advantage which Catholic countries enjoy over Protestant countries. Strauss is constantly to be heard and is worth much even for a musician; no one plays the charming dance music as he does or rather as they do, for the brothers, Johann and Josef Strauss, fill their father's place. The military bands must not be passed over, celebrated as they are. And lastly comes the opera, German and Italian.

Take it for all in all, I know of no city that can boast an opera equal to the Viennese. The orchestras of Paris, Munich, Dresden, Berlin, Hanover, (Stuttgart they say), and perhaps London and St. Petersburg, as well that of Vienna and Prague are magnificent, when they like to be, no doubt. But of all these the Kärnthnerthor orchestra at Vienna has, to my mind, the most swing and fire. No city can show voices equal to those assembled in the Austrian capital, excepting London and St. Petersburg, and in those cities one hears an old, monotonous and tiresome repertoire; eternally Italian music interspersed at London with an occasional German opera, very often mutilated, a programme of last season at the Covent Garden; 1st act of Beethoven's "Fidelio" and then Verdi's "Martiri." B-r-r-r! Either one thing or the other and no mutilation. It is true that the repertoire at Vienna leaves much to be wished for, but is improving. An account of the opera singers, as I once began, might be interesting to your readers, including as it would some artists whom America will yet hear. It is said, by the way, that Umann has engaged Mme. Caillag, of Vienna; he has found a card which will do him good service in the next game, if it be true.

Until last year an Italian opera troupe has sung for three months annually at Vienna in the Imperial opera house; thus the public has heard the Italian opera well rendered. The singers have always been excellent; in fact all the great artists of days past and present, have, with few exceptions, sung at Vienna, and this has had a good effect on the vocalization of the German singers there. Last year Salvi engaged a company and brought them out at the "Theater an der Wien," a very handsome and excellent house; what success he had, pecuniarily speaking, I cannot tell you: his prices were too high; his company had some excellent singers, and among them, as said in a former letter, Mme. Emmy La Grus, the singer of the time, par excellence, (in my mind). Her "Norma" was very, very wonderful; and her "Lucrezia Borgia" was again splendid.

Her beauty, her figure, her acting, her singing thrilled me the whole evening; it was "Grisi's" greatest part, and I had seen her in it during her summer and felt her splendor. But this was beyond it. How well I remember her warning her husband with the words, "O my fourth husband!" It went right through me. She is a great singer, not all by the strength of her voice, but by its beauty and by her great talent and consummate art. She is much finer in German than in Italian opera, because she has more scope, as in the character of "Fidelio," "Donna Anna" in Don Juan, "Agathe" in Der Freischütz, or "Valentine" in The Huguenots. But to return.

The sum of all these concerts, operas, masses, &c., will, I think, satisfy any one; it is a great pity that none of the cheap and good concerts, like Liebig's in Berlin, exist in Vienna; they'll come soon, it is hoped, however. And for teachers, too, I can well answer. Indeed, it would be strange, if the city where Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schubert lived and strove, could afford but little to musical students. A great many young musicians of much talent in various ways, whom I have not mentioned, are at Vienna; all musicians like to be there, to live there. Schumann desired to reside there, his wife will very possibly reside there now, if she chooses any fixed abode; Liszt is said to be going there, Rubinstein desires the same; and so it goes. Vienna is in many ways a charming city, its inhabitants are very hospitable and kindly to strangers, and have the means of exercising hospitality. They are warmer and livelier than in North Germany as a rule, owing, in a great measure, no doubt, to the mixture of the German with the Southern races. The musicians are very friendly towards foreigners of their own profession. The country in the neighborhood is beautiful for excursions, as, for instance, up the river into the Tyrol and Bohemia, down the river into Hungary, by the Trieste railroad into Styria, Carinthia, Croatia and to beautiful Venice. As for the Austrian police, a long experience enables me to say that I never received anything but great courtesy and kindness from their hands, be it in Austria, Italy, Hungary, Croatia, Bohemia or any other part of the Empire, where as I have acts of great stupidity and cruelty to chronicle against the Prussian, and especially the Saxon, police. A law allowing persons to travel everywhere within the Austrian empire without passports, and putting aside the system of "Cartes de séjour," was made four years ago, and was immediately put in full practice. No one molests or asks after all decently-behaved people in Austria; any one who has a desire to meddle with internal politics, is liable to punishment very justly. One more point, expenses with the present state of Austrian exchange, are nearly on a level with the cheapest cities of Germany. When musical students go abroad, let them weigh the advantages of the different cities, and at least let them devote a space of time to Vienna, that they may reap some of its advantages. Let them seek and meet the Viennese musicians on their own ground and they'll not regret it. J. L.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12.—The first Philharmonic Concert, which took place last Saturday evening, was neither as full as the latter ones usually are, nor as attractive as some of its predecessors have been. The orchestral pieces, it is true, were very fine, but there was a want of spirit in all the performances, which communicated itself to the audience, and rather chilled it. The pièce de résistance was Schumann's Symphony in C, a work admirable for its elaborateness and depth, but not as clear and attractive as might be wished, and rather heavy withal. The Scherzo is decidedly the most pleasing movement. Mendelssohn's "Calm at Sea and Happy Voyage," contains delicious bits of tone-painting, and instrumentation, but is also rather dragging, and hardly equal to the Melusine and Hebrides Overtures. A very interesting novelty was presented in the first overture to Leonore, written by Beethoven in 1805. All music lovers know that the Master wrote three overtures to his sole opera, before he could satisfy himself. The last was the well known grand one, with the trumpet solo. But this the musicians found entirely too far-fetched and difficult, hence, to satisfy them, he produced still another work, which now is called the Overture to Fidelio. It is curious to observe how totally different are all these overtures on the same subject. No. 3 is undisputed by the finest, and a masterpiece in itself, yet this No. 1 is also very beautiful, in construction, melody, and every other respect, and any other than a Beethoven might have been proud of it. Its chief theme is the opening air of Florestan's grand aria, which, in the No. 3, is merely hinted at at the commencement, but here is fully worked up. It was this motive that Schindler used to tell his orchestra to play "religiously" (fromm), and it weakens, indeed, the purest, holiest feelings.

Madame SCHROEDER DUMMLER, (with two such names, who can doubt her nationality?) was the single vocalist engaged for this concert. She is understood to be a new prima donna "imported" by Ullmann, and has a pleasing voice and good method, though hardly force enough to fill the Academy. Her first piece was the "Va-dit-elle," from Robert which the reporter of one of our dailies wisely calls "the remonstrance of the Princess," evidently confounding it with "Robert, toi que j'aime." Elizabeth's Prayer, from Tannhäuser, showed the lady's voice to advantage in its long-drawn notes, but was entirely inappropriate for this occasion, and out of place outside of the opera, where its slowness and heaviness can alone be relieved by what precedes and follows it. In the instrumental soloist of the evening, the audience greeted our old friend in a new capacity: Mr. NOLL performing Vieuxtemps' second Concerto for the violin. His success was far beyond the expectations of those who know how long he has been unused to solo-playing; but nevertheless, this fact was still distinctly apparent. No one doubts Mr. Noll's being an earnest and true musician, but the necessity of turning his talent to account in the most lucrative way, has unfortunately spoiled him for a more refined exercise of it. —t—

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 19, 1860. — On Saturday evening a large audience assembled in the foyer of our Academy of Music, to inaugurate the second season of classical concerts, last year conducted by Messrs. Wolfsohn and Hohnstock, and this year by the first named gentleman and Mr. Theo. Thomas, of New York, Mr. Hohnstock having gone to Europe some months ago; and here let me congratulate Mr. Wolfsohn on his good taste in selecting Mr. Thomas to assist him, a gentleman who is universally acknowledged to be one of the best interpreters of chamber music in the country, and whose fame, in connection with Mr. Mason, of New York, is national, on account of their excellent concerts in that city for a number of years past. The concert opened with Haydn's beautiful quartet (in D minor) which gave the greatest satisfaction, particularly the Andante; the execution was everything that could be desired. Mr. Wolfsohn now made his appearance and gave us a rare treat in Chopin's Polonaise (Eb major). I need not say it was splendidly performed; his reputation as a pianist is too well known to you for that. Being encored, he played one of his own compositions, full of expression; it was very well received. Mr. Thomas came next, playing Schubert's Tarantelle with a vigor and execution unsurpassed. As a leader we had heard him before, in the opera orchestra, and had remarked his perfect coolness and self-possession when the conductor was most nervous and perplexed; and by his bowing they were several times prevented from coming to a dead halt. With his solo every one was delighted, and for an encore he played a beautiful Reverie by Vieuxtemps. Mendelssohn's Sonata (Op. 45, B major) was the next piece. It was capably rendered by Messrs. Wolfsohn and Schmitz. The closing piece was Schumann's quartet (Op. 47, Eb major). This being much more intricate than any of the other pieces requires several hearings to be appreciated, though it appeared to give much pleasure to a large portion of the audience. Thus ended the first concert, which we sincerely hope may be the precursor of many others equally successful. We must not forget to mention the important services rendered by Messrs. Kammerer, Hassler, and Ch. Schmitz. The latter gentleman, though very young, by close attention and industry, has already won golden opinions from the musical public of our city, and now ranks among the first of our violoncellists. The next concert will take place next month, and judging from Saturday night it will be very crowded. A glorious Quintet of Mendelssohn's is one of the treats on the programme; it alone ought to attract a full house. The success of concerts like these is most delightful, both to the lovers of true art, and to the parties who undertake them; to the former it gives the purest form of enjoyment, and to the latter that encouragement which enables them to meet and overcome the rude shocks of every day life.

IL FANATICO PER LA MUSICA.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 20, 1860. — On Saturday evening last the first classical Soirée of Messrs. WOLFSOHN and THOMAS at the Foyer of the Academy of Music was largely attended by those of our citizens who may fairly be said to represent the higher order of musical sentiment of Philadelphia. The room is beautifully proportioned and decorated, but is imperfect acoustically, this feature being neglected, as the room was probably never intended for musical purposes.

First, we had Haydn's Quartet (in D minor), finely rendered by Messrs. Thomas, Kammerer, Hassler and Schmitz. Mr. Thomas is perhaps the best quartet player in the country, and by his familiarity with leading (which his position as first violin in various opera troupes has given) exercised a finer influence over his companions than Mr. Hohnstock, who seemed less fitted to command.

Next, Chopin's Andante-Spianato Polonaise (Eb major) exquisitely executed by Mr. Wolfsohn, who, being loudly applauded, played a composition of his own. He is a hard student and an excellent teacher, working day and night to perfect himself in his art, and to create in his pupils a love for music above the mere desire to execute superficially for the amusement of the saloon.

Mr. Thomas then played Schubert's Tarantelle, accompanied by Mr. Wolfsohn, with immense success. The concert closed with Mendelssohn's Sonata (Op. 45, B major) and Schumann's Quartet (Op. 47 Eb major). Taken as a whole it was a most delightful and auspicious opening.

The piano used was one of Steinway's. These instruments are now selling largely, the agents finding it difficult to keep a supply commensurate with the demand, a few years since there was but one or two in the city and now you find them everywhere.

Every Saturday afternoon the Germanians under Mr. Sentz give rehearsals which are crowded to overflowing by youths of both sexes, many of the young women (unfortunately for those who go to hear the music) preferring their own lovely voices to the compositions as rendered by the gentlemen on the platform.

Mr. Sentz has just returned from Europe, bringing with him a large collection of new music. Last Saturday for the first time they played Mendelssohn's Adagio 4th Symphony; the beauty of the music and the admirable execution producing a spontaneous encore. It is to be hoped Mr. Sentz will repeat it frequently during the season.

There was another soirée last week given by Mr. Bonewitz, an admirable artist. He played Chopin's Scherzo in B flat, the music and the style recalling a delightful evening spent at Mr. Dresel's rooms, the late Mrs. Dwight being present. Mr. Bonewitz is also a composer of merit.

The Opera, with Madame Colson and Signors Brignoli, Ferri and Susini, commences on the 26th. It comes at a bad time, our people being terribly frightened by the agitation of the times. With money at one a half to two per cent per month little heed will be paid to lovely Colson or demonstrative Verdi.

CINCINNATI, NOV. 17, 1860. — The Cecilia Society gave their second concert this season last night. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Melusine".....Mendelssohn.
Hymn for Solo and Chorus.....Mozart.
La Fruite. Piano Solo.....Heller.
Polish Songs.....Chopin.
Chorus for female voices, from "La Vestale".....Spontini.
Marche heroïque. Piano. Four hands.....Franz Schubert.
Two Four-part Songs for male voices.
Selections from "Orpheus".....Gluck.

The principal vocal solos were sustained by Miss Fanny Raymond. She made a great impression in the part of Orpheus. Her rich contralto voice is just suited for this music. r.

Concerts.

OTTO DRESSEL'S. — Few resident artists could have ventured upon the bold experiment of giving a series of public concerts, relying mainly upon themselves alone, and had the good fortune to meet so large and so cultivated an audience, or to have given such complete satisfaction as was experienced by Mr. DRESSEL's audience on last Saturday evening. The beautiful hall at Chickering's was completely filled by a most appreciative host of listeners, who knew what was in store for them, and were not disappointed in their expectations. The programme, shows a rare variety of composers, and of schools of piano music.

1. Prelude and Fugue for Organ, (A minor,) arranged by Liszt.....J. S. Bach
2. a. Notturmo, (op. 23,).....Schumann
b. Gondoliers.....Mendelssohn
3. Mazourka, (op. 6, F minor,).....Chopin
3. Recitative and Air: "Deh vieni, non tardar," from Le Nozze di Figaro.....Mozart
4. Bolero.....Ferd. Hiller
5. Adagio from 2d Concerto.....Chopin
6. Songs. a. Supplication, ("Weil auf mir du dunkles Auge,"),.....Robert Franz
b. Barcarolle.....Schubert
7. Septett.....Hummel
(The accompaniments arranged for a second piano.)
Allegro—Scherzo—Andante con Variazioni—Finale.

The brilliancy of the prelude and fugue astonished some young listeners unprepared for such music from an old and dust-covered classic, such as they imagined old Bach, who seemed to them to be in many things not a little in sympathy with the rare trio of modern pianists, who were represented in the next number of the programme. The Bolero by Ferd. Hiller is a beautiful and brilliant concert piece, of singular variety of style, reminding one of several very different schools.

Mrs. HARWOOD sang admirably the beautiful songs allotted to her, and was warmly applauded and even encored. Mr. LEONHARD played finely the accompaniments to the piano part of Hummel's Septet, which is an admirable transcription of this fine work. Mr. Dresel will give his second concert this evening.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, always welcome, opened their twelfth season, by a very successful concert at the really splendid hall of Messrs. Chickering. It was successful in presenting a very good selection of music in an excellent manner, and by the hall being filled completely. Heaven seems to be propitiated at last, and instead of pouring forth its waters or emptying all Acolus' wind-bag at once, a fair moonlit night favored their concert. And we confess to a real treat. The programme ran as follows:

1. Second Quintette, in B flat, op. 87. . . . . Mendelssohn Allegro—Allegretto scherzando—Adagio—Finale, Allegro vivace.
2. Tenth Quartette, in E flat, op. 74. . . . . Beethoven
Introduzione. Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo, Presto—Finale,
Tema con variazioni. (First time in Boston.)
3. La Petite Mendiant—Scene chantante, for clarinette
..... C. Baermann
Thomas Ryan
4. Piano Quintette, in E flat, op. 44. . . . . R. Schumann
Allegro—In modo d'una Marcia—Scherzo, Molto Vivace—Finale, Allegro non troppo.

The selection was admirable; but if we meant to find fault with this part of the entertainment, we might say that to our taste the Piano Quintette by Schumann ought to have preceded the Beethoven Quartette instead of following it. The Quintette by Mendelssohn in B flat, with its fine Allegro, noble Adagio and strong Finale was a fit and genial opening to a first concert of the season. Mendelssohn interests you more than he moves you. It has been our conviction for a long time, that frequently art takes the place of genius in Mendelssohn's Compositions. They impress us much as an elegant, very well bred gentleman in white kids does, who knows how to repress his feelings at the proper time, so as not to exceed the bounds of good breeding. If the word had not been abused so often, one might call Mendelssohn the gentlemanly artist. But then we have gentlemanly waiters, and a cotemporary lately had the happy idea of calling one of the most elevated men in the walks of science a "gentlemanly professor." But to come back to "our mittens." This Quintette, however, always seemed to us to have more of genial warmth and nerve in it than many compositions by Mendelssohn of the same class, and we were very glad to find this favorite at the head of the programme. Mr. WM. SCHULTZE played well, especially when we take into account, that he was indisposed, and that it must have been hard work for him to play in three classical pieces of chamber music. We therefore refrain from any further criticism on that artists performance.

Beethoven's tenth Quartette in E flat op. 74, dedicated to the Prince of Lobkowitz, was the glory of the evening. Full of the most sweet and moist melodies, warmed up and transfigured into glorious radiance by energetic motives and skilful interweaving of parts, and seasoned and pervaded by surprising, and yet so beautiful harmonic effects, it was a feast in itself. Gleams and sparks of genius shine out every where, reminding one of the azure field of stars, while the tone of the whole affects us like the full moon shedding her golden light over the hushed earth. It is a kindly genial feeling that pervades the whole composition. Even now when his followers have so frequently made use of certain harmonic combinations they strike us in this work as if not heard before. So for instance the succession of two Diminished Seventh chords followed first by the tonic in F major, then, after being repeated, by the Dominant Seventh in B flat major in the early part of the first Allegro movement. And how wonderful are the harmonies of the short "Poco Adagio" Introduction! This too, like a prelude running now in a quiet, then a melancholy vein, and at last rising up in seven measures by half steps to the opening theme, is full of the touches of genius.

The Allegro (first movement) seems to us a mixture of strong manly fancy and a happy childlike playfulness, though nothing in it reminds one of the Mozart period of his earlier pieces for stringed instruments. It is the serenity of mature age, smiling at its own fancies. It ends after having most fully and satisfactorily treated the two principal themes as strong and manly as it begun. The Adagio in three-eighth time is a series of sweetest variations on a quiet half melancholy theme in A flat. It is more of a fantasia in the form of variations. Our room forbids to quote of the beautiful effects in this movement more than the one, where in the Variation in D flat, the first violin having the theme, the violoncello suddenly rises up to G flat, thus keeping us at a moment in D flat, when we expect quietly to float down into A flat. It has a ravishing effect.

Swiftly, characteristically with the true Beethoven impetuosity sweeps the Presto in C minor along, a Scherzo full of strength and fire, the first movement alternating with a wilder Prestissimo in C major, which takes the place of a Trio. The last movement is a series of Variations on a simple theme in two parts. Of this movement likewise we have to restrict ourself from speaking at length, merely noticing one most agreeable surprise in the gently waving sixth Variation, where the composer in the second part passes in an instant from D flat major back to E flat major, which he had attained by a similar slight harmonic change, an effect of most unexpected refreshing sweetness. It closes with a short unisono statement of the theme in variation, in the best of humor and a manly fullness of strength.

The work is surely one of the most important of Beethoven's works for stringed instruments, of the period of his full manhood. It seemed to electrify the audience, and was received accordingly. We hope the Club will let us soon hear it again, to strengthen our impressions and to become familiar with this genial work. It left a feeling of perfect satisfaction which we fain would soon enjoy again. The Piano Quintette by Schumann in E flat, op. 44, suffered somewhat from being heard after the Beethoven Quatuor, though it is full of grand and noble thought, treated in that thorough and satisfactory form, which seems to have descended from Bach to Schumann. The melodies are almost constantly rendered in a polyphonic treatment, which gives a peculiar flavor to everything that Schumann writes. Even his little pieces in the Album are full of this inward life. We will not speak of this Quintette at all, only expressing the wish of a repetition of it, some time this season. Mr. PARKER played his part with much earnestness, though some places might have improved by somewhat more strength and fire. Still the whole left us in a very elevated mood, and we confess to having been edified by it. The title "Scena" for clarinette was pleasing enough, but was lost in the wealth of strong and grand imagination filling and lighting up the two compositions between which it was placed. Mr. Ryan played it with his usual good tact.

There is a new member of the Club, Mr. FREDERIC ZÖHLER, who in the Quintette by Mendelssohn, showed a good deal of energy and skill in handling his instrument. We are sorry to miss Mr. KREBS, the more so, as we hear that an unsatisfactory state of health is the cause of his leaving the Club, which he has graced so long by his ability. Messrs. WULF FRIES and MEISEL played with their accustomed skill.

We look forward with a lively anticipation of pleasure to the second concert of the Club, which will take place Tuesday, December 4th, and hope they will give us as splendid a selection as this time.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY during this past week, invited a number of gentlemen to meet and consult with the Government of the Society, as to the best means of securing the success of a series of orchestral concerts. The matter was fully discussed at the meeting, and a committee was chosen to consider the matter more fully, viz: Col. T. E. Chickering, Dr. J. B. Upham, Dr. George Derby, J. H. Marsh, Esq., and Henry Ware, Esq. The prospect is that an opportunity will speedily be offered to the musical public of this vicinity for subscribing to a series of six concerts of the first class, with a long series of rehearsals, both at a price lower than has been thought possible for many years. It is absolutely necessary however that a sufficient number of tickets be subscribed for at once to ensure the undertaking. An admirable series of concerts will be given at the lowest possible rates of admission, so that crowded houses are imperatively necessary either to start them, or to carry them on. We presume that full particulars will be given in a few days.

The First Orchestral Concert of the Season

Will be given on Monday, December 3, at the Music Hall, at 3 o'clock, P. M. It is a benefit concert, and will present to the public a choice selection of good music. An orchestra of forty-four artists will perform the grand Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, in itself half a concert. In addition to it the Allegretto from the 8th Symphony by Beethoven is to be played, that genial, lovely gem, which has been a favorite with our Boston public for years. And besides these two, the Overture to "Oberon," by Weber, and the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," will form part of the programme. If we take into account the fact, that the Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. ZERRAHN, have not been heard this season, this opportunity to hear so large an orchestra play those beautiful pieces should be a sufficient inducement to fill the hall.

But the programme presents other attractions, so rarely found together, that the concert promises to be of unusual interest. Mrs. HARWOOD, deservedly the favorite Boston Prima Donna, is to sing, as appears from the programme, the "Barcarolle" which pleased so much at Mr. Otto Dresel's first soirée. Messrs. DRESEL, LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER will perform two of their pieces for eight hands, "Les Contrastes," by Moscheles and the sparkling "Invitation à la Valse" by Weber in Mr. Otto Dresel's arrangement, on two of Messrs. Chickering's Grand Pianos. Mr. WM. SCHULTZE will play a Solo on the Violin and the Orpheus Musical Association will sing some of their four-part songs for the rendering of which they are so justly famous.

We do not think any of the concerts since the benefit concert for Mr. Trenkle presented so many attractions. And if the public are as generous as the artists, who have all volunteered their aid for the benefit of the German-English school in this city, the concert will be as well attended as it deserves to be, promising so much that is excellent and a combination of artists as we seldom find united.

It has the additional merit of being the harbinger of more orchestral concerts, the Philharmonic society having taken steps to secure a series of six concerts, with rehearsals on Wednesday afternoons.

Let it therefore be well attended. See advertisement in another column.

Walter Savage Landor has occupied himself for a long time past in putting his complete writings in order for the press. His entire works, corrected and enlarged, as they may be, he has put into the hands of Mr. Fields, the Boston publisher, selecting him as his final editor.—N. O. Picayune.

Meyerbeer is preparing a melo-dramatic version of Henry Blaze de Bury's five-act play, La Jeunesse de Goethe, for a speedy performance in Paris.

A Soiree Musicale in Bethlehem.

My thoughts were rapidly flowing into a misty reverie, suggested by the ghostly appearance of a group of orchard trees whose white-washed trunks, seen vaguely in the gathering shades of eve, and presenting a variety of fanciful shapes, seemed like a band of sprites starting Lehigh Mountainward for a nocturnal revel a la diable: indeed Heine's vivid pictures of the Hartz Gebirgen were swimming through my mental vision, when the cars halted amid a number of unsightly coal trains and much confused shuffling in front of the Bethlehem station. Awaunt now, all ye goblins, witches, elves, and cloven feet of the Brocken! There are familiar faces before me and old memories banish ye all, even as the morning sunshine dissolves the gray, phantom mists of the night; nor can I longer liken the roundly-washed stones on the banks of the romantic Lehigh, to the play-balls which evil spirits cast at each other on the Walpurgis night, when I attain the opposite side of the bridge and espy the obese toll taker. He used to be sexton of the church in my day, and I can see him now handing around coffee and cake in the love-feasts which were wont to gladden my young heart in days lang syne. The town seems somnolent now, as you pace its hilly streets; and the mountains in the distance, stripped of the garb which rendered them so beauteous to summer tourists, and furnished the subject of many rhapsodical letters in the press, look brown and cheerless as Bayard Taylor's pictures of the hillocks about Kautokeino, in Lapland. That scene of summer fashion, beauty, gaiety and refinement, the Sun Hotel stands upon its site "like some banquet hall deserted"—nothing there to remind the casual visitor of its midsummer glory, save, perchance, the smiling countenance of its proprietor, Mr. Leibert, or the active attendance of the well-known "Sam." At the supper table there are the regular boarders of the establishment; a New York drummer for the jewelry business; several Eastonians out for a pleasure ride; a lugubrious individual predicting the direct disasters to our happy Columbia—and finally, a classically chiseled profile surmounting a handsome evening dress. "That," whispers my vis-à-vis, "is Miss K—y, of New Orleans, a charming pianiste."

The man emphasized the word charming with a glad expression of face, which showed how much the presence of the accomplished Southerner in their midst is appreciated by the habitués of the hostelry. Wallace, Strakosch, Gottschalk, Thalberg—all have borne graceful testimony to the talents and art-enthusiasm of the young lady in question. She has left for the nonce the busy and distracting scenes of metropolitan life, for a more uninterrupted pursuit of her studies, among a people whose ideas and appreciation of music have claimed the admiration of the world. Mr. Bleck, the Dorforganist of many years standing, is now piloting the young Southern pianiste through the intricacies of harmony and counterpoint—well pleased, as he informed me, with the application and progress of his pupil.

Supper finished, a leisure stroll brought me to the house of a much valued friend, R—, just returned from a pleasure tour in Europe—a man of great intelligence, fine musical endowments and scientific attainments. How his expressive eyes fairly glistened as he dilated upon the Euryanthe of Weber, which he had seen in Dresden, with a completeness in detail that was wonderful, or glowed with enthusiasm in relating his impressions of the sublimity of Beethoven's mass in D, whose heavenly measures pealed over the gallery of the Stephan Kirche in Vienna. Such a narrator carries the listener bodily into the scenes under description. When the conversation changes, you come back to America from London, Rotterdam, Utrecht, Dresden, Vienna, or Berlin, as the case may be, with the most vivid impressions.

But the chief object of my hurried visit to Bethlehem was yet to be accomplished, viz: to hear Mad. Dressel, a new musical arrival, who is creating an immense sensation among the "gude folk" of this latitude. L—, the kind improvisator of the soiree I am about to describe, had excited my curiosity to a towering pitch by his confident assertion of her great vocal powers—the more that my trust in the correctness of his judgment has long since been fully established. Madame Dressel is a Russian by birth, and comes to Bethlehem to take charge of the music department of the Moravian Female Seminary there, at the recommendation of such men as Richard Wagner, the great apostle and originator of the Zukunft's Musik, Blumenthal, the pianist, and others to whom an agent of the school in the Vaterland applied for advice. Her manners are essentially French—lively, sprightly, and full of bonhomie: and she is making laudable efforts to master sufficient of English towards a complete understanding with her pupils. For some years attached to the opera in Dresden, the reminiscences of this phase in her artistic career have constant possession of her. Thus, the expression of her features and the dramatic appreciation of each morceau, shows that when she vocalizes an air of Fidelio, the Pizzaros, Juquinos, Marcellinas, Leonoras and Florestans of other days are fitting before her mental vision. She opened the soiree with a superb achievement of the famous aria from Der Freischütz—"Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and indeed, furnished such a rendition, as, in its occasional outbursts of intensity and alternate subsidence into the more peaceful measures, managed with consummate vocal control, must have elicited the bravos of any audience in front of the footlights. Her voice is a pure soprano of great power and of adequate compass to the performance of almost any rôle in the classic or modern repertoires; while her familiarity with all standard operas is something to excite astonishment. I heard her sing the above mentioned aria from the Freyschütz, the C minor air of Marcellina in Fidelio; she gave us intensely dramatic renderings of several Leonora solos from the same work; bore her share in the beauteous four-part canon "Mir ist so wunderbar," interpreted for us a detached aria of Beethoven's—"Ah! perfido, (Ha! Treuloser.) with the most intelligent appreciation and expression; she accomplished all these without a recourse to the score, her capacious memory carefully treasuring them as the most precious sources of enjoyment to her. I verily believe she knows the whole of Fidelio, Freischütz, Euryanthe, Preciosa, and all the languishing haubles of the Italian school to boot, fully as familiarly as others know the English alphabet. She adores Beethoven, and talks understandingly of Wagner, whom she knows intimately, tolerates Bellini, whose Casta Diva is one of her sources of triumph, but is semi-facetious about other Italian operas. I have been thus particular in my description of this great acquisition to the cause of music in our country, not by way of advance puffing for a public appearance (she has not the slightest intention of it), but because I know the interest taken by the BULLETIN and its thousands of readers in the cause of good music; and if this be not an item worth recording,—the arrival of an artiste such as I have portrayed, why, I must have watched the progress of music in our communities to no purpose—that's all! Does not each important accession to the ranks of art leaders, such as this, multiply the chance of an ultimate national taste which shall improve the social circles of our vast population, and eventually furnish us with native performers, singers and composers, even as Germany and other lands teem with those whose services in art add lustre to their national status among nations?

There were other features at this pleasant Bethlehem soiree worthy of mention. A young Fräulein, G—n, performed Litolf's Spann-tied with much grace and accuracy of execution. Another, Miss B—h, bravely took the alto in the four-part canon from Fidelio, at sight, and came off creditably, while a basso, attacked with much confidence his own part in the same morceau. Mr. R—, who accompanied for the most part, displayed the most intimate knowledge and appreciation of all the composers whose compositions constituted the informal programme of this agreeable evening. Years ago, this able musician led the Bethlehem Philharmonic Society, in the heyday of its success and enthusiasm. I can see him now at his pult, checking the rashness of a clarinet in some peaceful andante, or frowning authoritatively at a certain youth whose excruciating viola intonations must have harrowed his sensitive ear. Ah me! the glory of the Philharmonic has disappeared before the progressive mania of these latter days, which incites the rising generation of the once peaceful village to essay its fortunes in the great world round about, or imbues them with home speculations and business strivings, totally antagonistic to a proper fostering of noble idealism. The old Philharmonic belongs to the past history of Bethlehem; but there still remain individual performers, and a general taste so pure, together with so much of correct theoretic appreciation, as may yet entitle Bethlehem to the proud name of the "most musical inland town in the United States."

Charming. for young singers.

Still in my dreams, with guitar acc. C. J. Dorn. 25

Her bright smile haunts me still. " " 25

Two of the prettiest late English ballads, already extensively known, adapted with an accompaniment for the guitar.

Instrumental Music.

Attila, by Verdi. Bouquet of Melodies. F. Beyer. 50

A potpourri from one of Verdi's earlier works. Beyer's selection embraces the best airs, including of course the popular Trio.

Masaniello. Rondo. J. E. Muller. 25

An instructive piece on a favorite air from this opera. Mr. Muller has made himself favorably known to his brother teachers by several series of easy teaching pieces.

The Morning Hour. A Collection of Finger Exercises and the Major and Minor Scales.

Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte. 50

This is a series of manual exercises which this highly esteemed instructress of the pianoforte has been using with her pupils for a number of years. This work will make itself indispensable wherever it becomes known. It combines what is most useful in Schmitt's Best Companion, Czerny's, Hara's and Knorr's Scales, and other similar works.

Babble Brook March. J. H. McNaughton. 25

A pretty march, rather easy, introducing the air of a favorite ballad of the author, Katie of Babble Brook.

Cotton Planters' Convention Galopade. Piano

Solo. 4 hands or 6 hands. C. H. Lochr. each 15

Written for class exhibitions. The piece is suited to the abilities of young players. Either arrangement is complete in itself but all these may be performed together, making six performers on three pianos.

ROMBERG'S VIOLONCELLO SCHOOL. A complete Theoretical and Practical School for the Violoncello, with Illustrations. By Bernard Romberg. 2,50

This is a standard work by one who is a complete master of the instrument. It is reprinted from the most recent European copy, and having passed through a careful revision in all its parts can be recommended as the most thorough and useful course of study on the violoncello obtainable.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAUERT, A. M.)

VII.

Historical study of music without any musical knowledge is next to impossible. Even the simple piano player can hardly do without thoroughness, and no teacher should practice a piece with an advanced pupil, the inner structure of which he does not know. He who knows nothing of chords, plays the notes like a child having learnt by heart a Latin poem without knowing its meaning. Let me give another analogy; a painter who did not study anatomy, will never paint the human body with as much expression as another who knows exactly what muscle moves beneath the skin. You can perceive by the very arrangement of the folds, whether the painter has observed only the surface of his subject. Just so you will perceive from the player's performance, whether or not he is conscious of the skeleton of the composition.

There are, indeed, great talents whose musical derivatory gift leads them without knowledge on their part, to a further goal than that reached by others less gifted, notwithstanding their knowledge; but that does not do away with my assertion: for what could the former obtain with their knowledge? and what would the latter have remained without it?

A dilettante able to overcome the difficulties of the easier Sonatas of Mozart ought to understand enough of thoroughbase to be also able to improvise a prelude or an accompaniment to a little song and to transpose it into any key. This is surely not asking much; but still, how much more valuable would this capacity be than the most perfect performance of a difficult piano concert?

The thoroughbase studies, as I consider them, adapted to the wants of young girls who can devote but little time to music as only a part of their general education, should, of course, not be arranged so as to remain only on the paper and to obtain after immense writing the result of an exceedingly dry attempt at composition. Each newly won chord is to be applied to the piano and to be recognized wherever it occurs in the compositions of others. This stimulates the desire of knowing more about it; the pleasure and interest in music will grow with every newly conquered step. How reverently does the pupil look up to the enigmas in the richer artistic creations, whose grandeur he now begins to perceive, when his Ariadne-thread suffices no longer to penetrate into their labyrinthine depths; and how, in his eyes, all the shallow and merely external sinks to the ground, when he understands the poor stuff out of which the prestige was made! It is already gaining a point, when the pupil feels that there is a work beyond his horizon not to be touched by his judgment, or that he likes some other work because it pleases the ear, but comprehends that it is worthless. If he is conscious that he was pleased by something dull and alien to the sublime, he will no longer torment the artist with his own silly talk on the art.

Anything mathematical appears peculiarly difficult to female nature; for this reason most pupils will and do grow weary when thoroughbase brings them to the inverted counterpoint, the principle of which male students conceive so readily. We must make extremely slow headway and be as patient as with a child's first attempts at speaking.

Let me describe to you my method of impressing on young girls the system of related keys quickly and easily. A rigorist may scoff at it; but as in numberless cases it has turned out to be more practical than the system used in books hitherto, experience will speak in my favor.

First I make a table (on music paper) of twelve systems in which, following the quint-circle, each key (scale) is written, so that C major commences above and F sharp major is on the seventh line changed into G flat major, F major concluding the lowest line.

Then I place the triad upon the first and fifth (tonic and dominant) observing, at the same time, that this triad's intervals were already contained in the scale; above them I write the names of tonic and dominant. Thus they get down the whole length of the table, a synopsis of the important dominant-chord on the 5th step of each key. They are now to compose little pieces in which only these two chords alternate; there is no possibility of error; for there will always be a satisfactory 'tune,' if the tonic is the beginning and the end. They may, for variation's sake, extend them to wide and narrow arpeggios; all they are forbidden is a progression of the upper and lower part in fifths and octaves. They must not be allowed to step further before they are well informed in this matter. Even the most careless pupil will easily perceive that the simplest way is to descend with the right hand when the left ascends, and vice versa, or to make a small step with the one hand, if the other makes a large step.

Thus the pupil may soon become acquainted with a third chord, viz. the triad on the sub-dominant (fourth step of the scale); it may, also, be easily found (4th above or 5th below the line). The left hand should not touch (in these exercises) any other tone besides the fundamental base, at least not till all the relative keys of the table have been gone through with. Any inversions confuse the pupils, before they have become firmly impressed with all triads in their primitive natural form with their respective positions. If they cannot hit upon any further form, in order to construct a little phrase out of those three chords, the teacher must assist him and point out some new form within the scope of these chords.

Most of the people's songs may be accompanied with these three chords; nay, if you add a minor chord, you will have almost sufficient material from which to make an entire Italian Opera.

The next chord to be added to the number of the triad on the sixth step of the scale, to which you give the name of parallel key, by which name the pupils know it since they first learned the scale on the piano. This chord again finds its place anywhere and forms between each of the preceding strict and major triads a soft reconciling element. If you want to advance rapidly, the pupils must apply the old figures again as they have become more varied by the accession of the minor key.

You may, in this wise, quietly continue the application of each new chord to all keys excluding, with all the pupils free scope, the progressions of upper and lower voices in fifths and octaves, as mentioned above. After the parallel key you may best insert the minor triad on the second step of the scale, and conclude with the most difficult triad, that on the third step (mediant). Point out to the pupil that this chord may best be applied after the dominant to which it bears the greatest affinity.

This course being finished—and it may be finished in a month with a pupil of ordinary musical ear—she will of herself not make any more progressions of fifths and octaves.

If you teach her in addition to apply and resolve the chief chord of the Seventh, she can help herself for all wants of a dilettante. If she feels like going on, add to the table the inversions of the chords and their application, which you cannot accomplish, however, without written exercises. The next step to thoroughbase is thus made; all chords, modulations, &c. come now in their respective order; but the "dilettante" woman has no time for them; and even if she learned them, they would be of no use to her, unless she had creative power. You may, finally teach to very judicious pupils, the different kinds of chords of the Seventh.

This will suffice to render the complete theory an irrepressible want for pupils of great talent. But the teacher should not forget that marrying cuts off considerably any learning of women. This regard should of itself induce him to arrange definite steps for lady dilettante upon which they can so inform themselves that they will not need to unlearn that in the course of their lives.

(To be concluded.)

Dinorah,
OR
THE SAINT'S-DAY OF PLOERMEL.
CHAPTER I.

Come with us, reader, to Brittany, land of gnome, dwarf, brownie, fairy, sprite and goblin; land of imagination and superstition, and stronghold of legendary lore!

The evening sun is setting, and, as it sinks far away westward, cradled in a mass of rugged, fantastic shaped clouds, purple and golden, its last rays linger on a wild stretch of broken moorland country.

Goatherds and peasants are wending their homeward way across the moor, and, as they gain the many paths which intersect the plain, they break up into knots, each selecting the shortest road to the welcome homestead.

The scene is truly pastoral; the moor scented, in the evening air, with thyme, broom and heather; the long, yellow haired goatherd and peasant, dressed in the simple and primitive habits of a remote and thoroughly rural province; the white and grey flocks answering the call of the herdsman and congregating together, from height and hollow; the deep-tolling bell from the chapel on the hill-side, mingling with the shrill, tinkling carillon of goat and sheep-bells—all to combine a picture of Arcadian simplicity.

While the peasants are taking leave of each other—a farewell rendered short and impatient by the fast coming gloom, and a remembrance of the weird inhabitants of the haunted glen, away in the distance—a strange figure crosses the moor. It is that of a young Breton maiden, beautiful of face, despite the mass of thick, unkempt hair which flows about it in matted confusion; graceful of form, notwithstanding the mass of tawdry, torn finery that envelopes her person. The wreath, the scarf, that coral necklace, the bridal hues of the once gay dress, the bridal bouquet so firmly clenched in her hand—all denote that this poor creature is some crazed being, whose wits have gone with that marriage-day disappointment!

A large white goat flies before her; and presently, exhausted by her efforts to catch it, she falls upon the moor, exclaiming—

"Marie, Marie! pretty playmate, I am weary of seeking for thee."

The peasants, observing her, whisper to each other—

"Alas! there's the poor mad girl again! Always seeking for her lost goat!"

"Marie! Marie!" continues the crazed girl; but the goat heeds not the call. One of those rapid transitions which accompany wandering reason succeeds, and the girl rises on one knee and rocks herself to and fro. "They say we are both crazed, Marie; but we know well how untrue it is! Our wild life is better than all their gladness!" Again she changes her attitude; and now she clasps her hands to her bosom, as though an infant were cradled in her arms. "Sleep, my darling," she cries, swaying forwards and backwards, "Sleep, darling! Nought can harm thee now! Am I not watching over thee? Hark to your cradle song—the brook chasing through the leafy glade! But, see! The wolf, in the dark, would creep upon us!"

And, full of wild fear, she springs to her feet, and flies, with the speed of the frightened hind, over the moor, away into the gloom!

The night has now fallen. The moor is deserted; and no sound can be heard save the wind, which sweeps across it, wailing for the departed sun.

Far away, across the dark plain, a light can be descried. Let us hasten towards it. We stop at a rude cabin, the door of which a man is hastily unfastening. On entering, he deposits a rude piece of musical apparatus, in the shape of a Breton bagpipe, on the rough bench beside the almost consumed logs, which, now and again, crackle upon the hearth. Having kindled the wood into a flame, by throwing fresh logs upon the hearth, the man wipes from his forehead a quantity of cold perspiration, and breaks into a soliloquy.

"Well, here I am—safe at home again! Witches and will-o'-the-wisps, Corentin, the wandering bag-pipe player laughs at you! Catch me staying abroad after dark, piping the soul out of my body for a couple of crowns, as Martin had the face to ask me to do, merely because he has got married, and because he and his bride want a dance! Catch me crossing the moor after nightfall! Catch me passing the end of the lane that leads to the demon's glen. I dare say she's sitting there now—the wild woman of the wood, who goes about dressed as gaily as Martin's wife was this morning. If she happens to take a fancy to a young man, and if he happens to say a civil word to her—twist goes his neck, and off she sets to catch some fresh victim! The very thought of it makes my flesh creep! Confound those logs, why won't they burn?"

The hut was almost in darkness, and the superstitious musician quickly struck a light, from flint and steel, and lit a lamp. Scarcely had he deposited the lamp on the rude bench which served for a table, when he started back in terror.

"Bah! It's only my own shadow on the wall," he said, reassured. "I thought it was my grand father, come back again to see how I was keeping the old place in order, and what I was doing with the money bags he hid away so cunningly! Plague take this lamp. One sees more shadows with it than without it."

The musician now went towards a rough chest, which was placed endwise in the corner, and began to search within it.

"Which way is the bread? Oh! here it is!"

Having secured a large roll of bread, Corentin returned to the chimney, and brought out, from among the dying wood-ashes, a small pan.

"I wonder if the soup has kept hot?" he began, as he lifted the lid and peered into the pot. Evidently satisfied with his investigation, he sat down, placed the pan between his knees, and commenced breaking the bread into it.

"Eating is as good as company—especially when one doesn't happen to be fond of one's own! Eating gives a man courage, too—especially if he does not have a supply to begin with. Well—I know I am not as bold as a trooper; but is it my fault? A man, after all, is only such as he is born; and who can help that? Nature makes —"

The wind had blown the crazy window open, and he had put a sudden stop to the philosophical musings of Corentin, who sprang up in alarm, crying, "Holy mother! What is that? Ah it's only the wind!" he said, shutting the window. "My grandfather's bagpipes might have afforded shutters, I beg to say, ere he left this tumble-down place to anybody. Well, as soon as I have ferreted out all that the old man may have left in nooks and corners, I'll bid adieu to this rotten old place, and—Eh! there's another noise—a footstep! No there is not! The best thing I can do is to make a noise myself. When one can't hear anything, there's nothing to be heard; and if fear takes away a fellow's courage and appetite, music, on the other hand, makes him bold and hungry!" With these words the musician equipped himself with his bagpipes, and soon drowned the sighing of the rising wind with his discordant din. Unfortunately for Corentin, his lamp, which, like music, was necessary to maintain his courage, suddenly went out; and, at the same instant, the terror-stricken bagpiper saw, by the flickering light from the logs, the door of his cabin pushed open, and the wild woman enter.

Corentin had hardly strength enough to cross himself, and to gasp out, "Oh! oh! Who—who are you?"

The wild woman seemed regardless of the terror-stricken youth for a moment; but presently she burst out into a song—

"Tune up thy pipes to a ditty gay;
Play away,
And never stay,
My merry neighbor,
What shall I give thee, piper, pray?
Why—a kiss, for thy labor!"

Impelled by some unknown power, Corentin could not help obeying the strange command.

"It is the Queen of the Glen," he muttered to himself. "I am lost!" The wild woman continued her song—

"Go on! go on! go on!
At thy peril something gay,
At thy peril, piper, play!
Though to-morrow we shall marry,
I will have my tune to-night!"

Then suddenly changing her mood, the Wild Woman of the Glen, as Corentin called her, but who was in reality the poor mad girl we have seen chasing her goat over the moor, caught the musician by the hand. "Give me thy hand to dance with me," she said, and immediately resumed her strange ditty—

"Here's my hand: so advance
Through the maze of the dance.
We are gone ere they find us!"

And so lightly we pass
O'er the dew on the grass,
No trace is behind us!"

"I will not, I will not," cried Corentin, crossing himself fervently. "Avaunt, witch."

At this moment a loud noise was heard outside. Some one was impatiently battering upon the door. The wild woman ceased her song, flew to the window, opened it, and fled into the night.

"Halloa, Grandfather Martin," shouted the impatient visitor on the outside. "What, Grandfather Martin. Open, I say."

"Heaven defend me," cried Corentin, creeping behind a chair. "Some one asking for Grandfather Martin, and it's almost midnight."

Tired with shouting, the visitor forced open the door with a succession of lusty kicks.

"Help. Get thee hence, Satan," cried the cowardly and superstitious Corentin.

"Come out, idiot," said the visitor, dragging Corentin from his retreat. "What do you take me for, ninny?"

"Well, if you are not he, who are you?"

"Who am I? An old friend of Grandfather Martin's. Where is he?"

"Out at present. Out, I assure you."

"Out. Where? I'll go and find him. Where is he?"

"Perhaps you know already. He's perhaps up there—perhaps down there. How do I know? 'Tis three weeks since we buried him."

A cloud passed over the stranger's face as he heard this.

"Buried, and I counted on the old man's help!" he muttered to himself. "Buried him," he repeated, resuming his former expression. "And you are his heir and successor, eh?"

"If four tumble-down walls make a property, I am an heir," replied Corentin. "What else did my grandfather die worth? Sir," he continued with a bow, "I am too poor to keep up all his acquaintances."

"Poor. What has become of the bags full of crowns old Martin made by playing on his pipes?"

It was not from fear of an unearthly visitor that Corentin's legs shook this time. "I shall be robbed and murdered," he groaned inwardly. "Sir," he began in an insinuating voice, "how shocking it is of people to spread such ill-natured reports. Good evening to you, sir."

"What, turn an old friend of your grandfather's away, would you? Do you think me the Evil One they say he was in league with? Well, if you were more hospitable, it would be better for you. A few thousand crowns, perhaps. 'Tis a pity."

"Sir, did you say a few thousand crowns? What do you mean, sir?"

"Nothing."

"Thousands of crowns nothing to a beggar like me."

The stranger seemed to hold Corentin in too great contempt to answer. But, as he turned his face towards the dying embers on the hearth, the knitted brows and quickly moving lips told that deep thoughts were present in his brain.

"There may be something made of this poltroon after all," he muttered to himself. Then, turning to Corentin, he said aloud, "Thousands of crowns, and something more. But never mind; finish your supper, empty your bottle, go to bed, and dream you are married to the Wild Woman of the Glen."

"Sir," said Corentin, "I see you are a worthy person. Would you not eat a bit for company's sake? As to the bottle of wine, I have none to offer."

"Well, I have walked far. Do you know a crown when you see it? There," said the stranger, handing the coin to Corentin. "Fat Paul's tavern is not far off. Go, fetch a bottle of wine, and let it be good stuff."

Corentin's hand clutched the crown greedily.

"Suppose, sir," he said, in a half whining tone—"suppose Paul can't give change?"

"What's change to a thirsty man with his thousands of crowns to fling away? Be off, my brave fellow. I am dying for a drink."

No sooner had the door closed on Corentin than the stranger gave vent to these words—

"The scheme will do. The fish jumps at the bait. His avarice will make him forget his fears, and the wine will do the rest. So old Martin is dead? And so it is his grandson—a precious miser like himself—who shall be the first man that touches the treasure. Is he worth being sorry for? Oh, Dinorah, if I long for this treasure, I want it only for thee; and if some one's life must pay for it, better his than mine. Come what will, however, this night shall decide my fate. Ah, there you are, lad," said he, looking up and addressing Corentin who had entered with the bottle of wine. "Come sit down and let us drink. Come, let us make each other's acquaintance."

What is your name?"

"Corentin, travelling bagpipe player."

"Good; well mine is Hoël."

"Hoël!"

"Yes, good sir."

"Did you fancy the wine was never coming? But Paul's tavern was so full. 'Tis the eve of our Saint's-day."

"Ah, the Saint's day of Ploermel to-morrow, is it?"

"Yes; and the grandest Saint's-day in all Brittany," said Corentin, depositing the bottle upon the table, and placing the change out of the stranger's reach.

"Ah," replied Hoël, with a sigh. "I know something about that day already. Perhaps you may have heard of such a place over yonder, as the Willow Farm?"

"The Willow Farm," repeated Corentin, as he arranged the table. "Perhaps he will not ask for his change," he muttered. "Yes; as you were saying—the Willow Farm," he said aloud.

"Yes; the farm that was burnt by lightning, just a year ago, on the Saint's day of Ploermel."

"If I could only make him drunk," whispered Corentin to himself, as he busied about spreading the table and lighting the lamp—"if I could only make him drunk, he would forget his change. Yes," he continued, speaking aloud, and taking his seat at the table. "Burnt by lightning, you were saying. The Willow Farm! Yes; I have heard of it."

The stranger seemed only to utter his thoughts aloud—

"Her father lived there—my Dinorah's father. We were to have been married—my Dinorah and I—immediately after the celebration of the fête! You are a stranger hereabouts? Well, the lightning set fire to the farm; the house was burnt to the ground."

"Burnt to the ground." Corentin repeated aloud. "He does not remember his change," he said to himself.

"Well," Hoël went on, "we were beggared—both of us. How could I marry her? I saw the farm in ashes. How could I marry her? Drink, Corentin. I would have sold my soul, at that moment, for a bag of money, to build the farm again. I was so wild with misery. But you don't drink. Did you ever hear of old Anthony?"

"Old Anthony! Old Anthony, the wizard?"

"Bah, wizard. Well, he passed near me, saying with a sneer, 'Oh, the bridegroom wants money, does he? Well, I dare say the bridegroom can find money, if the bridegroom knows where to find it.' But you have nothing in your glass. Why don't you drink?"

"I do—I do drink. Go on."

"Come along with me," said Anthony. "If the bridegroom wants to find money, there's money where he may find it. Lots of money. Gold. Diamonds. Jewels! Drink, young man."

"Gold. Diamonds. Jewels! Where?"

"Where. 'Hidden in the Demon Glen,' said Anthony. 'Dwarfs and brownies hide the treasure; but it is to be found, and he who is to find it must fast and pray, and live alone, and speak to no living creature—least of all, a living woman—for a twelve-month. Do you want to rebuild this farm house? Do you want your betrothed?' said old Anthony. 'If you do, come along with me; but if you do, you must come at once.'"

"Gold. Diamonds. Jewels. Well, and so you went along," said Corentin, taking off a glass of wine at a gulp.

"I was desperate," said Hoël. "I was hopeless. What could I do? How could I marry her? I left her. I left money for her with an old friend. Money. A miserable sum compared with what I had paid for the coral necklace she wore. Well, as I have told you, old Anthony knew about hidden treasure in the Demon Glen. He wanted his share of this treasure, but —"

"But," replied Corentin, cupidity glaring from his distended eyes.

"But he happened to die, as your grandfather, old Martin did."

"Die."

"Aye; but he left me a legacy."

"A legacy. What legacy?"

"Instructions how to obtain the hidden treasure hereabouts. Here's the hazel-wand he left me to dispose of the dwarfs and brownies. 'After the year has passed,' said he; 'when the night shall come, there will be a bell—a goat's bell—that shall ring. Follow that bell; it will go on—on to the Demon Glen. As the midnight hour strikes, wild fire will play over a stone; and that is the stone which covers the hidden treasure.'"

Corentin's curiosity made him thirsty. He swallowed off a glass ere he spoke.

"Treasure. What? he exclaimed. And with dwarfs and brownies to guard it. I like treasure as well as you. But what's to be done with the dwarfs and brownies?"

"What's to be done? This!" And the stranger showed his hazel-wand. "Anthony gave me first a caution, and then a prayer backwards. 'Do not listen to whatever may be said to you,' said he; 'turn a deaf ear to everything.' If you come with me, I will teach you the words. What say you? Thousands of crowns, remember. Well, is it a bargain? Yes or no?"

"Share and share alike. But what good can I do? I have not passed a year in a wood without talking to a woman."

"That's no matter. There must be two. And since Anthony is dead and your dear grandfather also, why should not his grandson profit?"

"What can be his fancy for sharing the treasure with me?" said Corentin to himself.

"Come," said Hoël, impatiently seizing Corentin by the wrist, and half dragging him through the door of the hut.

"Hark. What is that?" cried the frightened Corentin.

A bell was sounding in the darkness.

"Come along. 'Tis the goat's bell, that is to conduct us to the gold. Listen, fool. We must find out on which side it rings. Come along. Quick."

And the poor musician was dragged by the stranger, forth into the darkness.

CHAPTER II.

"Halloa! Not so fast! Wait a moment! Why, they are half way home already! Good night, there, neighbor! I say, Claude, you have made me drink too much of Fat Paul's wine to-night."

"Better too much than not enough," replied his companion.

These are evidently some of joll Fat Paul's company wandering home over the moor.

"Well, that's true," said the first speaker. "But what business had I sitting so long in Paul's tavern, when I promised to take that poor, crazy girl back to the village? And now, how is one to find her, Master Claude?"

"How should I know?" replied the person addressed. "What a fancy it is of hers to go rambling and roaming about the country when the moon's at full! If you catch her you won't keep her in a house. So, what I say is, what's the use of trying to find her, poor mad thing?"

"Well, that's true. If they would have left poor Dinorah alone, after her old sweetheart had left the country, she would not have been so bad. But when they tried to make her marry long George, the tailor, in order to drive Hoël out of her head, that upset her quite: and who can wonder, Master Claude?"

"Not I for one," replied Claude. "Yet, if Hoël comes back a rich man—for Long George, the tailor, says Hoël swore he would come back a rich man—think you he will look at her as she is now?"

"Why, no! Unless he can bring her brains back; but money will hardly manage that. But come along, my head is as heavy as lead, and I want to get home."

Scarcely had this worthy pair staggered away, ere the poor creature, the mad Dinorah, came bounding along, singing her snatches of wild song:—

"Here am I! here am I!
My Hoël waits hard by,
But no! he will deceive me,
The night is coming; they have passed on, and leave me!"

At this instant the moon broke out from a cloud, and cast Dinorah's shadow before her on the heath.

"Ah, morning at last! And here is my own dear friend!" she exclaimed, addressing her shadow. At last we shall sing at the wedding—we shall dance at the wedding! Shall we not?"

And she flung herself on the ground, and commenced talking with the shadow near her. But presently the moon became obscured by a passing cloud, and the shadow disappeared. The poor being broke out—

"Ah, cruel! thus to leave me in loneliness and pain. Said I ought to grieve thee? Return—return!"

The moon again burst forth; the shadow returned.

"Ah! here is Hoël!" she cried. "Give me your arm, and let us go! The bell is ringing: our friends all ready. To-day is the Saint's day. Look yonder, the procession is coming; all the village is on its way to the chapel to see us married."

The night was beginning to redeem the promise of the high wind that had been raging for an hour. A tempest was coming on. Peals of distant thunder were heard. And, as the poor creature caught the sound, she exclaimed—

"But, mine own, do you hear the thunder? But no matter, the storm may rage as wildly as it will, our love is too strong for it. Come, dear Hoël—come to the chapel!"

In her mad terror, poor Dinorah fled over the moor, nor stopped till she reached the entrance to a rocky ravine. The place was wild and awful in aspect. A number of Druidical stones lay piled up, marking the altar of a by-gone religion. Behind was a bridge, formed by the trunk of an old tree flung across the rocks, and beneath this rushed a body of foaming, tumbling water. She was not alone in this terrible spot, however. Two men were seen entering the ravine; one was waving a hazel-branch before him, and calling to his less resolute companion to follow.

"Come on," said Hoël—for it was he. "Yes, this is the place, I see; the Demon Glen of which Anthony told me."

"You see! You must have the eyes of an owl, then," replied his companion, who was no other than the bagpipe player. "It is pitch dark. Pity we forgot the lantern."

"Why, man, the lightning will do as well. Just such weather as it were a twelvemonth ago, on the last Saint's-day. Hush," Hoël continued, as he counted the chimes of the village clock, which faintly sounded a long distance away. "Yes, it is eleven o'clock."

"And at twelve the wild cross of fire will play upon the stone."

"Till daybreak," said Hoël. "And if we lose to-night's chance, we may take leave of the treasure for ever."

"And where shall we see the fire?"

"Over yonder, across that bridge."

"Bridge, do you call that rotten old tree? Expect a man to cross it in this weather, too? I wish I was safe in my cabin."

"Wait here, coward, while I go and examine the place. Wait here while I cross the bridge. Stop, I'll leave you my hazel-branch, for company and protection. Remember you bring it along with you when I call." And with this, Hoël commenced clambering up the rocks towards the old bridge. But scarcely had he crossed the tottering path, and disappeared among the rocks on the other side, when Corentin shrieked out—"Come back, Hoël! For Heaven's sake come back! It is all over with us. Here is the wild woman again."

It was Dinorah who stood before the trembling piper.

"Is it thou, piper?" she cried.

The musician could only drop the hazel-branch, fall on his knees, and cry, "Oh, oh!"

"Thou art Long George," she exclaimed. "'Tis useless to deny it. I should know that wicked smile anywhere. Who bade thee make love to me? I am not mad, though they say so; for I will not marry thee. Go, bad, malicious man! Go, I hate thee!"

"Idiot that I was," said Corentin, "not to have known who it was before. It is the poor, harmless, crazy girl who lodges with Louis' mother, and who always fancies some one is coming back to dance with her."

"Hush, didst thou not hear?"

"Hear! Hear what?"

"A stone that fell in the valley yonder."

"A stone! Can Hoël have played me false, and found the hidden treasure without me? Hold, comrade, have you found the hidden treasure?"

"The hidden treasure!—the hidden treasure," shrieked Dinorah, and she burst into one of her wild songs—

"Dark thy fate is glooming;
Man of evil omen—
He who first lays hold on
Hidden treasures golden,
Dies ere the year is over!"

"Dies ere the year is over," she repeated.

"Dies ere the year is over! Ah! now I begin to see what that traitor, that strange comrade of mine, meant with his sharing and his generosity, and his letting me go first."

At this moment, Hoël returned across the frail bridge. "Are you there, comrade?" he cried. "What has happened to make you call so loudly? Did not the hazel-branch protect you? The bridge is safe enough for you! and methinks I have found the very stone, on the other side. Come, prepare."

"But why am I to go before you?"

"Because I wear on my finger a blessed ring that might interfere with the charm."

"A ring! I wear two—two blessed rings—one in each ear."

"Will you compel me to use force, miscreant?"

At this juncture Dinorah came up to the pair, still singing the ditty—

"He who first lays hold on
Hidden treasures golden,
Dies ere the year is over!"

"I've got it—I've found it," said Corentin, suddenly. "You shall not go first; I shall not go first: she shall go first!"

"She—a woman! What, expose her to the peril?"

"No matter for such as she—'tis the mad girl whom I took for the Wild Woman. Hush, there is no time to lose. I will make her go."

"This is what Anthony foretold," said Hoël recognizing Dinorah, but shrinking away from her. "Let me be wary. Is it a demon? Is it shadow? Is it a woman?"

"This way, fair one," said Corentin, wishing to lead Dinorah towards the bridge. But Dinorah heeded not. She sang—

"The long-betrothed I wait to me;
O! bird of morn! the night is o'er;
Repeat thy song of love once more!"

"That voice," gasped Hoël. "Can it be my Dinorah's! Oh, no. Anthony told me, if I saw my father ready to die, my mother sue for mercy, or if my love went weeping by, 'twould be but a delusion to thwart me. I must heed not, hear not, or my hope is lost."

At this instant Dinorah's truant goat appeared on the bridge, and instantly the girl, throwing off her coral necklace, flew towards it. The goat was by this time in the middle of the bridge, and Dinorah eagerly following it. Hoël, seeing the necklace, stepped forward, and, picking it up, recognized his old love-gift. "It is she," he cried; but before the words had left his lips, the tree had broken down, and Dinorah was plunged into the boiling cataract below. Forgetful of his long-sought treasure—forgetful of everything but his Dinorah, Hoël rushed forward to save her from destruction.

It is the morning of the Saint's day; the storm of the previous night has passed away, and the happy villagers, whose homes are this time uninjured, are preparing to celebrate the fete of Ploermel. A procession is making for the village church; two persons are walking under a canopy of flowers; one is a young girl who leans upon the arm of her lover. The peasants come forward, and offer the maiden a bridal veil and a green branch. This maiden is Dinorah, saved from death by her lover, Hoël, upon whose arm she is now resting. By degrees, Dinorah, struck with one familiar object after another, has regained her faculties, awakening slowly as if from a dream, till she at length recognized her Hoël. And now the two are proceeding to the church to have their union solemnized.

Corentin creeps up to Hoël, and asks, "About that gold? Have you found it?"

And Hoël, pointing to the blushing girl at his side, answers—

"Yes! for here is treasure untold!"

Teaching the Piano in Classes.

VIRGINIA, November 17th, 1860.

MR. EDITOR:—In your "Journal" of November, you invite all such as are interested in an inquiry made by some one from Holly Springs, Miss., to give their experience. As the subject is one of the greatest importance to me, I will state you my experience for what it is worth. The inquiry is: Can a teacher teach more than one pupil on the piano at one time, doing them all justice?

Now I will grant that three, four, or more pupils who are to receive instructions upon the piano at the same time, have precisely the same degree of common sense, the same quantity of musical talent, and pay a like attention to their lessons. I will furthermore suppose that they know all the notes and the keys on the piano alike and well. With this class the teacher begins his first lesson. Now as every teacher of any experience knows, the reading of notes, even in the first "Five Finger Exercise" and the striking of the right key on the instrument is not the work of one single moment. Here then is the first difficulty. A will strike a key while B or C may be looking for it yet. The next thing is the manner in which they strike that key, and here is an obstacle over which no advocate of class teaching can come. One pupil will let the hands hang down from the key-board, the other will let the fingers play in the air, while one finger strikes a key; still another will hold the wrist high and bend down the knuckles; or another will press the thumb against the hand and strike with the whole hand instead of letting the thumb work independently; while some turn their hands outwardly when using the fifth (little) finger.

These are obstacles sometimes of the greatest magnitude even by single scholars, but how much more must it be the case with classes. Any teacher who really desires that his pupils should derive the greatest benefit from his instruction must admit that upon this basis, viz: the right and proper use of the fingers rests all after success. But has not every one seen and sometimes sadly beheld the awkward manner in which learners play octaves or sixths, (I mean consecutive ones?) and has it not sometimes baffled the exertions of a teacher for months to correct this faulty habit? How then are all these faults in different degrees with different pupils to be corrected in a class? Suppose A makes a mistake, the teacher corrects it while the others wait; next B makes a mistake and a different one from A, then A and C must wait and thus we proceed say one line. Is this the end of it? No! not by any means. The same fault will be made by the same pupil perhaps ten, or twelve times, if not more. Can the teacher stop the other pupils every time and still say that he has done justice to them? Has he not squandered the time for which they pay, and which of right belongs to them?

There is but one way to teach by this method, and that is, to force every pupil to make the same mistake and to make it as many times as the others, not more nor less. And do you ask when will that be? I must say never, never! But now I will grant that the fingers are drilled, then comes the time. The advocates of class-teaching say they can teach the time better in classes. But suppose the pupils are changed from one class to another, and does it not always take sometime for the new comers to accustom themselves to the new class? It is in my opinion an illusion; the pupils are only taught to accustom themselves to each other's playing.

I have had scholars from a neighboring city, who were taught in classes, and so far from understanding the time they did not know one note from another. They follow the leaders, who reap the benefit to the disadvantage of the others. If I could consider it teaching music, when my scholars learn a piece of music, parrot-like, without knowing why and wherefore this or that thing has to be done in a certain manner, or if I could consider my scholars players, when they rattle over a Polka or Schottisch, then I would advocate class-teaching, for I believe a scholar with any sort of musical talent would follow and catch the "tune" without studying the thing itself.

How, I ask, will a teacher impress the right coloring of one of Beethoven's or any other classical composer's compositions upon his pupils in a class? It is preposterous to think of it. But unfortunately too many are considered music teachers who cannot go beyond a Polka or Schottisch.

Lastly I would say to your correspondents in Mississippi, don't make your art the means of filling your pockets. If it rewards you, so much the better. But let your aim be the continual improvement of music. Don't consider a man a musician, who instead of improving, degrades this noble gift to man. Look how many of our illustrious masters died almost penniless, but behold them how their lustre shines in the constellation of the musical firmament, a lustre which will never fade as long as mankind shall be grateful to their benefactors.

I hope, Mr. Editor, to hear from some one else who can do this important subject more justice than I have done, but I could not refrain from condemning an abuse which is being practised upon a credulous public. Yours, etc., E. L. J.

BRADBURY'S PIANO FACTORY.—Our readers recollect that the piano-forte manufactory of Messrs. Light & Bradbury was burned down last December. We are glad to be able to announce that, with characteristic enterprise, they are going again, under full steam, with a new building on the old site, but enlarged nearly three-fold, with all new machinery, and making better instruments even than they did before, as well as making them much faster, and more of them. Warehouse, No. 521 Broome street.

HOOK AT THE PIANO.—One of Hook's extraordinary talents—which amounted in him to almost a genius—was his gift of singing improvised songs on the spur of the moment while under the influence of excited convivial feelings. He would sit down to the piano-forte, and quite unhesitatingly, compose a verse upon every person in the room, full of the most pointed wit, and with the truest rhyme, gathering up, as he proceeded, every incident of the evening, and working up the whole into a brilliant song. He would often, like John Parry, sport with operatic measures, in which he would triumph over every variety of metre and complication of stanza. But John Parry's exhibitions are carefully studied, whereas Hook's happiest effects were spontaneous and unpremeditated. The effect he produced on such occasions was almost marvellous. Sheridan frequently witnessed these exhibitions, and declared that he could not have believed such power possible, had he not witnessed it. Of course, Hook was usually stimulated by wine or punch when he ventured on such exploits; and it is recorded, that during one of his songs, at which Coleridge was present, every pane in the room window was rattled by the glasses flung through them by the guests, the host crowning the bacchanalian riot by demolishing the chandelier with his goblet.

Musical Correspondence.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 14.—With the new Academy of Music, (just being completed,) and the Philharmonic Society, Brooklyn can be set down in your books as a decidedly musical city. May be you knew that before. Well never mind, it is a very pleasant fact to me, for I hope to have the pleasure of sending you much good news in the course of the season. First of all let me speak of the "Philharmonic" with its very perfect orchestra of fifty performers with EISEL as conductor and NOLL as leader. The subscription list is even better than last season's, and the enthusiasm and appreciation above concert pitch. Next Saturday evening comes the first concert of the season at the Athenæum, which very nice hall has been much beautified and improved, making it one of the best concert rooms in the country. The orchestral programme consists of Beethoven's second Symphony, (D major,) Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and Kreutzer's overture "A Night's Sojourn in Granada." The two rehearsals already given were delightfully satisfactory, and the enjoyment increases upon each hearing. So I write this letter before the concert, for fear that your humble servant will be "too full for utterance." Afterwards, FABBRI and STIGELLI and BERGNER (the violincellist,) are to be the soloists, and a delicious programme, with a full house is to be the result.

The Academy of Music will be completed by January. It is a fine building indeed, amply large, although a trifle smaller (and thereby better,) than the New York Academy. The exterior is of pressed brick with sandstone ornamentation, romanesque in style and withal decidedly beautiful. The interior details are everything to be desired. Superb stage, unequalled scenery, machinery, etc. Every seat commands a good view of the stage, and the comfort of the audience has received all attention. At one end of the building and over the vestibule is a cozy concert room, with accommodation for about nine hundred people, which will be a nice arrangement for all sorts of soirées and other good things sure to come. This beautiful room will also make a fine promenade for the entracte on Opera and Philharmonic nights. The fact is, it is a good thing to have an Academy of Music, and the one just spoken of will give a great impetus to musical matters in Brooklyn. The people are on the qui vive for the opening, of which—particulars—when they come. Choir matters are without change, (I believe), excepting at the Church of the Holy Trinity, where the ordinary quartette arrangement has given place to the much better and fuller effect of double chorus, with four solo voices. This is being accomplished by your old friend GEORGE WILLIAM WARREN, who having spent all his life in Albany, and thirteen years (not besides) as organist of St. Paul's Church of that city, accepted a call to "Holy Trinity" last August, and is now a resident here. As your talented and appreciative correspondent — t — (where's Trovator?) renders it unnecessary for me to cross the ferry to supply you with metropolitan musical information, I beg leave to say, that I have nothing more to say—this time. As ever your devoted,

JEM BAGS.

CHICAGO, — The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY of Chicago gave their first concert in Bryan Hall, on Monday Eve. Nov. 19, to a large and one of the most intelligent assemblies ever seen in Chicago. The hall was well filled, though only 200 tickets were issued by the Society; the rest were subscribers. The performances were in every respect satisfactory and realized more than the expectations.

PART I.

1. Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 83..... Beethoven a—Introduction Allegro con brio. b—Larghetto Cantabile. c—Scherzo. d—Finale Allegro molto.

2. Quintette and Chorus, from "Martha"..... Flotow

PART II.

1. Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor"..... Nicolai
2. Sextette, from "Lucia"..... Donizetti
3. Solo for the Violin. (Fantasie dédiée à Paganini) de Beriot Performed by Mr. Emil Weinberg.)

4. Chorus, from Tannhäuser..... Wagner

The perfection of the orchestra, displayed in the performance of the Second Symphony, Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor, and Tannhäuser, was remarkable, considering that this was the first public rehearsal of a new Society, not over six weeks old. The vocal performances are also entitled to much praise, and the violin solo of Mr. Emil Weinberg, a pupil of Spohr, elicited the warmest applause. The next concert will be given December 17th. The following well known gentlemen compose the Board of Directors for the first year.

President, E. J. Tinkham. Vice President, Wm. H. Clark. Secretary, Otto H. Matz. Treasurer, Wm. H. Waite. Librarian, A. De Passio. Conductor, Hans Balatka. Executive Committee, E. F. Stickney, E. W. Smith and A. W. Dohn.

Mr. Otto Dresel's Second Soiree.

1. Choral..... J. S. Bach.
2. Sonata, (29, op. 29.)..... Beethoven.
Allegretto—Scherzo—Minuetto—Finale.
3. Romance, (op. 28.)..... Schumann.
Etude, (24.)..... Chopin.
4. Marcia Funebre..... Chopin.
Intermezzo..... Otto Dresel.
Polonaise, (in A.)..... Chopin.
5. Adagio from 1st Concerto..... Chopin.
Song without words..... Mendelssohn.
6. Three four-part Songs..... Mendelssohn.

There are limitations in human nature. I suppose it is best so, disagreeable as it is sometimes. One of us goes about with a soul all burning with musical enthusiasm; he discriminates correctly, he feels delicately, but his fingers will not work. There is another one. Nothing excites him more than a painting. He has the eye of an artist and he even tries his hand at the brush—but the colors refuse to mingle at his bidding. He fails. There are people that fail in that which they would love best to do. They are the receptive natures, and have to be satisfied with their emotions. Then there are others who have working fingers. Tintinabulation exquisite—but no emotions. So there are painters with a power over color. They obey them, they mingle gorgeously; but the man's picture lacks the essential thing, the poetic feeling, the artistic point of view.

But happy is he who unites them both, the artistic feeling and the artistic mastery of the mechanical. And happy are those that may admire the artistic perfection of his productions.

The Beethoven Sonata in E flat, op. 29, No. 2, bearing the question mark half seriously, half archly at its head, and the sweet smile answering it, was just the proper medium to lead one from the deep devotional, I am almost tempted to say, contrite feeling of the Choral into the glad some fellowship of man. There is this in Mr. DRESSEL's playing, that the ideas of the composer take form under his fingers. You cannot mistake nor the timid, half melancholy question nor the airy, fitting smile, nor the tender, longing sigh, nor the hearty, rollicking fun, when he interprets the master. His rendering is in harmony with the intentions of the composer; he awakens the sleeping Graces and makes them enchant us with their motion. The Choral with its thoughtful entwining of parts, each of which tells its own devotion in its own manner, leads us far from the world without, deep into the secret chambers of our own heart. But the Sonata repeats for us the young days of our happiness. Its feeling is youth, youth with all its brilliant fervor and mystery, the world yet a paradise and hopes blossoming everywhere. How mysterious and in the same breath, how innocently frank and playful are those passages, where in the second part (m 21) the left hand plays the sixteenth b natural, D flat, and c, C against the simple six-eighth notes f, g and e, c of the right hand. How lovely and simple is the Mozartean melody, the counter-theme of the first part. This part is full of the peculiar Beethoven flavor, early though it was written, and though the influence of Haydn and Mozart was still upon the master. Witness the trill in the cadenza at the end of the first part.

Busily trips along the accompaniment to the genial and happy melody of the Scherzo in A flat major. But here we see again the budding genius of the master. Who but he would have contrasted this same lovely melody by those mysterious restive questions, descending staccato to a single repeated tone, as he does in m 9—18? Then, introduced by the Tonic chord, fortissimo, both parts run off staccato in sixths, playing together like a pair of happy children, and closing the part in the same joyous playful manner on the Dominant and Tonic in E flat. There was as much of the waywardness and happy abandon in the rendering as in the piece itself. The Scherzo is written in the happy flow of youthful feeling, when the realities of life have never yet shown their Gorgon heads, withering the glad some forms of sweet innocent fancy. The humorous element, so potent in the latter Scherzos of the master, that mocking at grief, familiar, deep-felt grief, the superiority over it, gained in many a hard struggle within the lonely heart full of longing unsatisfied, appears here in faint touches only, such as for instance m 9—18 quoted above.

Sweetly and gently, an innocent love song—a passage from Paul and Virginie—flows the Minuetto in E flat major along Tenderly and lovingly, expressing a mysterious undefinable feeling of bliss and love, exchange in m 4 and 5 of the Trio, the Diminished Seventh Chords f sharp, a, e flat, and a, c, e flat, g flat, a, with the corresponding Dominant and Tonic chords of E flat in the first and second measures. And innocently, sweetly, with just a shade of deepest tenderness, closes the movement with the Coda. And what shall we say of the Presto—Finale, this embodiment of mirth, rollicking, frolicking, exuberant joy. Horace could not but have this movement in his anticipating mind when he sings in one of his odes, "now is the time to drink, to strike the earth with an easy foot." Many a fair face beamed with delight at the splendid rendering of the careless abandon to joy in the first twelve measures. And many an eye glistened with rapture at the whole-souled romping fun of the passage, measures thirteen and subsequent. The delicacy of touch, the ease of hand with which Mr. Dresel rendered this matchless movement was enchanting. The harmonic change with the surprising reentry of this second motive in G flat major, at the beginning of the second part, the first part closing with the Dominant Seventh in E flat, is again one of those admirable touches of Beethoven's genius.

The close by means of the first phrase is happy, sweet and yet, by a few closing chords, surprisingly strong. Beethoven would have been charmed to hear his work so beautifully played. It was inspiration—and the nicest shading, the warmest coloring marked the rendering of the work.

Why does Mr. Dresel not play one Sonata by Beethoven at every one of his soirées. I am sure the audience would thank him earnestly.

The noble Romanze in F sharp major, by Schuman, is a very good specimen of the deep feeling, the skilful coloring and the strict form in which the composer gives utterance to his musical ideas. The Germans call Romanze a poem, the subject of which is love placed in conflict with some serious adventure. This seems to be the subject of this Romanze. The sweet melody in the form of a duet—how beautiful those faint upper tones of the figuration, repeating it, came in—is built on a groundwork of most solid harmonic texture, in some places full of imitations, in polyphonic treatment, the various parts skilfully being led their own way and yet perfectly chiming in with each other. The tasteful, fresh étude in E flat was followed by that exceedingly happy Valse in A flat, op. 42, played with the same matchless grace and taste as the preceding pieces. We might venture the question, however, was it not somewhat too fast, too nervous? We have to thank Mr. Dresel much for this kind addition to the programme as well as for the Polonaise, likewise by Chopin, played in the second part, before the Spring-song.

It was well that the pause between the two parts lasted as long as it did. The sombre Funeral-March in B flat minor, from the Sonata, op. 35, by Chopin, opened the second part in quite a different strain from the close of the first. It has been heard often, but it loses nothing of the annihilating feeling of despair in the first part. How awfully those Tonic chords in B flat minor, alternating with the Quart-sixth-chord of G flat major, impress one! And then the gigantic rise into D flat major, descending to the corresponding minor key again in repeating the phrase! There is a colossal breath of plan in the march, that makes it an epic of the deepest meaning. The second melody in D flat major, sweet, loving, as an angel's voice, surprisingly relieves one from the fearful grandeur of the first part. The genial Intermezzo by Mr. Dresel, in pure taste, happily led us over to the chivalric Polonaise by Chopin in A major, op. 40. There is a haughty, noble, bold expression in this Polonaise, as of the accepted lover in the fullness of his triumphant joy. Especially marked is this bold, chivalric feeling in the third and fourth parts, the Trio, where even the accompaniment breathes that proud and lofty spirit which is supposed to be preëminently developed in the aristocratic classes of Europe, and especially in the Polish nobility. The absence of all sentimental feeling is noticeable, the piece running on in an uninterrupted current of proud splendor.

The beautiful Adagio from Chopin's first concerto is so well known, both as to its contents and the artistic rendering of the same by Mr. Dresel, that comment seems unnecessary. Very excellent, to allude only to one particular, was the limpid, graceful flow of some swift figurative passages in the middle and toward the end. They appeared like a shower of most fragrant variegated blossoms descending of a delicious evening.

The Spring song never wears out; it is truly one of Mendelssohn's happiest creations. We think the passionate Polonaise in C sharp minor, op. 26, with its sombre hues and more melancholy character formed a most happy contrast to the pieces between which it was placed.

We must not forget to mention the tasteful manner in which Mr. Leonhard entered into the spirit of the composer and the solo performer in his accompaniment to the Adagio from Chopin's concerto. We wish earnestly, this artist, with his enthusiastic striving after the best in his art and his great ability, would give us an opportunity to hear him oftener than he does. Nor ought the Choral to pass unnoticed, in which the voices of Mrs. Harwood, Mrs. Kempton, Messrs. Draper and Langerfeldt mingled sweetly, devotionally. Mrs. Harwood's voice was beautiful and sympathetic as ever and the rich tones of Mrs. Kempton's contralto came in strongly and pleasantly. In the Mendelssohn songs they did not seem so fresh. We noticed in the first soirée that Mrs. Harwood's voice lost of its sweet, sympathetic quality, at the same time when the temperature of the hall was almost insufferable. It may have been from the same cause this time. If the second of the three four-part songs had been omitted, we think the entertainment would have gained. The intonation especially in the tenor was not as pure as in the others, and some of the phrases seemed more hurried and less clear than was desirable. Did the sudden lapse from warm Indian summer time to icy winter in a single afternoon affect them? The Boston climate is very trying to voices.

There is one feature in these soirées, which makes anticipation, enjoyment and remembrance of them equally pleasant, the consciousness that everything in them is in harmony, perfect fitness and artistic taste. Mr. Dresel is surely conferring a great benefit on the musical community by them. And we only regret that we have not more of them.

The public seem to appreciate the character of these exquisite concerts, the hall being completely filled. The third soirée of four takes place to-night.

*†

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY in its advertisement in another column gives the particulars of the terms upon which its concerts will be given. The orchestra will consist of 44 members, larger considerably, it will be perceived, than we have had for many years in Boston, except on special occasions. The expenses of the series have been carefully estimated, and it is absolutely necessary that the number of tickets mentioned, be secured by subscription, in order to give the concerts. The lists are in the music stores, and at such low prices, we shall confidently expect, within a week, to see them filled.

Musical Chat-Chat.

PARIS.—Theatre Imperial de l'Opera Comique. The "Pardon de Ploermel" has been taken up here, with a new Dinorah, Mlle. Montrose, who sang it with great success, making an immense advance in the estimation of the public, being hailed as one of the most brilliant French singers.

The part of Hoël was given to Mlle. Wortheimber, being a change of sex in the part, and it was sustained by her with admirable success. Some changes were made in the score, which were written by Meyerbeer for Madame Nantier-Didée.

At the Grand Opera, The Prophete, Il Trovatore, Lucia and Orfe have been given. Semiramis was to follow. La Traviata had been given with Tedesco.

Vestvali is about to make an operatic tour in the French provinces and in the Hague and at Rotterdam to sing in Romeo and Juliet, Orphée, Favorita and Il Trovatore.

Il Matrimonio has been revived also, with Mlle.

Maria Ralter, Alboni, Penco, Gardoni, Zucchini and Badiali.

Schubert's "Erlking," arranged for the orchestra by Berlioz, has just been published in score and with separate parts. This produced an immense effect when sung by Roger at the festival at Baden, and will be eagerly sought by all singers whose voices are adapted to it.

It is said that the celebrated pianist, Leopold do Meyer, has been struck with paralysis, and it is doubtful whether he will ever be able to appear in concerts again.

Martha is to be brought out with Alboni in the part of Nancy, the other characters being sustained by Mario, Mlle. Ralter and Graziani.

DRESDEN.—We learn that Madame Bürde-Ney will leave this city for New York, where she is to create the part of Dinorah in Le Pardon de Ploermel, so that we are possibly to hear Meyerbeer's great new opera, at last. All over Europe we read accounts of the performance of this great work, all glowing with enthusiasm at its beauties and success. Spohr's Faust is to be revived in the course of the winter.

ROCHESTER.—The Ladies Charitable Society gave a concert November 23, at which a young lady well known in Boston and Cambridge as a very remarkable singer made her first public appearance. The Democrat speaks as follows of her performance:

Miss Greenough has truly a wonderful voice, and she manages it in such a manner as to make it very effective. She has evidently been carefully trained under masters who knew the value of the pupil they were educating. We do not pretend to possess sufficient knowledge of such matters to write an elaborate critique on her style, but we have been present at many concerts and have listened to many celebrated singers, from Jenny Lind down, and in our judgment Miss Greenough might without presumption, aspire to the level of any of them; the incomparable Jenny herself, being excepted. No doubt further cultivation and severe study, would be necessary before this young lady could achieve the very highest rank in the musical profession, but she possesses the material with which to build to the summit of excellence. Indeed, we have heard not a few operatic celebrities whose execution was much inferior to hers. Her manner before an audience is such as to give the impression of great self confidence. It is not that of the amateur. Miss Greenough received several encores and bouquets. Only once did she deign to respond, beyond a momentary reappearance, and then she sang a lively little song in some unknown tongue. We liked it better than any of the more important pieces sung by her, except the final "Salut a la France," which is always a favorite. By special request she sang in the course of the evening, the "Shadow Song," which was much admired.

NEW ORLEANS.—A large and fashionable audience attended the new Opera House, to witness the debut of Madame Borchard, as Leonora, in the Trovatore. The performance not only fully sustained the reputation which this artist had brought with her from Europe, but vastly exceeded the most sanguine expectations. Her voice is a pure soprano, and most remarkable for its extent and amplitude. Her vocalization is exquisite and correct. In presto passages, it vibrates with as much ease, rapidity and evenness as in the less difficult parts. Her method is the style of correctness, and it is not too much to say that her vocal powers are of an order to which our people have not been accustomed since many years. She was received with the wildest enthusiasm and delight, and achieved a triumph of which she may well be proud.—N. O. Courier.

The Albion speaks thus of the Philharmonic concerts and of Schumann:

The next event in the musical world of New York was the first concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place last Saturday evening. The Symphony was Robert Schumann's second. Some people find fault with this composer because, as they say, they cannot comprehend him; I suppose they mean by this remark that they cannot trace a distinct melody—that which is sometimes called the "tune." It is true that a perpetually recurring air does not run through most of his movements, and that there are few passages which the hearer can remember and whistle as he recalls them. Considering this, it is perhaps right to say that Schumann is difficult of comprehension. But yet he seems to me to be rich in meaning. Who does comprehend a composer, except in cases where his idea is so palpably presented that he who runs may read? I have no sympathy with those who would give to a piece of music but one voice, and who dogmatically put into words what they declare to be the master's meaning. Music, from each of its thousand strings, sends a different utterance. To you a particular passage sings of a bright future, and sunshine leaps into your soul; to your next friend the same passage but tells of departed joys, and, while listening, his heavy heart recalls the purple hills and the sweet autumn days receding so rapidly into the past. A third listener hears the voice, and his eye grows bright as a vivid picture of heroic strife is painted on the canvas of his brain; he is the hero of a conflict in which, with thrilling words exciting the ardor of his followers, he battles for the noble right, and hears the soul-lifting, triumphal harmony rewarding his valor. Another, under the same spell, dreams only of Arcady, and hears but the shepherd's pipe in the distance, as he himself talks of love to an ideal nymph at his side. To this man is presented the bracing air of sunrise, the dew of the early morning; to that one comes the softened light of eventide, and the glowing western sky lies in entrancing beauty before him. And yet all these phases of fancy are made to appear by the same succession of musical tones, and it is most probable that not one of them came to the composer's mind, coloring his work. The value of a piece of music to most of you, who, I hope, do not listen to it critically, is in the train of thought, or rather, of reverie which it induces. I say I hope you do not listen to it critically, because I believe that such a manner of hearing robs you of much enjoyment, and destroys the best effect of the feast. That striving to comprehend the composer, as you term it, interferes sadly with your pleasure in most cases, by turning your attention from the fancies of your own intelligent brain, evoked by the sweet concord. At least I think so.

Roger, the distinguished singer at the French opera, whose right arm was shot off by accident last autumn when he was out hunting, was furnished by Van Peeterssen, the renowned maker of artificial limbs, with an arm and hand which were regarded as a miracle of skill and successful ingenuity. But though it was impossible for one who was not in the secret of this substitution to discover that the arm was a supplementary one, the singer could neither extend this arm straight before him, nor could he raise it upwards. Mathieu, another famous manufacturer of artificial limbs, has now contrived for the veteran artist an arm and hand which seemed to have reached the limits of the possible in this line; as, by its aid, every movement required by the needs of ordinary life can be performed with the utmost ease, and in a manner so perfectly resembling the action of a living arm that the illusion is absolutely complete. Instead of obtaining the flexions of the forearm by means of the shoulder acting upon a string of cat-gut, as in former attempts, he has contrived a system of machinery in which the string is attached to the front of the hip opposite to the side from which the arm has been amputated. The movement of the artificial arm is thus due to a slight twisting of the body. In extending the arm, and moving the fingers, the cord by means of which these motions are accomplished is attached to the upper portion of the living arm, and is made to act by a movement of the shoulders. Finally, a third cord, whose function is to give motion to the index of the artificial hand, is attached to the hip on the side from which the arm has been amputated. The result obtained by the changes thus introduced by M. Mathieu into this system of fabrication may thus be summed up: By the aid of artificial arms constructed on the old system, it was possible to execute flexion and rotation of the forearm, and to move the fingers; by the aid of the new system, not only may the arm be bent, and made to assume every variety of position, but the forearm may be fixed at will; and, by means of very simple machinery, at two points of the flexion, rendered sufficiently rigid to permit the wearer to write, use a fork, and perform a host of similar actions.

Robin Hood and English Music.

(From the Illustrated Times.)

Considered as an English opera—that is to say, an opera of which the music is English in style, and not merely adapted to English words—we may say at once that Robin Hood stands alone; for to say that it is the best of its class would be really nothing. Where is its class? What English operas are there of which the music (with the exception of the ballads, which have always the effect of interpolations) belong really to England, as our poetry belongs to it, and by far the greater part of our painting? These ballads all cast in the same mould—of which, in most of our operas, the soprano, the tenor and the bass sing at least two a piece, of two verses each, and the contralto one of similar dimensions—are so far English that they generally suit the English words, and that they are found only in English operas and in those of M. Flotow, who, however, cannot claim to have invented the style. They delay the action; they are tediously alike; they are, therefore, seldom in character with the piece to which they belong, or, to speak with more propriety, in which they are introduced; nor are they written for the theatre, except in so far that the theatre is the advertising-ground of the music-publishers. We do not include in this class such airs as "The Power of Love" in Satanella, or "Flow on" in Lurline, which, besides being beautiful melodies, form essential parts of the operas in which they occur; but every one knows the musical entrées to which we allude, and which are as objectionable in English operas as are the conventional and eternally-repeated side-dishes of which "G. H. M." complains in English dinners. Still our composers are in a curious dilemma. Their operas are to be English, but are not to depend on ballads. They are to be dramatic, but are not to be imitated from the models of Italy, Germany, and France, where the operas most generally admired in Europe (including England) have been produced. That the ballads to which we have referred are English we consider beyond a doubt, or there is an end to nationality in music. Indeed, we could not, help mentioning, in reviewing Mr. Chappell's excellent work, Popular English Music of the Olden Time, how similar in style some of the melodies of Queen Elizabeth's, and even of the preceding reign, were to those produced by our most successful English composers in the present day. The "Bailiff's Daughter of Islington" (second tune), with a more modern accompaniment, would not be unlike some of the ballads of Mr. Macfarren; and, "Oh! the syghes that come from my heart!" (a love song of the time of Henry VIII.), similarly re-arranged, and introduced into one of Mr. Balfe's operas as a solo for the baritone, would pass for one of that composer's happiest inspirations. The music of our English operas is generally imitated more or less from foreign models in the finales, the concerted pieces (except here and there part-songs in the old English style are introduced), and the dramatic portions generally; but the ballads have quite an English character, for we find scarcely anything like them abroad, and specimens which closely resemble them in English Music of the Olden Time.

Mr. Macfarren, however, has given an English style to his work throughout. He was justified in doing this (which Mr. Wallace, for instance, would not have been justified in doing for Lurline) by the nature of his subject, so thoroughly English. But in writing Robin Hood Mr. Macfarren has not founded a national style of operatic music; for the same style applied to subjects not English might be found as inappropriate as the music of The Barber of Seville if adapted to Tom and Jerry. A great deal can be written and very little decided about this question of nationality of style in music. If Auber's style is French (instead of being his own; as we should say), what was that of Ramenu? If "The Marseillaise" is such a thoroughly French air (as every one admits), how is it that it happens to be an importation from Germany? The Royalist song of "Pauvre Jacques" passed for French, but it was Dibdin's "Poor Jack." How is it that "Malbrook" sounds so French, and "We won't go home till morning" so English?—an attempt, by the way, having been made to show that the airs common to both these songs were sung originally by the Spanish Moors. We fancy the great point, after all, is to write good music; and if it be written to good English words, full of English rhythm and cadence, it will, from that fact alone, derive a certain English character. In the meanwhile, Robin Hood is as English as the same composer's May Day and Christmas, and full of beautiful music.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."—N. P. Willis, in a letter to the Home Journal, thus describes the playing of "God Save the Queen," in Grace Church, New York, by Mr. Morgan, the celebrated organist:

The church was empty in a few minutes, all except two or three expectant listeners who lingered in the aisle; and the slow measure of the hymn was first murmured low, like the scarce articulate utterance of a prayer in solitude. With the dimness of the light upon the splendid architecture around, and, with the absolute stillness of the atmosphere, this beginning was most impressively reverential. And then came the few notes of the air, played with massive solemnity and strength—like the chant of a whole army on their knees—impossible to hear without an awe that hushed the breath. And the variations commenced, progressing upward with the exquisite complexities of inspired composition—the original, simple air, dominant throughout—and brain and heart, thus far, keeping pace with the anthem's stately tread. But, how describe the gathering together of all these wonders of sound, these miracles of surprises in harmony, and thundering them forth in one burst of a hallelujah, with the whole power of the player and his instrument! The hush of the deserted building, and the reverberating echoes from the arches of the vaulted roof, probably added to the effect—but I began to feel that strange sense of uncertain foothold upon earth which comes with the overtaking of reason and sympathy. Borne to the limit—where mortal comprehension ceases and angels take up the hymn—and still the instrument went on! I was losing the knowledge of where I was, reeling in an ecstasy of wonder, when the sublime hosanna was suddenly still—ceasing, I scarce knew how. I had a vague sense of an apology to make, for I had jumped up and seized hold of the player's arm in my bewilderment—but, with a moment or two of looking down upon the stillness of the deserted aisles, I felt the calm of the place, and so, with large drops of sweat standing on my forehead, I recovered the knowledge of my whereabouts. I had really been almost wrought up to frenzy with the skill and power of that wonderful music.

Liszt.

From Paris to Vienna in 38 hours via Strassburg. A wonderfully short journey compared to that of ten years since over the same ground, but still wearisome enough. While indulging in a few hours' rest, which such fatigue rendered indispensable, I was this morning, at eight o'clock awoke by the most tremendous storm of pianoforte thunder and lightning that ever disturbed the sleep of a worn-out traveller—a perfect hurricane of harmony—a chaotic mass of sound, in which the music of the past, present, and the future was jumbled together in the most unintelligible confusion. Tarentellas, triumphant marches, scherzos, and allegros seemed to my unaccustomed ear to be commingled without any definite purpose or design, excepting that of making as much noise as the unhappy instrument was capable of producing, according to the rhapsodical mood of the performer. I listened for a time, and then tried to sleep again in vain. I rose and went to the window, which looked out upon the court-yard of this most respectable hotel, "Zur Kaiserin Elisabeth." The domestics were at their usual vocations; the boots was busily employed in polishing the last of at least fifty pairs of shoes; the housemaid was sweeping the room opposite. No one appeared to pay the slightest attention to the tempest which was raging in the apartment on the first floor opposite, of which the window had been opened in order, very probably, to allow the deafening volumes of sound means of escape in safety. Tranquility, under such circumstances, was hopeless. I rang the bell and inquired, more or less indignantly, who was allowed to create such a disturbance at such an early hour to the annoyance of all reasonable people.

"Ich weiss nicht, mein Herr," replies the Stuben-mädchen, "ausser Doctor Liszt wohnt in dem Zimmer gegenüber." Further information was unnecessary. The mystery was solved; the pianoforte thunder and lightning by one word explained. Liszt, and Liszt alone, could have evoked such a torrent of sound from any instrument. It ceased almost as soon as I had learned its origin. The morning rhapsody of the lion-pianist had exhausted itself.

During the day I met Liszt, and had an opportunity of seeing that time has not spared him any less than it has more ordinary mortals. The long lanky hair still falls over the lofty brow; the eagle-eye still glances brightly; but the hair is tinged with grey; the brow is furrowed with wrinkles, and ugly crow's-feet radiate from the eagle eye, somewhat disfiguring the kaiserliches Gesicht of the eminent virtuoso. We talked of England, of which, for some reason or another, Liszt is evidently not very much enamoured. Whether he is disappointed at the cold reception we have given to Wagner, and our want of faith in the music of the future, I know not. It is, however, not improbable, seeing what an energetic disciple he is of the new school. He is as usual travelling en prince, attended by a suite of hangers-on, soi-disant admirers.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson &amp; Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Faithful to thee. Ballad. C. W. Glover. 25

A song of great sweetness, and sure to please all.

Saint's eternal home. Sacred song. Mrs. Harris. 25

A very valuable addition to the small number of good Sacred songs which is published in sheet form.

Te Deum in A. Henry Wilson. 25

A new edition of a sterling composition for which there has sprung up a great demand of late. Episcopal choirs would do well to try it.

The Umbrella Courtship. A. F. Knight. 25

A comic song, which is really first-rate.

Roses bloom in summer only. Stephen Glover. 25

One of Glover's prettiest songs for young misses. Air and accompaniment are easy.

Our flag is there. National song. G. A. Madsen. 25

A new patriotic song with a familiar beginning. The words are new, however, as well as the music.

Instrumental Music.

Ball Reminiscences. (Nebelbilder, No. 2.) Oesten. 25

Notturmo. " " 6.) " 25

New numbers of this excellent set which is rapidly growing into great favor with the teachers. These are beautiful little pieces of music aside from their value as instructive lessons.

Maritana. J. E. Muller. 25

An instructive piece, tolerably easy, on favorite airs from the above opera.

Lucile. Waltz brillante. H. von Benzon. 25

Light of the harem. Waltz. " 25

The Passions. Waltzes. " 25

Pleasing and melodious sets. Good for instruction or amusement.

If, with all your heart. From "Elijah." Arranged by Otto Dreed. 25

A fine arrangement of this beautiful Tenor-air of which pianists will gladly avail themselves, as this vocal gem of Mendelssohn's has so far been out of their reach.

Milanollo March. J. V. Hamm. 25

Composed on two original melodies suggested to the composer by Theresa Milanollo, the celebrated violinist. The march has long been made familiar by our bands.

ROMBERG'S VIOLONCELLO SCHOOL. A complete Theoretical and Practical School for the Violoncello, with Illustrations. By Bernard Romberg. 2,50

This is a standard work by one who is a complete master of the instrument. It is reprinted from the most recent European copy, and having passed through a careful revision in all its parts can be recommended as the most thorough and useful course of study on the violoncello obtainable.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Old Bass Viol.

Have you never heard of good Father Train,
Who schooled so soundly and preached so plain,
And fought the devil with might and main?

Small hire he got, yet he always throve,
For he gave his heart to the trade he drove,
"He taught for a living, and preached for love."

Noble and bold were the words which rung
In council and kirk from his godly tongue,
And noble and bold were the psalms he sung.

Long years hath the veteran's grave been made,
But I prize the altar at which he prayed,
And the old bass viol whereon he played.

It is leaning now by my study door,
And I love its worn face all the more.
That it lightened the burdens a parson bore.

I love to think that far or near,
Though sense be lost to the palsied ear,
There's always a music the soul can hear.

I love to think that early and late,
Though the tongue with melody never can mate,
Some thrill of song in the soul may wait.

It is muffled away in the breast alone,
A gift, mayhap, to the heart unknown,
Till the joys of heaven unfold the tone.

But many, awake on earlier wings,
Will answer in music to all sweet things,
And copy their joy on earthly strings.

And he is one. In his holiest time
He proved the cheer of the viol's chime,
And worshipped the Lord, in psalter rhyme.

So summer and winter came and went,
While the songs and the fates grew kindly blent
Of the man and his chosen instrument:

That when the soul of the saint arose,
His track the soul of the viol chose,
And the music-pulse in his bosom froze.

All stringless, beaten, and bent awry,
Into a garret dark and high,
They flung the poor, dumb prophet by.

There, long, in the curves of its shattered shell,
The spider folded her silken cell,
And the death-watch tapped to his mate, "All's well."

And many a summer the earth-wasp came,
With wings that quivered and flashed like flame,
And glued its nest to the ruined frame.

But for a chance he had slumbered yet,
With the lull of the death-watch's drowsy fret,
And the fly-dirge droned from the spider's net.

I heard where the lorn old wizard lay,
And calling him forth from his nook one day,
I won him back to his ancient play.

I burnished his faded form, and wrung
His writhed joints till the old grew young,
And his grand-toned nerves I newly strung.

Then I healed him many a ghastly hole,
And gave him the grace that time had stole,
And tunelessly back came his aged soul.

By the window I sit when the day-beams wane,
And he leans on my breast and sings his strain,
Till I start at the voice of Father Train.

And I know that, beyond the burial calm,
The saint is leaning with harp and palm,
And joining his old-time viol-psalm.

Watchman and Reflector.

Madame Anna de la Grange has just arrived in Paris. Vestnli is also singing there. Alboni, too, is in Paris, and Tedesco, as we have seen elsewhere, now "fair, fat and forty" at least.

Johanna Kinkel's Eight Letters to a Friend.

ON INSTRUCTION ON THE PIANO.

(Translated by WM. GRAUST, A. M.)

(Concluded.)

VIII.

The keys seem, in a grand tone piece, to be in mutual contest and strife; they are, like many agents of nature that are developing themselves, endeavoring to rise to the light, to assume forms and to live through their piece of universal history. But even the humoristic intrigue of less grand compositions delights us, as it is performed in ever shifting scenes in the most ordinary sonata by the family of keys.

The Tonic's Triad enters, like the lord of the household, in the full consciousness of his dignity; he opens a conversation with his consort Dominant and admonishes to virtue his son Subdominant, and his sweet daughters, the two Mediants. He starts for a journey, and Mrs. Dominant is pleased to put on the unmentionables in his absence; i. e., to vindicate to herself the subsemitonium, whereby, at the end of the first strain the illusion becomes so complete that everybody thinks the Dominant was the "Lord" of the House.

But the putative Tonic badly knows how to maintain her lordship. The children rebel at the very outset of the second part; Subdominant boldly invites his befriended neighbors and their headlong revels made the house topsy-turvy. All kinds of amorous Sevenths approach from afar and near, swarming around the Mediants. Dominant vainly strives to maintain order; at last she summons, with a prolonged outcry, the father to return. If we did not know in the middle phrase who was the master and who the servant, all doubts are disappearing now, when genuine Tonic-Triad reenters the house with his inherited legitimacy. All other triads seem now to lay excuses for the past at their lord's feet who cheerfully pardons them, assigns them their proper places and brilliantly ends his glorious career in a final chord with which the most malevolent can not find fault.

There was, some decades since, an epoch of piano-composition, representatives of which lavished their best powers on secondary things. The substance of a music-piece, of sometimes great beauty, was enveloped in a conglomeration of arabesque-like tinselly passages, disfiguring, hoop-skirt like, the natural form. A normal piano concerto of that time lasts about three-quarters of an hour; it contains—if we sum up the customary cantilene passages in the first part, the adagio and the rondo—five melodies, each of about 16 measures; all the rest are runs and skips, the continuation of those few melodies being left to the accompanying instruments. Variety of difficult manipulations for the fingers was most valued, they had to be executed in the quickest tempo and were always rewarded by the loud applause of the listeners.

The virtuosi now developed the fingers at the expense of the mind; they sacrificed to their vanity their artistic conscience and appeared solely with such pieces in public whose practice cost many months of life to the very skilfullest. The lover of art, though evincing a momentary delight while listening to such a piece performed with grace and skill, could still not dissemble that nothing truly beautiful was obtained by its difficulties, that they rather tended to fill the public with stupid wonder.

This has passed away; the difficult now endeavors to serve at least a highly artistic purpose although the old abuse has not yet been done entirely away with. Most of our recent piano compositions require, above all, a nice and expressive execution; mechanical difficulties have pretty much been pressed into the background, nor is this prevalent idea weakened by incessant repetitions and variations; we are rather inclined to object to their concise brevity.

The first impulse to this change was given by Felix Mendelssohn, in his popular Songs without Words; they stand in the same relation to the former piano-concerto as the simple song does to the pretentious bravura-air. Their contents are the outpouring of the soul, called forth by its cheerful or melancholy disposition, or by a landscape, hunt, water-trip, &c. Some definite kinds, although differently conceived and executed, may be found in each volume. Thus, for example, No. I. is always a solemn melody in very soft modulations, soaring above a somewhat livelier arpeggio-movement, expressive of the soft longings of unuttered love, or of sweet repose. A song of painful complaint follows or a wild rider's song, where we hear in the dark forest the roaring of storm and rain accompanying the horse's clatter and the lonely fellow's defying song. The unimpassioned melody of religious fervor or still resignation to a supreme rule is not less traceable in several of these songs. It is not exactly a chorale or of customary ecclesiastical style, but the sanctity and dignity of the chords and rhythms is thoroughly permeated by the breath of prayer.

The Venetian gondola-air is represented a few times in an equally successful manner. Most beautifully did Mendelssohn conjure up the charm of the starry night by the choice of keys and the position of the chords. Whoever observes the first two measures, cannot doubt that no picture of clear daylight will be unrolled here. Dark shadows are shrouding us in deeper and deeper hues, a peculiar moist glitter rises forth from the bass chords, as if we were looking down into the green sea; now come in quiet measure the beats of the oars around which is playing an undulating accompaniment; little staccato progressions in thirds resound fallaciously; the guitar tones that accompany the two-part melancholy and slow song soaring from out the inner room of the gondola far away over the lagoons.

In song No. III. in the first vol., in the cheerful green key of A major, brings before our imagination a hunting-picture in its freshest vigor and elegance. The sounds of the horns invite to the dark forest, horses galloping and waving plumes of knightly forms fly past; harmony paints the tarrying, seeking, wandering to and fro, and, finally, the finding of the track. All exult; down they rush through the thicket where the entangled twigs clamorously open and close. A last rustling in the foliage, a dying sound far-off, and the most elegant whispering roudade, like a whirled dust cloudlet, shuts the scene with a few tones, as if all had been a dream.

The song No. IV. in the 2d. vol. depicts the silent wandering along a murmuring brook. The playing figure of the bass glides away like crystal-clear waves over rare pebbles. The final passage, developing itself from this base and arising with sweetest elegance, resembles the evening breeze whirling up in its flight some apple-blossoms and showering them upon the wanderer's path.

A duet between bass and upper voice is added to these songs without words: it is, of course, a tender duet. It is regarded as one of the finest numbers of the collection, and certainly justly so although it does not, owing to its definitely circumscribed form, admit of imaginative explanation, like many others.

Another one having the character of popular song is much praised by the dilettante, but it somewhat offends the refined ear by the doublings of its octave-runings which, in fact, reflect the popular song in its peculiarity.

No. II. of the 5th vol. is a sort of triumphal song sounding forcibly like a song of liberty. It is well that pure tone-language is a Sanscrit for the German police, or else they would forbid its rhythm. There is in it a chain-crushing power, buoyant, carrying off and electrifying the listener. It looks as if the pangs of those times had fled into the harmless piano and sought there a vent, when speech was silenced. Tone-art is so magic that each epoch hears or lays in it its most urgent wants.

FREDERIC CHOPIN, a Pole by birth, has as great a share in the reform of piano-music in general, as Mendelssohn. While Mendelssohn's fine understanding and highly refined taste extinguished or bent into right shape the excrescences of the previous period, simplified its forms spiritualized its contents, but, on the whole, built on the existing ground, Chopin's geniality broke hitherto unknown roads into the romantic dawn of most wonderful harmonies. His music stands beside that of Mendelssohn like fairy tales beside History. It is not as healthy, nor as true and sensible, but possesses for all that the warm spell and awe of the fairy tale.

It would not be impossible to make even a connoisseur believe that a Mendelssohnian melody, if he hears it for the first time, was one of Mozart or Beethoven yet unknown to him; because Mendelssohn is, with all his originality, nearly related to these great masters. Chopin's melodies, on the other hand, are unheard of, none similar has been invented previous to them. Thus it happened that, when he first appeared, almost all persons of more than 40 years hated him, and found him to be quite incomprehensible, while the youth was quite enthusiastic in his favor.

If we investigate the cause of the indescribable awe and delight with which Chopin fills us, we arrive at a solution that might to many a one appear fabulous: Chopin wants to redeem the quarter-tones looming up now gloomily like shadowy forms between the unharmonic invasions.

In order to justify this view, we must look back a little in the history of music. In the earliest centuries of the Christian era, when not the ear, but mathematical calculation decided which intervals must sound well or badly, the part-phrases progressed in fifths and octaves; for thirds were regarded as intolerable dissonances. The very progression of harmony, which we feel to be the most shocking, was then considered the only right one. The human ear was not yet sufficiently refined to distinguish nearer harmonies. The fifth, perhaps even the fourth, were just distant enough; but the minor third (this insinuating, voluptuous favorite of our ear) produced probably the same impression as does to us the minor second, or the simultaneous touch of C and C sharp.

If we imagine now the adoption of quarter-tones into our system of intervals, the second would perhaps, become for us henceforth the same that third is to us now. Any one cognizant of the history of music will recollect the revolution called forth by the first introduction of the third and the ensuing fall of the old musical system and the entire structure of our present. It required a long time, until it was recognized as euphonious. To it we owe now the series of most beautiful harmonies that since centuries ever surpassing one another refreshed our souls. But it would sometimes appear as if the source were exhausted; the recent melodies sound more and more like imitations or superficial changes of old ones and the ear sighs for something new, unheard of.

Emancipate the quarter tones and you have a new world of tones!

But to us, accustomed as we are, to the long standing division in half tones, the innovation will sound shockingly and like a mere noise of dissonances; the next or third generation, known having taken in the strange sound with their mother milk, will perhaps greet in them a fresh, doubly rich art.

It is at this mysterious door that Chopin seems to knock; his melodies glide restlessly through the half tones, as if seeking nicer, more spiritualized nuances than the existing would offer to his intentions. This door being once burst open we have come a step nearer to the eternal sounds of nature; for why are we unable faithfully to set in tones and only feebly to imitate the æolian harp, the rustling of the forest, the bewitching tones of the water? because our so-called whole and half tones are scattered too clumsily and gapingly, while Nature possesses not only quarter and eighth tones, but also an infinite scale hardly to be dissected in tone-atoms!*

A nocturno of Chopin seems as if it were striving to call forth that mood which breathes around us in deepest loneliest midnight when standing listening upon a lofty open spot, and when all the whispering sounds awaken that are at all other times smothered by the noise of the day. Then there is a flowing down from the stars, or rising up from the valley bottoms, a blending together to something hardly audible, No fluttering, no sounding fills the wide atmosphere; but it is there

[It strikes me, as if this remarkable and beautifully true idea had never been pointed out so enthusiastically as here.—Tn.]

that music of the night for which there is no name—none can deny it, who ever listened to it.

Chopin has expressed, as has no other composer, the "Weltschmerz" and wretchedness of the youth of his times. He poured out ironically these sentiments in his numerous mazourkas which borrow nothing of dances but the name and the 3-4 time.

The public at large prefers to Chopin's compositions those of Thalberg, on account of their brilliancy and easier comprehension, as they exact more from the performer's fingers than from the listener's thought. They are without mind, but full of gace and betray less invention than skillful elaboration. The light and gay element of South-German, more properly of Viennese elegance and enjoyment of life is reflected in them. They are excellent salon compositions and as such hardly as yet surpassed.

Midway between Thalberg and Chopin stands Adolph Henselt, more solid than the former, less genial than the latter, but combining a small share of the excellencies of each. He describes, like Chopin, scenes of nature, not her awful enigmatic spell, but only the glittering, superficial form. He adds, from an inexhausted depth of most painful feelings, the poisoned arrow, and shows us, at the highest, only a clear drop of blood upon a snow-white bosom. His rocket-passages are not as glistening as Thalberg's, but they rest upon a more elaborate harmonic basis.

One peculiarity of Henselt (imitated by many) are the strange keys exorbitantly laden with sharps and flats, in consequence of which it cannot be denied that many an ordinary idea appears more original than it indeed is. This oddity renders many a popular piece necessarily difficult for dilettante. One should, indeed, not abuse for every trifle the holy D flat major, the tragic A flat, of E flat minor, and the purple-clad F sharp major; this frivolity deprives these keys gradually of their nimbus; they became common like G and D, and the composers are robbed of them as the most convenient means for apparitions and grand effects. Many are thus already accustomed to consider, in the first moment, as poor and shallow, a really respectable composition appearing in a simple key and claiming favor only by its inner substance. It is a similar want of taste to that met with frequently in exhibitions of Art. Nearly all landscapes shine in golden evening tints or receive a shattered light through the fissures of a thunder-cloud. If you look upon an excellent composition beside them, with a natural green in healthy day-light, the eye requires a long time till it finds out that this is genuine truth and that the others were only dazzling pictures.

Beethoven's grander piano-sonatas, which stand out unique and incomparable and do not belong to any particular epoch or fashion, ought to be the last study of an accomplished performer, to be undertaken only when he can give an account to himself of their intrinsic spirit.

A new Music Hall in New Haven was opened for the first time last week. It is one of the largest halls in New England; is 81 by 122 feet, and 35 feet from floor to ceiling; seats 2,500 people; has about 300 gas-burners, and these are lighted all at once, by an electric battery—the vast hall being illuminated at a single flash.—Daily Times.

Grétry.

We have now reached the work which I consider the chief among all that Grétry produced, Richard Cœur de Lion, the words of which were written by Sédaine. He attained in this score the highest degree of pathos. I have no intention of entering into a detailed analysis of this work. The compass I desire to give this notice will not allow of it, and moreover, all the airs are familiar to the ears of the teacher. It is impossible, however, not to mention the frank joyousness of the peasants in the chorus—

"Sala-tu que c'est demain, Que le vieux, Mathurin."

as well as the following motet, the couplet of Antonio—

"La danse n'est pas ce que j'aime."

What grace, too, there is in the air of Laurette!—

"Je crains de lui parler la nuit."

Does not a vein of delicate and good-tempered irony pervade the verses of Blondel?—

"Un bandeau couvre les yeux."

But the romanza "Une fièvre brûlante," has justly become the most celebrated piece in the score. It is a noble and simple air, of a touching character, and more elevated style than the common run of Grétry's writings. Mozart need not have disowned it.

Grétry excels, however, more especially in pieces of a simple and rustic character. He is quite at home in depicting a village festival. In support of this assertion, I will cite the couplets of the peasantry—"Et zig, et zig"—at the commencement of his career. He sought in preference to all others such subjects as make little demand for orchestral display—a simple song in 2-4, or more frequently in 6-8, accompanied by violins, hautbois, and basses, and the effect was produced. Subsequently, when he grew jealous of the renown of Cherubini and Méhul, he attempted to stimulate these masters, and failed. He was wrong to attempt the treatment of subjects of too high a flight for his manner. Pierre le Grand (1790), Guillaume Tell (1791), are far from having enhanced his glory. He had overweighted his talents, and grace deserted him.

The success of Richard Cœur de Lion was immense, and Grétry had composed it with great rapidity. The following stanza was accordingly written on the occasion:—

"Ceux-là font bien, ceux-là font vite,
Le plus grand nombre ne fait rien;
Mais Grétry seul à le mérite
De faire beaucoup, vite, et bien."

At the close of the first performance the authors were called for, and Grétry alone appeared.

The art of stage decoration had made notable progress at this time—a progress due in great part to Mlle. Clairon. Philippe, who, like Trial, Laruelle, and Dugazon, has bequeathed his name as the habitual designation of the class of characters played by him, filled the part of Richard. He appeared on the first night wearing the Order of the Garter—an anachronism which was corrected at the second performance.

Richard Cœur de Lion was played in England; two managers produced it simultaneously. The manager of Covent Garden, wishing to outshine his rival, took it into his head to remodel the French work, and introduced other music into it by Anfossi, Bertoni, David Rizzio, Duni, Zucchini, &c. The entire conglomeration was hissed, including what had been preserved of the original score. The Drury Lane manager, better advised than his compeer, had contented himself with a literal translation of Sédaine; the music was adapted to the English version without any alteration whatever, and the work was in the highest degree successful.

On the 25th of January, 1785, Grétry produced Panurge dans l'île des Lanternes, the words by Morel;* and on the 16th of January, 1786, Les Méprises par Ressemblance, in three acts, the words being by Patrat; on the 8th of February the Comte d'Albert, in two acts; and the sequel of the Comte d'Albert (by Sédaine), which was performed at Fontainebleau, November 12th, 1786, and at Paris in 1787. These works added nothing to the reputation of Grétry, which had been raised to its pinnacle by Richard Cœur de Lion. Le Prisonnier Anglais, produced December 26th, 1787, failed with signal approbrium. The composer revised this work in concert with the librettist Desfontaines, and it reappeared, in 1793, under the title of Clarice et Belton. I may also mention, by way of note, Le Rival Confident, a comedy in two acts, played June 26th, 1788, which preceded by some days Amphytrion, a grand opera. To the same purpose I will add the names of La Rencontre Imprévue, *Morel was the author of La Caravane, in which he is said to have been assisted by Louis XVI.

May 1st, 1790, from which the air of La Sonnette has survived; Anacréon chez Polystrate, 1797; Lisbeth, 1792; Élica, 1799. All these were deficient in the simplicity which characterized the early works of Grétry, without possessing the brilliancy of the more modern works. They appeared feeble, and not without reason, to a public whose musical knowledge had made progress, and who would no longer content themselves with a feeble and colorless orchestration.

At the close of Grétry's career, however, he no longer paid any intention to this important department of his art, and after having written the melody, he left the task of writing the accompaniments to some of his friends. "The orchestral part of his last twenty operas," says M. Fétis, "were written by M. Panzeron, the elder."

Zénire et Azor, Le Tableau Parlant, L'Epreuve Villageoise, &c., which the Republic had banished from the stage, "as failing to present examples of ardent patriotism and fiery love of liberty and equality," were revived under the Empire, with enthusiasm, by Elleviou, of whom I shall frequently have occasion to speak.

It is related, that leaving the theatre after a performance of Zénire et Azor, Napoleon encountered and remarked an old man who was bowing to him with pertinacity. "What is your name?" said the Emperor, a little abruptly. "Still Grétry, Sire." "And why do you not compose any more?" "When the nightingale grows old he hides himself, and sings no more." "You are not like him," replied Napoleon; "for your music is of the kind which will be always sung."

The next day Grétry received a diploma of knighthood in the Legion of Honor, and a pension of 400*fr.* a year.

Grétry was sadly afflicted in his private life. He had had three daughters, Jenny, Lucile, and Antoinette. Jenny had a charming voice, but died at the age of sixteen, just as she was beginning to profit by the lessons which her father had given her. Lucile seemed destined to a brilliant career. At an early age she displayed a taste for composition. Sédaine wrote for her Le Mariage d'Antonio, a sequel to Richard Cœur de Lion. This work was played July 29th, 1786. In his Essais sur la Musique, Grétry relates with affection how he assisted his daughter in the composition of this work, and directed her efforts without her knowledge. "Remark," he says, in another place, "the little bravura air in Le Mariage d'Antonio. Pergolesi would not have been ashamed of it. There is not in this air any more luxuriance than is needful, and becomes the young village girl who sings it." And further, on referring to the manner in which his daughter wrote it:—"She wept," he said, "sang, played her harp with incredible energy." She also wrote a little opera called Lucile et Antoinette, and died two years afterwards. She had been forced out of vanity to marry a rich banker, who rendered her life miserable for the short time it lasted after her marriage.

Antoinette, the third, was betrothed to Bouilly, the author of Guillaume Tell, better known through his tales than his dramatic works. The poor betrothed one joined her sisters in heaven ere the marriage was celebrated.

The wretched father, profoundly afflicted by the loss of the beings who were most dear to him in the world, and also not a little wounded, no doubt, to find success deserting him to wait on other composers, withdrew to Montmorency, in Rousseau's hermitage, which he had purchased. From time to time he appeared for a short period in Paris; but his visits, instead of cheering him, added to his melancholy. Abandoning music for philosophy, he wrote a book, entitled De la Vérité. He died at Montmorency, November 24th, 1813. To complete the list of his works I have only to mention:—Le Jugement de Midas (1778), Andronache (1780), Emilie (1781), Raoul Barbe-bleu (1785), Basile (1792), Joseph Barbra (1794), Denys le Tyran (1794), Le Barbier du Village (1797), Le Casque et les Colombes (1801), Delphis et Mopsus (1803).—London Musical World, November 10.

†It is a fact that Grétry's opera suffered neglect under the influence of the prevailing revolutionary sentiments, which required music more exalted in expression, and the works of Leueur Méhul, Cherubini, Bertoni, &c., threw those of Grétry for the time being into the shade. But a brilliant reaction took place when Elleviou took possession under the Empire of the part of Blondel in Richard Cœur de Lion, to which he added Zénire et Azor, L'Ami de la Maison, and Le Tableau Parlant. The success of these works rose even higher still on the advent of Mad. Boulangier in 1811. Then came Ponchard, who added still more to Grétry's restored glory, devoting to his music the fruits of his instruction in the excellent school of Garat.

A statue of Weber was to have been inaugurated at Dresden, Oct. 11. A cantata by Rietz, words by Kühne, was to be performed by Royal Chapel, and the vocal and instrumental societies of Dresden.

The Sisters Marchisio.

The new celebrities of song, Milles. Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, who recently came out at the Grand Opera of Paris, in Semiramis, with such brilliant success—were born at Turin, and are derived from a family of distinguished artists, which included musicians of great ability. One brother, Antonio Marchisio, was a composer of note, and Joseph, a pianist of the first class. From their earliest years both sisters manifested an extraordinary aptitude for music, and this was encouraged by both brothers, who did all in their power to develop their talent to its fullest extent. Antonio gave them all the instruction he was enabled to do, and when he and Joseph discovered that both Carlotta and Barbara in their extreme girlhood had beautiful voices, they placed them under the most efficient singing-masters. Their progress was remarkable. In a brief space of time they became the vocal wonder of their native place, and were sought for with the utmost eagerness at the mansions of the aristocratic and wealthy. After restricting their performances for several years to the concert-room and private parties, the sisters were at last induced to try the stage, and here a new career of honor and prosperity opened for them. They visited the chief cities of Italy and Spain, and sang at all the principal theatres, including the Scala at Naples, the Fenice at Venice, the first operas at Rome, Turin, Trieste, &c. Fame crowned them wherever they appeared. Their singing was the admiration of all who heard them, and their reputation spread far and wide. More especially were their ensemble performances the theme of wonder and delight. Nothing so perfect, so harmoniously blended, it was said, had been remembered in duct singing. Moreover, they were mistresses of all styles of singing—as capable in florid as in plain music—in the classical as the romantic—in Mozart and Rossini as in Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Verdi. They performed in all kinds of operas, and their reputation gained ground with every successive representation. Rumor was not slow in wafting their names to the French capital, and the manager of the Grand Opera, having had additional information of a private nature respecting the merits of the fair artists, at once engaged them to play the two principal characters in the French version of Rossini's Semiramis, then about to be produced. Indeed it is doubtful if the opera would have been brought out but for the sisters Marchisio, whose Assyrian Queen and Arsace respectively, were highly eulogized by the leading authorities of the Parisian press, and received by the public with acclamations.—London Musical World, November 3.

"DIXIE" AT THE THEATRE—A FUNNY SCENE.

—We take it for granted that everybody recognizes the existence of a peculiar song and air known as "Dixie," since it is sung, whistled, and played by brass bands without limit, and at all times and places; but what its meaning was, or who originated it, would puzzle a philosopher to tell. The air seems to infatuate the ear, and is now practised from one end of the Union to the other, with various variations, and always with enthusiastic effect. A few evenings ago, the orchestra of the St. Louis Theatre was good enough to favor the audience with "Dixie," and came very near ruining the drama in that locality by so doing. The assembled sovereigns hushed themselves into breathless silence at the first bar, and sat spell-bound as the last notes squeaked in their ears. The curtain rose, and an actor stepped forth to commence the play; but in an instant the whole house was in an uproar, and "Dixie!" was thundered by a hundred patrons of high old art. In vain the actor tried to make himself heard; "Dixie!" was the cry, and the orchestral artists began to handle their instruments in a very nervous manner. Finally the actor retreated furiously from the stage, and the venerable manager appeared in a flaming passion. "Gentlemen, what means this ill-mannered confusion? What do you want?" he asked in a rage. "Dixie!" was the everlasting response from pit, boxes, and tiers. "Well, you can't have it!" thundered the old man, furiously. "You've had 'Dixie' once to night, and you'll have 'Dixie' no more." Like a ruffled red rooster, the outraged old boy stalked away behind the scenes—and once more the actor marched on; but his appearance was the signal for an uproar worthy of Pandemonium, above which the general roar for "Dixie" swelled with appalling force. The stage folks saw that it was useless to resist the popular will. Music had beaten the Drama on its own ground. Tinkle went the prompter's bell—down swept the curtain with indignation in its rustle, and again was "Dixie" poured forth in bewitching strains by the orchestra. The audience heard it through with silent, but very visible delight, gave the poor musicians three hearty cheers at its conclusion, and then suffered the play to proceed. Who shall deny, after this, that "Music hath charms?"—N. O. Delta.

NEW ZEALAND.—"Handel's oratorio, Israel in Egypt," writes the New Zealander of August 1st, "was performed by the Auckland Choral Society on Thursday, 5th ult.—and this time without interruption from fire or other casualty. The instrumental portion of the orchestra was weakened by the departure of the band of the 65th for Taranaki, and had to consist entirely of stringed instruments. The chorus was very numerous and on the whole well balanced. The massive double choruses were given with great precision and vigor; and the same remark applies to the rendering of the chorus as a whole. Mrs. Corlett again rendered valuable assistance in the solos for soprano, and the Misses Hampton acquitted themselves very creditably in the solo and duet pieces in which they took part. The solos and recitatives for male voices were sung by Mr. Reid, Mr. Leech, Mr. Ely, and Mr. Strauch; and the well-known duet, 'The Lord is a Man of War,' was sung by Messrs. Strauch and Carleton. Taken as a whole the performance was a very successful one, and shows that the Society is not relaxing in its efforts at continued advancement in the practice and performance of the highest order of musical composition. Captain Balneavis led, Mr. Fleetwood presided at the piano, and Mr. J. Brown conducted. The attendance was very large, and the want of hall-stewards was much felt."—London Musical World, November 3.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, NOV. 10.—To-morrow makes four weeks that I have been here, during which time I have endeavored to collect the statistics of music publicly performed, with an honest desire to be able to compare this city with Berlin, Vienna and other German capitals, as affording opportunities to hear performances, fitted to awaken and improve a musical taste. So far as a file of daily papers affords the means of coming to a conclusion, aided by the street placards, I think the following abstract may be held to be correct. Symphonies, none, Oratorio music, none, Quartet, Quintet and other chamber music, none, public performances by distinguished artists, none. There has been one performance of music for men's voices, not by the Orpheus, whom Dwight heard, but of similar kind. Beyond this and the common Musard dance, potpourri, &c., music, I know of nothing but the Church music on Sundays, and the theatres. Of the last here is an abstract of what they have produced—nearly, if not quite complete.

At the Grand Opera, (French,) The Prophet, Halevy's Jewess, Semiramis, Trovatore, have occupied most of the evenings, the two former being most often given. Tedesco is the Fides in the Prophet, which was given for the two hundred and thirty-eighth time, November 15th.

At the Italian Opera, with Mario, Alboni, Graziani, &c., I note the following works: Ernani, Cimarosa's exquisite Il Matrimonio Segreto, Rossini's Barber, Rigoletto, Traviata. Verdi, on the whole carrying the day.

At the Opera Comique, Ma Tantedort (music by Caspers, who is he?) Le petit Chaperon rouge, (Boieldieu), Fra Diavolo, Le Docteur Mirobolan, Le Caid, Le Rendezvous bourgeois, Maitre Pathelin, a Cle' des Champs, Le Pardon de Ploermel, Les Deux Gentilhommes, Joconde, Bon soir M. Pantalon, Les Diamants de la Couronne, La part du Diable, La chien du Jardinier. I am not sure that these are all, but sufficient to show that the public here delights in and will support those short, light operas and operettas, which I think among the most enjoyable things in music, of which they perform two or three in one evening, and which might be so easily introduced upon the stage of the Boston Museum, and with success, I verily believe.

At the Theatre Lyrique, Le Val d'Andorre, (Halevy), L'Auberge des Ardennes, Si j'étais Roi, Les Rosieres, Les Dragons de Villars, Orpheus (Gluck, with Mad. Viardot as Orpheus,) Crispin rival de son maitre, Les Valets de Gascogne. Of these in several cases, two have been performed upon the same evening. The Val d'Andorre has already run some twenty evenings, and the Orpheus seems destined to have a similar success.

At the Palais Royal they give three or four vaudevilles of an evening, whose name is legion and which are much like the old English so-called operas, being mostly dialogue with songs interspersed. The revival of the Orpheus at the Lyrique has brought out another burlesque there with the title "J'ai perdu mon Eurydice."

I say another burlesque, for such was the origin of the "Orphée aux Enfers" with the exquisite music of Offenbach, at the Bouffes Parisiennes, which is to be withdrawn within a few days, having already reached its two hundred and ninety-eight representation!

ST. LOUIS, NOV. 22.—We once took a young lady to whom we were "devotedly attached" to the opera. She liked music, so did we, though sometimes we prefer to change the key "from long metre and short metre to meet her by moonlight." Overcome by the ravishing allurements of the opera, she exclaimed, "How well music does go with singing."

We were not particularly impressed with the remark then, but fully realized its truthfulness, when attending the second concert ever given by our Philharmonic Society on Wednesday evening. A word about its formation.

The St. Louis Philharmonic Society was formed "to advance the study and promote the progress of music in St. Louis, and to encourage the reunion and social intercourse of the lovers of music in our city." There are three classes of members, life members, subscribing members, and performing or active members. The subscribing members pay fifty dollars each. There are now one hundred and three, and only in its second month. These one hundred and three men, represent over twenty-five millions of dollars of this city. Every concert increases the members. They will spend every cent gained this year, over five thousand dollars. The tickets for the concerts are never sold, any member selling or disposing of a ticket for gain, forfeits his membership. The performing members number one hundred and ten. They each pay five dollars per year. The musical year consists of eight months from September till May, one concert to be given every month, and the tickets distributed regularly among the members, as many tickets in all being given as there are seats. These concerts are given in our finest hall, and are attended by the finest audiences St. Louis can boast of.

Their leader, Mr. EDWARD SOBELESKI, has a better European than American reputation. A better musician never was west of the Mississippi river, as he can both lead the orchestra and the vocal score. His office and the librarian's are salaried. Of course some of the orchestra are hired, there being no amateur player on the clarinet, horn, &c. They have two rehearsals every week, and the leader gives two extra ones besides, and in addition to all this the leader devotes three hours every day to instructing members not well up in their parts. The rehearsal rooms are the finest for the purpose I ever saw. The first concert was a complete success. The programme being mainly classical music.

The society is regularly organized, having a Board of thirteen Directors, and all other regular officers. James E. Yeatman, President; Charles Balmer, Esq., Vice President; John J. Anderson, Esq., Treasurer; George W. Parker, Recording Secretary, &c. I enclose you a Constitution, &c. No active member admitted without a thorough examination. All officers are publicly nominated at least one week before election, and no member can perform publicly at any concert, soirée, &c., as a member of the Society, or use the Society's name.

The second concert of the Society was given on Wednesday evening, 21st inst., to an audience of over two thousand. I append a programme. Every thing went off as well as the most ardent friends of the society could wish.

PART I.

1. Overture, "The Elopement,".....Mozart
2. Chorus, "Blessed is the Lord," from the Oratorio of Elijah.....Mendelssohn Bartholdy
3. Trio for Soprano, Tenor and Bass, from Fidelio.....Beethoven
4. Symphonie in D, first part.....Beethoven
5. Sextette, "Chi mi frena," from Lucia di Lammermoor.....Donizetti

PART II.

1. Overture, "Der Freischütz,".....C. M. v. Weber
2. Double Chorus from Antigone, for Male Voices.....Mendelssohn Bartholdy
3. Flute Solo, "Air Allemand".....Boehm
4. Cavatina, "In tears I pine," from "I Lombardi".....Verdi
5. Solo and Chorus, "Inflammatus est," from Stabat Mater.....Rossini

The Society are determined to cultivate a taste for classical music. The Symphony of Beethoven and Chorus from Antigone, sung by over one hundred and twenty voices were especially fine. As might be expected many could not understand it. One young lady near me, remarked after the symphony was played, "Well, ain't that funny music?" Just so, it was funny to some, but we hope it will not be long.

We would like to make particular mention of the soloists, and of some other things, but somehow no matter how kindly a thing is said, some one is offended. If you criticise they are offended, if you praise they are offended, because some one else is praised more, and so it goes. The writer of that article in the Musical World and Times, from Cincinnati, Ohio, just hit this city too. We have no musical critic in this city at all connected with any paper. It is only a "local" and the motto "cut it short" and praise home talent or "advertising talent." They contract for advertising and so many lines of "notice," and so it goes, and so it always has gone, and will go, I suppose. The Society give their next concert next month.

I can not close without adverting to our system of music in the Public Schools. The "Board" and Superintendent are doing all they can to make music an indispensable branch. The Superintendent is earnestly striving to promote this necessary end. The greatest obstacle is the people who refuse to vote supplies. They see no necessity for buying aught but chalk and black boards, entirely ignoring the ennobling influences of music. But of that more anon.

PHIL.

HARTFORD, CONN., Dec. 3.—Nothing of any great musical importance of late, excepting the concert of the "BOSTON GERMANIA BAND," and that of Miss LUCY J. RAMSEY, of Middletown, Conn.; both of which "drew large houses," and sent the people away highly delighted. This was the first appearance of Miss Ramsey in Hartford, as a public singer, although a native of Hartford, and I am happy to state that she made a most decided "hit" with her voice, execution and manner; in fact, I can recall no singer since Mad. BISCACCANTI appeared in Hartford, who has won the sympathies and hearty approbation of our entire audience, as did Miss Ramsey the other evening. Possessing a voice of great natural purity of tone, she has been a favorite pupil during the past year of the well-known teacher, Signor RIVARDE, of New York, in which time she has made immense improvement in style and execution. Her renderings of "Ah! non credea," and "Vana, vana!" from Meyerbeer, were highly successful and brought out rounds of applause. The old saying, "A prophet, &c.," can hardly apply in this instance to Miss Ramsey, for she has certainly made herself "known" and appreciated in her "own country," and should she again appear in this her native city in concert, I can assure her, she will be greeted with an overflowing house and scores of admirers. May much success attend her! Our favorite organist, Mr. GEO. E. WHITING, is about to leave us, I am sorry to say, to take up his residence in Boston, I am happy to say. He has secured to himself many friends during his two years' residence in Hartford, and goes away with the regrets and many kind wishes of numerous admirers. I trust that his uncommon talents as a fine musician, as well as a remarkable performer, will be fully appreciated in your critical city. Look out for him!

Quite refreshing and "like old times" to see once again the signature of "Dash t Dash," as well as that of "Trovator." What could we do without them? When is "A. W. T." coming home with his Beethoven? That's all. H.

New Books.

THE WORKS OF CHARLES LAMB. In four Volumes. Boston: Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co. Salem: H. Whipple & Son.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the publishers, for adding to our household treasures this beautiful edition of these, among the dearest and most familiar of household words. The edition is the best and most complete ever published uniformly, as it embraces the "Final Memorials," published after the death of Mary Lamb, which disclose the secret history of their lives, and complete the record of a rare and shining example of brotherly and sisterly affection. The typography and paper of these volumes are little short of perfect, as may be supposed, when we say that they are fine specimens of the work that comes from the famous "Riverside Press." An excellent portrait of Lamb is prefixed to the first volume. The brief biography by the late Mr. Justice Talford glows with the affectionate love of a life long and dear friend, and lets us in very near to the hearts and home of Charles and Mary Lamb.

It is fitting that these choice treasures of our English literature of the early years of this century should be so beautifully stored in these volumes. The works of Charles Lamb are among those that we like ever to have near at hand, so full are they of wisdom, of humor, of pathos and the tender outpourings of one of the most lovable and loving of human hearts. The letters too, admit us to fellowship with the leading minds of the literary world of that time, and we enjoy a full communion with the spirits of Coleridge, Wordsworth and Southey, to name no others of the now famous company who composed the circle of the friends of Charles Lamb.

While an ardent lover of all that was beautiful in Nature, Art and books, Lamb seems to have had but little culture in that art to which our columns are devoted, yet he is for us a real "lucus a non lucendo," and we cannot forbear to quote his

FREE THOUGHTS ON SEVERAL EMINENT COMPOSERS.

Some cry up Haydn, some Mozart,
Just as the whim bites; for my part,
I do not care a farthing candle
For either of them, or for Handel.—
Cannot a man live free and easy,
Without admiring Pergolesi?
Or through the world with comfort go,
That never heard of Doctor Blow?
So help me heaven, I hardly have;
And yet I eat, and drink, and shave,
Like other people, if you watch it,
And know no more of stave or crotchet,
Than did the primitive Peruvians;
Or those old ante-queer-diluvians
That lived in the unwash'd world with Jubal,
Before that dirty blacksmith Tubal
By stroke on anvil, or by summ'at,
Found out, to his great surprise, the gamut,
I care no more for Cimarosa,
Than he did for Salvator Rosa,
Being no painter; and bad luck

Be mine, if I can bear that Gluck!
Old Tycho Brahe, and modern Herschel.
Had something in them; but who's Purcell?
The devil, with his foot so cloven,
For aught I care, may take Beethoven;
And, if the bargain does not suit,
I'll throw him Weber in to boot.
There's not the splitting of a splinter
To choose 'twixt him last named, and Winter.
Of Doctor Pepusch old queen Dido
Knew just as much, God knows, as I do.
I would not go four miles to visit
Sebastian Bach; (or Bach, which is it?)
No more I would for Bononcini.
As for Novello, or Rosmini,
I shall not say a word to grieve 'em,
Because they're living; so I leave 'em.

GERMAN POPULAR TALES AND HOUSEHOLD STORIES. Collected by the Brothers Grimm. Newly Translated. With Illustrations by Edward H. Wehnert. Boston: Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co.

Still another pearl of price the same publishers sends us in these world renowned stories, the Kinders- und Haus Märchen of the brothers Grimm. Children's fairy stories, on the surface, but told with the rarest grace of diction and sentiment, that make them as fascinating to the grown up reader as the immortal Arabian Nights. They are excellently translated, and the smaller illustrations, tail-pieces, &c., are spirited and well executed. The larger cuts are not in keeping with the general good style of these volumes which are well printed on good handsome paper. The publishers seem determined to establish a high reputation for the character of the works issued by them, and the manner in which they are got up. They finely rival the good name won by the late firm of Phillips, Sampson & Co., of which Mr. Lee was for many years an important member.

ANALYSIS OF THE CARTOONS OF RAPHAEL. New York: Charles B. Norton.

This little volume gives an intelligent analysis and description of the famous Cartoons at Hampton Court, and has been prepared for the subscribers to the engraving, from the great works of Raphael, which are published by Mr. Norton. It is however of independent and intrinsic value to all lovers of art.

CASSILL'S ILLUSTRATED BIBLE AND NATURAL HISTORY are most admirably illustrated in the best style of modern wood engraving, and aside from their cheapness, are desirable from the excellent manner in which they are got up. The text of the Natural History is full of valuable and carefully arranged information. It will be a valuable work when entirely completed.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Chopin's Mazurkas, Nos. 1 and 6.

Mr. Otto Dresel's Third Soiree.

This evening offered us a most excellent programme, which we print below. It will be perceived that it presented two great pieces, one of which generally is considered sufficient for an evening. By the skillful arrangement of the programme, and by placing the pieces of greatest importance first in each part they did not impress us otherwise than as being very fitting and welcome, and we were very glad to have them both.

PART I.

1. Septett, (D minor). . . . . Hummel
Allegro con spirito—Scherzo—Andante con variazioni —Finale.

2. Fantasia, (op. 17, last movement). . . . . Schumann
3. "Nachtgesang im Walde," for male voices. . . . . Schubert
4. Bolero. . . . . Fred. Hiller

PART II.

5. Second Concerto, (D minor). . . . . Mendelssohn
Allegro appassionato—Adagio—Finale.
6. Gondoliera, for male voices. . . . . Gade
7. Mazurka, (op. 50, A flat). . . . . Chopin
Fugue, (C sharp). . . . . J. S. Bach
8. Mazurka, (op. 59, A flat). . . . . Chopin
9. Chorus of Dervishes, from "Die Ruinen von Athen." . . . . Beethoven
10. Valse, (op. 70, G flat), and Eccossaises. . . . . Chopin

It is perhaps not well to speak of personal impressions and predilections in a notice of a concert; but where everything is so excellent one may be pardoned for expressing oneself particularly struck by some of the pieces. Most interesting to us seemed (besides the Septuor) the movement of the Fantasia, by Schumann, in C major; the Fugue in C sharp, by Bach, from the "Clavecin bien tempéré"; and the Dervish Chorus from Beethoven's music to "the Ruins of Athens." To speak of the Fantasia first, we find the solution of the question contained in the motto to the Fantasia in this very last movement. Full of originality and noble grandeur, leagued intimately with sweetness and grace, it has a surprising, more than commonly interesting effect. It is written in a broad, noble design in two parts frequently with a double accompaniment. The harmonic changes often produce a mysterious enchanting effect, as if they were to herald forth the tone, "the low tone" the artist is striving to find. The motto, by Fr. Schlegel, runs in this way:

"Through all the tones is sounding
In life's bright stream on earth
A low tone interwoven
For one in secret list'ning."

The theme following the first three Arpeggio measures, with its counter movement in right and left hand, is great in its simple statement, but rises to an unusual magnificence in the middle of the movement, where it appears entwined with a most sweet melody of a few measures in skillful imitation parts. Alas, that we cannot describe its various beauties! Language is unwieldy when contrasted with tone. In the accompaniment to this tender, longing melody is one effect of most touching sweetness and warmth of coloring. And yet it is a simple half step before the Tonic and Dominant chords of the accompaniment. Such little things are born of genius. So are the introductory harmonies to this same melody with their unusual changes of keys, the melody being stated in A flat, F major and G minor successively without preparation or leading over chords. They have a similar effect to that produced on us by colored rays of light, mysterious, an atmosphere of shining mellow tones—undefinable. A fine effect has the doubling of the melody in the working up of this theme; first one octave, then two octaves apart, with accompaniment in the middle and a separate bass below. And this working up develops the theme to such grandeur that the piano seems to assume the dimensions of an orchestra, the various parts swelling and spreading, replete with inner life, wrestling with each other, all striving for the same goal, all great, majestic, magnificent, until they unite in a short melody made of the same motive, but of fresh, confident character, changing to the same question that is found at the beginning. And the same sad, plaintive strain is followed both times by the same wondrous, enchanted harmonies (this time D flat, B flat and C major), followed by a short working up and then by the same fresh confident melody, which, together with that sweet melody mentioned above seems to be the answer Schumann found to the motto. Most strange, yet fitting — from the land of variegated fancies — are the following of the closing harmonies: C major, A major, D flat major, Dominant-Seventh in C, all in original positions, e, e, f, f, e being the soprano tones. It is a vain endeavor to catch the spirit, the flavor, the coloring of a piece so rich in peculiar effects, and express them in words. We long to hear the three other movements, the first two of which are connected in such a way, that the first forms a framework for the second. It is full of genius and thought, and has, besides, all the freshness of youth, being his 17th work.

The Fugue in 3 parts might as well have been written yesterday or to-day instead of a hundred or more years ago, so fresh and graceful is it. The form disappears entirely in the subject of the piece, which is both tender and brilliant, of course when played with such perfection, as Mr. Dresel does it. The Chorus of Dervishes is truthful and characteristic in the highest degree, one of those dramatic pieces of music, that transport us at once into the situation. It is frantic, absolutely mad, breathing the fiercest fanaticism, being written throughout in unison of all the voices only the accompaniment being figurative, though in the same fierce homophony, characteristic of the whole piece.

The Concerto by Mendelssohn in D minor is less known than that in G minor. It is strong and original in its first movement, which opens with a dialogue between the orchestra and the piano, continued until the latter has obtained the mastery. This event is expressed by a powerful run in octaves after which the movement really begins. The last movement is graceful and very brilliant. The Adagio is less original than the other two movements, but, as everything written by Mendelssohn, chaste and faultless in form. The Mazourkas in A flat, of which we like the first one best, gave Mr. Dresel another pleasant (to all his audience surely) opportunity of playing Chopin in his masterly manner. So did the beautiful Valse and the two exquisite Ecossaises in D and G major from the 7th book of Chopin's posthumous works. What a strange half-melancholy coloring the second one has? His playing was matchless as it always is. The piano is made to give forth under his hands such tender and sweet tones as one never expected from an instrument, naturally dry.

The accompaniments were played by Mr. Leonhard with his usual taste and the Orpheus sang as well as we are accustomed to hear them. A deep-felt piece of landscape painting that night-song in the forest by Schubert, with its phrases half-breathed, half-sung, now rising up splendidly with the light of the full moon, then dying away in the dense darkness of the woods.

The concert presented even a richer feast than the preceding ones. For to-night we are promised a Beethoven Sonata. It is only a pity that it is the last of these beautiful soirées. The hall was crowded, yet more comfortable in point of temperature than at either of the evenings preceding.

THE HARP MUSIC received from J. F. Browne, of New York, noticed a few weeks ago, we should have stated is for sale by Oliver Ditson & Co.

A Soiree at Banker Gold's.

PERSONAGES.

GOLD. (a banker, who loves music).
MRS. GOLD. (sings, and is "suffering").
SILVER. (a book-keeper, formerly a singer with Strauss).
HEILIG. (a friend of the family — a musical mucker *).
FORTE. (a foreign pianist, weak in the nerve).
DAS. (a piano-forte teacher).
EMMA. (his daughter).

Mrs. Gold has just finished singing Krebs' song, "Loving I think of thee" (all four verses) in the modern Italian style, trembling on every tone, the upper and lower tones forced, with plenty of ornaments, intermingling sudden forte passages with almost inaudible throat piannissimos; and the whole thing a quarter of a tone too low.

Das. (anxiously.) Will you not continue, Mrs. Gold? Or is the instrument so high that you must first get accustomed to it?

Mrs. Gold. Oh, no! the fine song touched me too deeply, and I am such a sufferer. (Aside to Das), Herr Forte did not accompany well at all; sometimes he played too softly, and then he came in with things of his own, that quite overpowered my suffering voice.

Das. (aside to Emma). What an evening we have in prospect!

Gold. (who has been talking about the funds in the next room, hurries in, a little too late, and seizes his wife's hands). Admirable, wonderful, superb! You are in excellent voice to-night, child! Ah, if the Lind had only heard that!

Heilig. Superb! charming! and so touching! There is a — a sort of — a religious type in that song — a — a piety — pray, now, do give us the "True happiness," by Voss, that will make our enjoyment perfect, overpowering. There is something divine in song! And your delivery — your expression, Madam! your sympathy with the composer!

(Mrs. Gold has already got "the true happiness," ready, and can scarcely wait until Forte has finished murmuring through the symphony in a curious piano. Heilig already begins to shed tears, while the great virtuoso turns the four bars of the prelude into eight. During the cloudy, wavering "happiness" he rolls his moist eyes about, and says, at the end of the first verse, while the accompanist's fancy is taking a higher flight, "I am silent; no words can express my feelings!")

Das. (aside to Emma). My daughter, observe that hypocritical feeling; and hear how people must not sing. This pretended warmth is, to the true and unprejudiced musician, nothing but hollow, empty, unnatural affectation. But you will often meet this amateur suffering.

(Mrs. Gold has finished all the verses of "The true happiness" and seems to have almost recovered. Gold talks with Silver in the "stock-room." Das stands with Emma, very much bored, at the end of the room).

Forte. (sits down to the piano-forte, and says in French to Mrs. Gold). Madam, you are the central point of all fine music. To breathe my inmost feelings over the piano-forte, before such a being, I count one of the happiest accidents of my artist-wandering. What a loss to the German opera, that your position prevents you from aiding it to retrieve itself; you, a star of the first magnitude!

Mrs. Gold. (Quite well again). I cannot deny that the Lind never pleased me. She is, and always will remain a Swede — cold. If she had been educated here, she would have heard warmer examples than in Stockholm; that would have given her a true direction of feeling.

Forte. Very true; you put the right estimate on her talent; and in Paris, where she might have heard such examples, she lived altogether too retired. I was concertizing there myself then; but as she refused to sing in my concerts, she did not hear me play.

* Mucker, — a word that signifies both gnat and hypocrite.

Silver. (to Mrs. Gold, who seems seized with the singing fury). Madam, will you do me the favor to sing the duet between Adam and Eve, from the "Creation" with me?

Mrs. Gold. Here it is. But bye and bye. First, Herr Forte will play us his newest compositions for the left hand, and then something by the romantic, sensitive Chopin.

Gold. (rushes in). Yes, yes! Chopin's mazurka in B major! Henselt, Thalberg, Dreyshock have all played it here to us. Oh, it is touching!

All. (except Silver, Das, and Emma). Touching!

Das. (to his daughter). If he plays as he accompanied, you will hear how this mazurka should not be played. It is not touching, but boldly reflects the Polish dance rhythm, as the peasants improvise it — though certainly idealized in Chopin's own style.

(Forte, after some dangerous runs up and down, and some very loud octave passages, with the pedal, gallops into the mazurka, without any pause, and commences it presto. No time or accent can be heard; nothing but eternal rubatos and tasteless ritardandos. Some passages are slipped over pianissimo, others suddenly thumped out too fast and abruptly; the last chord makes all the strings vibrate and costs one of them its life.)

Gold. Excellent! Bravissimo! What execution! Such artistic exploits make one forget even the Bourse itself!

Mrs. Gold. You thrill one's inmost nerves. No creative spirit can penetrate the inner heart of Nature, as the English poet, Pope, says — but you have penetrated to my inmost heart! Now let us have the mazurka in F sharp minor, opus 6.

Heilig. What a musical evening Mrs. Gold has again prepared for us! What sublime sorrow breathes through that production!

Silver. (aside). What would father Strauss say to this affected, unmusical interpretation, defying every principle of good taste?

Das. Would it not be desirable to send for the tuner, Mrs. Gold? The B string needs to be drawn up, for the second will soon follow it also, as it is already cracked, and too flat.

Forte. (triumphantly). Let it pass! Cela va sans dire! it often happens to me. The piano-forte is a field of battle where some sacrifices must fall.

Das. (aside to Emma). He thinks that if it does not resound, it will rattle; and untuned tones make more "effect" than true ones.

Emma. Where has he studied piano-forte playing?

Das. My child, he never learnt it at all. He is a genius; it comes of itself to him. Instruction would have fettered his genius, and then he might have played clearly, correctly, naturally, and in good time and taste. This unbridled, unmeasured hurly-burly is what people call "The genial piano forte swing."

(Forte tumbles hurriedly through several heterogeneous chords, with the pedal raised, and then begins the mazurka in F sharp minor without preparatory modulation. He accents strongly, robs one bar of two quarters to bestow them on the next, and after ending the mazurka, strikes a few despairing diminished-septima chords, and launched into Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Serenade" [in D minor]. As the second string of the two-lined B has also given way, there ensues a very remarkable effect, and the company wonders in whispers if the piece is by Mendelssohn, or Proch, or Beethoven, or Döhler, or Schumann; until Silver names the Serenade, and Forte closes with a thrilling effect of the soft pedal which he has already, in his enthusiasm, used several times.)

Das. (to Emma). Never play or sing in company without mentioning beforehand what your selection is.

All, (Except Das and Silver). What a performance! What a truly artistic enjoyment!

Mrs. Gold. This playing is transfiguration itself!

Silver, (to Forte). Did you not compress those two bars of the "Seventh," where it modulates into F major, into one? Was that accidental?

Emma, (aside). That was just where he should have retarded the time.

Forte. One must give one's self up entirely to such improvements. Another time I shall perhaps make three bars out of those two; just as genius and enthusiasm operate within me. People call these "aesthetic surprises." Henselt, Moscheles, Thalberg, Clara Schumann don't understand that sort of thing; that is why they cannot make any more tours; they have no idea of effect.

Das, (to Emma). I trust that your naturally healthy taste, and your musical education, will preserve you for ever from such un-nature.

Emma. Such playing makes one feel anxious and uncomfortable. Is that the "modern demoniacal?"

Das. Yes!

Emma. How can that please people?

Das. Because they are fools enough to think it sounds genial and creative.

(Silver leads Mrs. Gold to the piano, to perform the great duet between Adam and Eve. Forte is exhausted, so Das accompanies. Silver sings with good natural feeling; Mrs. Gold in her above-mentioned manner, but still more time-and-tunelessly; and on the pause in the Allegro she introduces, with her forced, cutting voice, an endless cadenza; throwing her black eyes continually towards the ceiling. At the conclusion, Mrs. Gold, dissolving in emotion, is deposited in an arm-chair by Silver.)

Heilig. Ah, when Haydn is interpreted in such a manner, the divine art celebrates his noblest triumphs! Mrs. Gold, were the fine ornaments of your own composition?

Mrs. Gold. No! I heard them introduced in the "Barber of Seville," by Viardot-Garcia, as "Rosina," and I got a musician belonging to the theatre to write them down for me. But the changes necessary for this duet are my own invention, and I have already surprised many listeners with them. And that great, down-rushing chromatic scale which Garcia introduces as the dreamy, swooning Amina in "La Sonnambula," I bring into the great aria, the "Godly Prophets;" a little timidly, to be sure; for the certainty of a Garcia can only be acquired on the boards.

Emma. But, father, Lind sang this duet with Staudigl in Vienna, quite simply, purely, and in a true sacred style!

Das. That is just why Mrs. Gold thinks that the Lind sings coldly, and needs to hear warmer types. But more of this at home.

Mrs. Gold. Now, Mr. Das, will not your Emma play us some little thing? Afterwards, I will sing, "Of thy goodness, oh Lord," and some of Kücken's duets, with Mr. Silver; and if the company desires it, I will close with the aria "Robert."

Das. Will you first allow me to remedy the broken string?

(The company drinks tea in an adjoining room, loudly admiring Mrs. Gold's cultivation and perseverance. When Das has finished his task, Forte marches to the piano, and plays his own "study for the left hand," stretching out the right hand towards his audience.)

Das (at the close to Forte). Would it not have sounded better, and been easier, and more to the purpose, if you had taken the right hand to it?

Forte. That is a very pedantic remark of yours; but one must forgive these things in old people. You entirely misunderstand my stand-point! Do you not feel that I have already one foot in the future? Do you not comprehend that the public wishes not only to hear, but also to see, something remarkable?

And can you not imagine the great musical effect of my suffering aspect?

Heilig. Do you not feel the extraordinary charm and effect that belongs to the left hand alone? No less the outstretched right?

Das. So? Yes, feeling must certainly have taken a false direction with me. I must get myself up in this Parisian piano-forte exultation.

(After Das has announced it, Emma plays Chopin's Ballade in A major; the company is attentive.)

Forte, (when it is ended). Bravo! a pretty beginning, Mr. Das! I am sorry that I must now take my leave, but I have to attend two soirées more, and to pay my respects in several places.

Silver. Miss Emma, I am sure that you have already played Chopin's music much and well. Let us now hear his two newest Nocturnes.

Mrs. Gold, (to Emma). Have you heard the celebrated Camilla Pleyel? Do you know her fine Kalkbrenner-like concerto in D minor? Can you play anything in that brilliant style? For instance, Döhler's lovely, affecting nocturne in D flat? Ah, Mr. Secretary X. played it for us lately in a delightful manner!

Emma. Yes, I know it; I have taught it to my little sister Cecilia.

Das. Will you in the meanwhile put up with Chopin's two Nocturnes, op. 48?

(At midnight a fine supper was served, perfumed with excellent wines, and disagreeable recollections of this "musical evening.")

The second concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB came off on Tuesday, 4th inst. It was a stormy night, snow having begun to fall early in the afternoon.

1. Quintette, in E flat, Op. 4.....Beethoven
Allegro—Andante.
2. Piano Trio, in D minor, Op. 49.....Mendelssohn
Allegro agitato—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Allegro.
Messrs. Lang, Schultze and Fries.
3. Duettino, from the Magic Flute. "La dove prende amor ricetto." Arranged for Quintette.....Mozart
4. "La Charité." Transcription for Piano.....Liszt
B. J. Lang.
5. Grand Quartette in D minor.....F. Schubert Allegro—Andante with Variations—Scherzo—Finale, Presto.
Posthumous Work.

Of the Quintette in E flat the first two movements only were played, which generally speaking, does not seem to be a commendable practice. In a work written in the Sonata form the different movements constitute an inseparable unity, to dismember which is doing injustice to the intentions of the composer. To hear the first movements of a Quintette is nearly the same as seeing the first acts of a drama. The dénouement is wanting. This Quintette one of Beethoven's earliest, is not one of his most interesting works. The disappointment was not so great therefore. It is a different thing when a Scherzo or an Adagio is performed by itself. There the connection is not so apparent, since the preparatory movement does not excite the expectation. Neither when a closing movement of a Fantasia is presented, where the parts are joined more loosely. But of a piece in strict form we would prefer hearing nothing, to hearing only the introductory movements.

Mendelssohn's Piano Trio is too well known to invite comment. It is enough to say, that it was played with much feeling, Mr. LANG sustaining his part admirably, and the violin and violoncello joining him worthily. The piece by Rossini, transcribed by Liszt, bearing the title La Charité (why?) is quite pleasing as to its theme. The working up is tasteful, as Liszt knows well how to arrange pieces. The difficulties of execution disappeared in Mr. Lang's excellent rendering. We have not heard this artist for some time, but he seems to have added to his great ease and strength of execution a nicer taste and deeper feeling, than we ever noticed before.

The Quartette by Schubert in D minor, a posthu-mous work, is a composition of great originality and beauty. It was played we think some three years ago, but seemed quite new on hearing it to-night. The two motives of the Allegro agitato contrast strongly, the first (in D minor) being passionate and energetic, the second, forming a lovely melody in F major, sweet and nervous withal. The effect produced by introducing it in D major in the third part of this movement was especially pleasant. The movement is strong and passionate, and forms in its agitation and its frequent harmonic changes, a fitting counterpart to the quiet theme of the Andante con moto in G minor, ending in G major in its second part. The harmonies of the first part are the very simplest to a melody that moves on four contiguous tones. It flows quietly on, nor do the few harmonic changes in the second part disturb this feeling of stillness and rest. The variations are graceful. The Scherzo in D minor with a beautiful Trio in D major is rather more quiet than Scherzi usually are, for the reasons that the Presto Finale in six-eighth time is an impetuous Tarantella. Characteristic in melody and rhythm, it has a wealth of harmonic combinations such as Schubert likes to employ. The fancy of this remarkable genius delights in revelling in chords, in the boldest, most unexpected changes. Everything he wrote at once shows this peculiarity, which for the most part is employed in perfect fitness, with artistic consciousness of effect. This Presto is evidently the most original of the movements. And the unity of the piece is manifested by the first motive of the first movement coming in quite naturally and intermingling with the motives of the Tarantella. The piece was played very effectively by the four gentlemen. The Duettino from the "Magic Flute," the principal part being sustained by the clarinet, went quite well and was a pleasing diversion of the programme.

The hall in spite of the bad weather was well filled, as it ought to be. Chamber music is one of the most effective means of forming a pure taste for the best music. And it is pleasant to see, that the worthy efforts of the Club in this direction are seconded by the public.

NEW YORK, DEC. 5. — Last Tuesday evening Messrs. MASON & THOMAS held their second Soirée to the delight of the music-lovers who had braved the wretched weather. The concert was fully as attractive as the first of the series — perhaps, still more so. One of Haydn's loveliest, freshest Quartets, in B flat major, headed the programme, and was most admirably played. What a contrast it presented to Beethoven's grand work in C, op. 59, which ended the concert! The one like a limpid, sparkling, mountain brook, the other a mighty torrent, almost too full and broad for its limits. The Andante con moto is wonderful, so weird and mysterious, as if hiding some mournful heart story beneath its depths, as who can tell but it does! But no words can give adequate expression to the beauties of this mighty work. Those who have heard it, know what it is (especially if it is so exceedingly well rendered as on this occasion), and for those who have not I can wish nothing better than a speedy opportunity of doing so.

One of Mozart's charming Sonatas for Violin and Piano, in A, so seldom heard in public, was played by Messrs. Mason & Thomas, and as solo-numbers Mr. Mason gave us a transcription of Liszt's, and Mr. MATZKA a Divertissement for the Viola, which is his instrument. The theme of Liszt's arrangement was the Andante Finale from the opera "King Alfred," by Raff, a pupil of the great pianist, neither subject nor transcription were, however, particularly attractive, though very finely rendered. Mr. Matzka's solo was a composition by Mr. Thomas, in which he showed himself master of his instrument, but which had the fault that it was better adapted to the violin than the viola. Otherwise it was a pleasing and meritorious work.

The Mendelssohn Society have given a concert since I last wrote, at which Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was sung; not having been present, however, I cannot say what success it had.

Of the production of "La Juive" at the Academy, with its magnificent mise en scene, and, most important, the splendid rendering of its three chief parts, I will leave it to "Trovator" to tell you, as I hope he has enjoyed it as much as I did.

Music Abroad.

The return of Tobias, an oratorio written by Haydn at the age of forty-four to an Italian text, and which, it had been supposed, was destroyed in the burning of the Chateau Esterhazy, at Eisenstadt, has been discovered recently, thanks to the diligent search of M. Franz Lachner. It is now being translated into German, and will be performed for the first time at Munich.—Gazette Musicale.

VIENNA.—At the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, of such universal reputation, operas are still given with the same perfection of ensemble in respect to execution, and the same slovenly mise-en-scène, as distinguished the representations ten years ago. This evening M. Halevy's La Juive, a work but little known in England, was performed with the following cast:—Prinz—Herr Guns; Eleazar—Herr Wachtel; Prinzessin—Fraulein Liebhart; Rachel—Mad. Csillag; Cardinal—Herr Drachaler. The primo tenore, Herr Wachtel, is a German Tamberlik, who indulges in B flats and C's dipetto to any extent without the slightest apparent effort. It is truly a magnificent voice which, with judicious care and study, will ensure a brilliant career to its possessor. Herr Wachtel is new to the stage, young and good looking, perhaps the most promising "Helden tenor" of the day. The rôle of Eleazar is one requiring more experience in stage business than he can yet bring to bear. Nevertheless, he sustained the part respectably, and by his singing of the music elicited the fullest approbation of the audience.

Mad. Csillag, the prima donna, is well known in England; but the London public have had as yet no opportunity of judging of those remarkable vocal and histrionic powers which have made her such a favorite in Vienna. The operas in which she appeared at Covent Garden were but little adapted to her talents compared to such as La Juive, Macbeth, the Huguenots, &c. As Rachel in La Juive Mad. Csillag is unrivalled. In common with Mad. Viardot, to whom there is a striking resemblance both in her acting and appearance, she contrives so completely to identify herself with the heroine of the opera, that the artiste is forgotten in the interest excited in the part she represents. The illusion is sustained throughout and never once disturbed by any extravagant effort at effect. The Ars celare artem is the maxim fully carried out, and the impression upon the audience consequently deep and lasting. Mad. Csillag's enthusiastic reception, and the frequent calls before the curtain during and after the opera, proved the admiration of the Viennese public for their favorite prima donna.

A hearty greeting to all his friends in England from Ernst. He has been an invalid ever since he left London, now three years ago. After trying many of the German baths, without any beneficial result, he has come to Vienna to consult the medical men, who have given him hopes of a speedy restoration to health, if he follow their advice. He suffers acute pain, and is at times quite unable to stand or walk without support. I called yesterday at the house of Mad. Wertheimber, the most liberal friend of music and musicians in this musical capital, with whom Ernst and his wife are staying. The doctors had just left, and had given a favorable opinion as to the progress of their patient. Ernst was in better spirits than usual, and expressed the greatest interest to know what had been doing in the musical world of London since his absence. During his illness, he has been unable to perform in public. The last time he played was to some members of the imperial family of Russia at Nice, and was then obliged to be seated during his performance. His account of the reception accorded him by the Court, reminded me of the "pitied duchess" in "the Last Minstrel." Thalberg is also here. It appears that he has altogether neglected the pianoforte for the last two years. A large fortune and a lazy disposition make him careless of his professional career.

Of all the hospitable receptions in this city, renowned for hospitality, that given by the amiable Jetty Treffz is the most agreeable with which an Englishman can meet. Having amassed a handsome fortune, the result of a brilliant career in Germany and England, the fascinating Teutonic prima donna resides in Vienna, the delight and ornament of a large circle of acquaintance. Her house is furnished in the English style, and the hospitality is most decidedly after the same approved model. The charming hostess always speaks with gratitude of the pleasant time she passed in England, and does her best to prove the sincerity of what she says by the invariable kind-hearted welcome she gives to those English friends who visit her in this her native country.

The performances at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre this week have been interesting. On Sunday, 21st, Wilhelm Tell was given with a perfection of ensemble which intimate knowledge of the work, and frequent performances by the same executants, can alone attain. Objection might be made to the tempi of some of the principal morceaux, as being different to the English reading of the same subject; but deference must be paid to the Kärnthnerthor authority, as being very probably the most correct in such matters. As the hero of the opera, Herr Beck, fully justified the reputation he has of being the best German baritone of the present day. Voice, appearance, and dramatic talent are happily combined in this artist, all of which qualities are requisite in such a rôle as Wilhelm Tell. Herr Wachtel, as Arnold, again displayed his remarkable vocal powers. The grand duet, "Dovo Vai"—to give the Italian and best known title—was magnificently rendered by these two artists and the band, every member of which seemed to devote heart and soul to the performance.

On Monday, 22nd, the German version of Verdi's Trovere was given, with the following cast:—Marrico, Herr Walter; Azucena, Fraulein Sulzer; Fernando, Herr Mayerhofer; Leonora, Mad. Csillag; Conte di Luna, Herr Hrabaneck. The Leonora of Mad. Csillag is of very much more dramatic importance than the "walking lady" who wears black, white, and party-colored raiment alternately, and sings a couple of arias upon our Italian stage. Mad. Csillag takes quite another reading of the part, and by the earnestness of her acting, and the grandeur of her declamation, greatly increases the interest of the opera. This is particularly remarkable in the "Miserere scene," where Leonora hears the voice of Marrico from the prison tower. The situation is heightened in effect by the passionate despair portrayed in every note and gesture of this most intelligent artist. The music suits Mad. Csillag admirably, and the character altogether is one of the most successful in which she has appeared.

On Wednesday, 24th, a very different representation took place, being none other than Wagner's Tannhäuser; or, "The Singer's Strife," which, according to the prophecy of his admirers, is to be the Don Giovanni, Guillaume Tell, and Fidelio, of the next century. From all I had heard of the mysterious character of the work, I prepared myself for an evening of hard labor to understand this music of the future. According to the prognostications of the lovers of the Italian school, I was to be overcome by the first act, and sleep out the rest of the opera; nay, so soporific was the music pronounced that I fully anticipated not perhaps awaking again until the following evening. Such antagonistic opinions naturally excited my curiosity, and rendered the performance of Tannhäuser the most interesting of all those I had yet attended at the Kärnthnerthor.

The cast of the opera was as follows:—

Hermann, Landgraf von Thüringen	..... Herr Mayerhofer.
Tannhäuser, Minstrel Knight	..... Herr Ander.
Wolfram	..... Herr Rudolf.
Walter	..... Herr Guns.
Ritterolf	..... Herr Hrabaneck.
Helfrich	..... Herr Kamppe.
Elizabeth	..... Mlle. Kraus.
Venus	..... Mlle. Hoffmann.
Hirt	..... Mlle. Kudelka.

As Tannhäuser, Herr Ander (who is known in London as having appeared at the Royal Italian Opera some five years ago) sang and acted with the greatest vigor. His voice is not so fresh as formerly, and must undoubtedly suffer from constantly singing the music of Wagner, which, for the tenor particularly, is even more irksome and wearisome than that of Verdi. It would be difficult to find another artist who could give so much effect to the part of Tannhäuser as Herr Ander. Mlle. Kraus was an interesting and efficient Elizabeth. The other parts were creditably sung. To me the first impression of the opera was decidedly favorable, and induced a strong desire to hear the music a second time. Without siding either with those who so enthusiastically uphold or unequivocally condemn Wagner as the master of a new school, which is or is not to be the music of the future, an impartial judge must recognize in his compositions much that is original and artistic in form and treatment, and will listen with respect to the productions of such a writer who, however mistaken, may be his views, will never degrade the art for the sake of popularity.—London Musical World, November 3.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

There's a bower by Bendemeer's stream. Benson. 25

A pleasing sacred song. Easy.

O that my woes were distant. R. Molique. 25

A new German song by the distinguished German musician who has just now achieved a brilliant triumph in England with his new Oratorio of "Abraham." Friends of German ballads will be enraptured by it.

They come in dreams. G. W. Stratton. 25

A simple, melodious song, written in a popular style.

The old beadle. Song. J. W. A. Cluett. 25

A home-ballad, with a pretty and taking air.

Instrumental Music.

Esmeralda Dance. (Nebelbilder.) Th. Osten. 25

Idylle. " " 25

Two more of this excellent series of instructive pieces which has already proved invaluable to many teachers.

Notturmo, Op. 23, No. 4. R. Schumann. 25

A short nocturne or song without words, of striking beauty. It made a deep impression upon the audience present at Mr. Dressel's first Soirée. It is a spark of real genius.

Ever of thee. Transcription. H. A. Wollenhaupt. 50

This beautiful melody has been arranged into a piano-piece of such telling power and elegant finish as the great reputation of the author would naturally lead to expect. It is of moderate difficulty only and those familiar with Charles Voce's similar arrangements will easily master it.

Depart, depart. Chorus in "Athalie." Arranged by Otto Dreed. 25

A fragment of the beautiful, yet little known, incidental music, composed by Mendelssohn to the drama of "Athalie." Such music in such an arrangement cannot be but deeply enjoyed by all really musical persons.

Fairy Waltz from the "Buccancer." Stratton. 25

A pretty trifle, which must prove a capital instruction piece.

Books.

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE VIOLIN. A Thorough and Systematic Arrangement of Easy, Progressive Studies, adapted to the wants of Schools in every degree of advancement. Added to which is a large selection of Popular Songs, Polkas, Waltzes, Dances, Marches, Quicksteps, &c. By L. G. Fessenden. 2,50

The author of this work is a teacher of the violin, and gives this School after a long experience in its use. As exercises and examples, selections are taken from Bargino, Labitzky, Pleyel, Moriani, Czerny, and others of like celebrity as teachers and composers. The second part of the book is intended to meet the wants of those who are desirous of well-arranged Airs, Quadrilles, Polkas, Waltzes, &c.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Argument of Lurline.

Wallace's beautiful opera of "Lurline" was produced, for the first time in America, at Maguire's Opera House, San Francisco, recently. It appears to have made quite a sensation among the majors and miners of that vicinity, and the Golden Era contains the following admirably-written burlesque by J. KATZMA, Esq.

AIR: "The Tall Young Oysterman."

Count Rudolph was a noble gent, as lived upon the Rhine,
Who spent his money very free in lager-bier and wine:
The Baron Truenfels, likewise, was neighbor of the same,
Which had a rather upplish girl—G. Truenfels by name.

Rudolph would wed Miss Truenfels, but wasn't it a go?
Each thought that t'other had the tin (you know how lovers blow),

But when old T. says "Pungle down," Count Rudolph he says
"Stuff;

I've youth and rank, that's more than gold," says G., "It ain't enough."

"I want a diamond thingammy—likewise a nice tressoo,
I want a kerriage of me own, and so young man adoo;"
The Baron also cuts up rough—but Rudolph is content,
And merely takes a stiffer horn, observing, "Let her went."

New just before this jolly row, a gal they called Lurline
Was living down at Lurlineburg, of which she was the queen;
She was a lady Dashaway—when water was on hand,
But had some spirits of her own she likewise could command.

This girl close by a whirlpool sat—this female named Lurline,
And played with most exquisite taste upon the tambourine;
The way the sailors steered into them whirlpools was a sin—
Young men beware of such sirens who thus take fellers in.

Now Count Rudolph was wide awake, beyond the power of suction;

Which caused Lurline to fall in love and seek an introduction,
And when he's tight, one day she slips a ring upon his finger;
And thus Count Rudolph is bewitched by that bewitching singer.

Then straightway in his boat he jumps, which soon begins to sink,

While all his brave com-pan-i-ons are yelling on the brink:
"You're half-seas-over now, you fool—come back, you'll surely drown;"

Down goes the gallant German gent, a whistling "Derry Down."

Down, down among the oyster beds, he finds his sweet Lurline
A cutting such a heavy swell—a gorgeous submarine;
Her father Rhineberg's very rich, and fellers said, who punned,
"He took deposits from the tars and kept a sinking fund."

Count Rudolph did consent to stay at Rhineberg's flash hotel,
And half made up his mind that with Lurline he'd ever dwell.
"I'm partial to the water-cure and fond of clams," says he;
"But such as you, Miss Rhineberg, are a subject quite per se."

But suddenly he hears a noise, which made him weaken some.
The howling of his friends above—says he: "I must go hum."

Good-bye, Miss R." "Hold up!" says she, "we'll do the handsome thing,

Pa gives this masey chunk of gold. You keep my magic ring."

So Rudolph takes the ring and gold, and comes home with a rush,

And very glad his neighbors was to see him come so flash.
And even old Miss Truenfels to welcome him began,
And says: "I always thought you was a very nice young man."

Likewise she says: "My eye," and makes believe to faint away.

And sich like gammon. But the count says: "Come, now, that won't pay!

I loves another!" "Cruel man! That ring I now diskliver Sey whoose?" "My gal's!" She snatches it and chucks it in the river.

Now one of Lurline's father's help had caught the ring and ran

To her and says: "You see what comes of loving that young man."

Poor Lurline feels somewhat cut up—and to assuage her pain she takes her father's oyster sloop and comes ashore again.

'Twas lucky that she did come up, for Rudolph's friends were bent

On sharing Rudolph's golden store, without Rudolph's consent;

And him they would assassinate, but Lurline she says "Hold!"
And waves a wand until they stand like statoots, stiff and cold.

They stood like statoots on the bridge—it was a bridge of sighs;
For straightway most unpleasantly the tide began to rise;
It rose, but when the river swept away the bridge at last,
They found, although the tide was flood, their chances ebbing fast.

It rose until the wicked all had found a watery grave—
And then it sank and left Rudolph and neighbors in a cave.
Rudolph then marries Miss Lurline; is happy, rich and able To take the lowest bid to lay the next Atlantic Cable.

The Diarist Abroad.

NEITHER UTILE NOR DULCE.

[In this short letter "our own correspondent" discourseth, not of art, but of griefs and grievances; and detailleth how through much trial and tribulation he at length cast his anchor of hope in the h(e)aven of Paris.]

And so week after week passed away and the letters did not come, the bill in the mean time receiving its daily increment until it became

A monster of such frightful mien
That to be hated, 'twas but to be seen.

What could I do about it?

But there are generally compensations, greater or less in degree; and so it now proved. Old periodicals, which I had come to Bonn in part to examine, only "turned up" after all sources, as I had supposed, were exhausted. Moreover, when time began to hang heavily, I fell in with a gentleman from whom I learned many interesting things in relation to the feeding of cattle, the cultivation of fodder, and other like matters of special interest—to a musical man. But, joking apart, the enforced delay in Bonn was the means of my meeting that dear friend, so well known to all the readers of the "Journal of Music," just when the crushing weight of his great calamity was upon him, and of admiring the brave manliness and fortitude with which he met it. It was a great grief, but there were duties owing to himself and others and he went about them with a sort of sad cheerfulness most touching to me.

We had a long discussion of routes, and as I had made up my mind to visit Paris, (being upon the scent of something important), the conclusion was, that we should go together up the Rhine, he to turn eastward from Mayence, I westward from that place. Excepting the Rhine trip, it could make no difference whether I journeyed to the French capital by way of Cologne or Mayence—so, at least, we made it out from our book of railroad routes. So on the bright, sunny autumnal morning of Oct. 17, I at last left little Bonn, and at 10 A.M. joined Dwight, who had gone on the day before to Coblenz. We went immediately on board the steamboat, which was already puffing and blowing, and the next moment were passing the bridge of boats. I have seldom, if ever, seen the Rhine so beautiful as on that day.
The stream was swollen by the rains of the previous months, which had seldom ceased for three days together, and the vineyards and wooded hills, had much of the splendor of our own autumnal scenery. True the Rhine has no forests of grand old trees, nor is the variety of the young growth of wood great. But the beeches, birches, occasional oaks, and its green firs and pines, lent a charming color to the heights. Castles, new and old, repaired or in ruins, looked doubly picturesque in the mellow light and in their beautiful surroundings. The air was cool and exhilarating, and everything was cheerful and inviting.

That is Stolzenfels—that lordly castle, rebuilt, not in the best taste, by order of the King of Prussia, who purchased the ruin, it is said, for 70 thalers, and the village, one long street between the heights and the river, is Capellen. It was there that Paul Flemming's postilion awaited the traveller, while he went up to the ruin and was talked to about the Homunculus. And there is Camp, with its tall walnut trees, where the landlady's daughter landed Flemming. Just beyond you see the convent of Bornhofen; above it, are the two ruined castles of the Brothers, and across the river, that small house, with the high steps and small balcony, that is the little, out-of-the-way inn of the Star at Salzig, where Flemming dined and obtained the landlady's daughter with the dark eyes to row him across the river. It was all familiar to me; to my companion it was nearly new. I discoursed and he listened so patiently! The boat landed him opposite Mayence just as evening closed in to take the cars to Frankfort, while I crossed the river.
And so we parted.

Now behold the D. in the Karp inn—which is much dearer than it used to be. He has dined and is deep in the study of the routes to Paris True, the proper way from Bonn would have been via Cologne and Namur, a ride of some nine or ten hours, but then this trip on the Rhine would not have been. The landlord of the Karp comes to my assistance, and the conclusion of the matter is, to take the train next morning at 5:30 return to Bingen, and thence to Kreuznach, and so on to Paris, arriving at 10:10 P.M.

So this is happily settled, and Dr. Franklin's maxim is followed, "Early to bed" that I may early rise.

When a fidgetty man, who has no alarm watch has been allowed to sleep over once or twice a strange inns, he becomes suspicious of the whole tribe of Hausknechts, Boots, or whatever name they are known by, and impresses it most strongly upon his mind that he must wake at such an hour. He retires very early, makes every preparation he can think of to be ready at a moment's warning, lays himself in his bed and begins at once to make such preternatural effort to induce sleep, as to effect a double wakefulness.
He cannot even become drowsy. By and by, when almost in despair, he drops off as if he has been shot. A long and dreamless sleep follows.
Suddenly he wakes. It is light in his chamber.

(the street lamp), he hears people pass upon the pavement, he is sure that he has overslept. He fidgets for a time, springs to the floor, lights his candle, looks at his watch. It is 11 1-2 o'clock. He has slept perhaps half an hour. He tries it again. He hears the church clock strike three-quarters, and knows it is not yet midnight. He sleeps. When he wakes again it is to hear the dying tone of the great bell again. But what has it struck? He lies and in his efforts to keep awake until it again strikes he overdoes the matter and goes off into a profound slumber. But not for the night; he hears the clock again. One, two, three, is it three-quarters of something, or is it three o'clock? No, he cannot wait patiently; he strikes a light again and finds it not yet two. Well, it is of no use: he will let nature take her own course, and his thoughts go wandering over the world, picking out of his experience, his many similar nights in various lands—and he sleeps again. He wakes, and this time the church clock strikes the four quarters, and follows with the deep-toned voice which announces four o'clock. And now he must sleep no more, for in half an hour he is to rise. As the influence of morning comes, he grows drowsy again, but he arouses himself; he hears the first quarter, and as the second is striking, Boots knocks at the door, "Herr, it is half past four!"

What good has his fidgeting done?

I was already engaged in such ablutions as are possible with the small bowl and pitcher of water usually to be found in German inns, where this seems to be a dearer liquid than wine and beer, when Boots came (punctual to the minute) to arouse me.

It was still quite dark as I passed along the deserted streets to the station, nor was the ticket office yet open. This evening I shall be in Paris, and to-morrow morning with my old college friend, said I, as I paced back and forth and built in the air an imaginary great city, to which I was bound. But it was raw and cold, and I envied those who could sleep for a later train.

Meantime the station becomes astir with the preparations for the early train, and the minute arrives when the ticket-man's little window goes open. "Ein billet nach Paris," say I.

"There is no train thither at this hour. It was suspended two months ago," says the ticket-man. And thus it comes about that I feel no special affection for the landlord of the Karp inn, whose advice I had followed.

"Then there is no getting to Paris to-day?"

"No. But riding all night will bring you there to-morrow morning."

"Which I by no means desire to do."

Now I had a long hour for reflection. The ticket-man, too, seemed to feel sympathy for me, and explained about the two routes, from Mayence, which met somewhere on the way, this side the French capital. One thing was very certain that I must ride all night or stop over somewhere. In strange lands I choose to ride by daylight. I do not understand going abroad to see new countries, and then traversing them in the night. The expense could be but little more, and the result of my cogitations was, the plan of going on to Strasbourg, which the map showed could not be a very long journey, spend the afternoon there in the cathedral, of which I had so pleasant a remembrance from 1850, and next morning go on.

6:30 A.M. Off for Strasbourg. Sun rose gloriously. Ran along the plains, which spread away from the Rhine, with some pleasant gentlemen in the car, bound to Worms, to a great agricultural meeting. Worms all dressed out in flags, and a great to-do generally. Saw the "Herr Graf" and another of my gentlemen drive away from the station in an open barouche, as if they were persons of mark. Very likely they were. Slow train, very—but it at length brought me to one of the many "Neustadts" scattered all over Germany.

Cars to be changed. Man in uniform at the station, very polite and agreeable. Informs me that either here or at Weissenburg I shall have to wait two hours for the express train; thinks I had better stop here, as the place is a pleasant one. I agreed with him, for during the last hour the range of hills on the right, the west, had been growing higher and more beautiful, and Neustadt lies directly at their feet. They are the Haardt Mts.—the blue Alsatian hills, which Paul Flemming could see from the splendid ruin at Heidelberg. I gave my things into the man's care and went off upon a walk.

Just as I started, the train which I had left started also. And now it struck me that I had left my umbrella on board. Had it been very new or very old, I had not taken it to heart. But our acquaintance had ripened into friendship, and it no longer spotted me black and blue with its drippings when it rained. Good bye, old friend.

It was a fine walk over the bridge which spans the railroad, and up the chaussée to the top of the first height; then along a cartway between the vineyards, and along the shoulder of a loftier height, past a house of entertainment for the Neustadt people on holidays, until my cartway brought up in a huge red sandstone quarry. I scrambled out of the quarry, and found pleasant walking on the healthy soil, among the scattered young pine trees, and so came to the top. A higher eminence rose just beyond, and still a second and third beyond that. The last was however too far away for my two hours of time, and I drank the view from the others. Those Haardt Mts. may rise a thousand or twelve hundred feet perhaps from the plain. I stood upon a spur of them jutting out from the main range, so that a good view of their eastern slopes, far away into the blue, was presented. They were no longer blue Alsatian hills, for chestnuts and oaks, young vigorous and leafy, touched by autumn, now made them brown and golden, save where the deep green of pines covered them. To the left was the long range. Below me the small city, and the deep gorge behind it, through which the railroad ran until it plunged into a tunnel and was seen no more. To the right the hills were more clustered and upon one of their lofty tops, the now half restored, huge, old castle of the Maxburg—newly named from king Max of Bavaria, to whom it belongs. But in front what a plain, at least as seen from this height!

And this is a view so utterly unlike anything which I have ever seen in America, so essentially European—why not try, perhaps for the twentieth time, to give an idea of it?—away in the distance, 25, 30, 35 miles, for aught I know, the chain of mountains, where Heidelberg lies, form the dim horizon. All the space between, looking down so far upon it, seems level as a floor. No hills, valleys, woods are there—all is under the highest culture. Each field distinct by its color, whether of the soil or the crop upon it—no walls nor fences between—a vast, wide-spread plaid of ten thousand checks. Here and there, like islands in a lake, roofs and fruit trees are clustered in an undistinguishable mass; they are the villages and little towns—no scattered farm-houses vary the scene as with us and in our fatherland, England. I watch trains of cars departing from the station below, and they are not lost behind hills or in excavations, but grow less and less until they disappear in the distance. And over all, to-day, the bright sun sheds a flood of golden light, and flashes upon the surface of the distant Rhine, winding its way seaward.

Where I stand the hilltop is covered with boulders of sandstone, among which a scanty growth of pitch-pines rises; but the mass on which I am is large enough to give me a clear view. It is so still here—no sound but the sighing of the wind in the trees. It would be pleasant to have a companion, but pleasanter to be alone. Ah me! how I feel all this beauty.

Then I plunged down the steep side of the mount, and went through a part of the little city meeting the people in great numbers returning from their fields, some with barrows, some with baskets, some with huge bundles on head or back—all coming home to dinner and bringing beets, potatoes, or turnips with them, for it is harvest time. Not rich people they, but evidently contented, healthy men and women of the peasant class.

I had hurried down from my walk and had half an hour to spare. Calling for my impedimenta, lo, with the travelling bags, the umbrella! Who so happy? not so much at not having lost the old friend, as that I had been wise and not expended useless sorrow at its supposed loss. For it is noon, and I, at the earliest, can reach Strasbourg not before three or four o'clock. That will, however, give me some time to see the cathedral. The train comes and departs from Neustadt and I go on rejoicing. A common looking man and two pretty children—little girls—say of four and six years—are in the division of the car with me, a passenger or two besides.

"Those children," says one man to another, "are little Americans."

Whereupon I address the father in English, and he tells me how, after many long years at Baltimore, living as a gardener, during which he made one visit home, in the little town to which we shall soon come after passing the French boundary, he is now bringing his motherless children to the care of their grandmother and aunts. Soon the other passengers leave, and then we—the Americans, for he has become a citizen and is proud of it—we have long, long talks about home. And the little girls are so glad after the long passage to Rotterdam, and then up the Rhine in the steamboat, to find a gentleman to talk English to them; and they are so bright and pretty, and look so homelike in their little American sun-bonnets—and then this coarse uneducated Alsatian is so motherly to them—I declare the whole thing assumed something poetic in my eyes even before we reached Weissenburg, which is the French frontier town where we are to have our baggage and passports examined.

The baggage business is accomplished, and I go to the passport room of the station house to get that document. Mine is lying by itself, and not until the others are disposed of do I touch mine.

"You cannot go on," says the man.

"Why is that?"

"Your passport is not in order. It is not visé for France."

Then for the first time the necessity of anything of the sort strikes me! Not having had any idea before coming to Bonn that anything for my great object could be in Paris, I had no visé, and now I was very suddenly and unpleasantly reminded that they were necessary. What to do? One of my travelling bags goes on to Strasburg, the others I take from the car, and by his advice I go up into the town to the Prefect, where I get my passport visé to Strasburg. This costs me some three hours waiting for another train. All had gone wrong the whole day and I was in no jolly frame of mind as after dark I entered the station at Strasburg and put up at the inn "de L'Esprit"—the tavern of the Holy Ghost! Sleep is good for a man. He feels more at peace with himself and the world after the night's rest. So, Oct. 19th, I went to the Cathedral and enjoyed its dim religious light, its painted windows, its grand architecture, and then to the prefect for another visé!

"I will go on this afternoon, stop over night somewhere and reach Paris in the middle of the day, where one warm heart, from old college days awaits me," said I.

"Come again at eleven," said the official to whom I applied.

At eleven, the man whose particular signature was wanting, had not been in. "Come again at three in the afternoon," they told me.

"But I shall lose the train," said I.

"What can we do about it?" was the reply.

3 P.M. "Come again at four." Well, the train was long since off, so it made little difference with me now. At four the important document was handed me, but was only visé to Chalons. There is then nothing to do now but go on in the night train to that city and there get a new visé. In the station house, it occurred to me to ask of the policeman if I must stop at Chalons? He rather laughed at me for putting so simple a question.

"Nobody will look at your passport," he said, "take your ticket direct to Paris."

Well, he ought to know, and I did so; rode all night; reached this city, Saturday, Oct. 20, just as I reached Berlin, Oct. 20, 1849, feeling myself in a very strange garret.

As to this passport business I can't understand it, but I have fully made up my mind to three things, (after thus losing three days' time and some twelve or fifteen dollars), which I add as

MORALS.

I. Do not go round when the direct route lies right before you—as from Cologne to Paris.

II. Before you travel in Europe see that the passport is in order.

III. Never go out of your way to do a good-natured act.

A. W. T.

Cimarosa.

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

The Matrimonio Segreto and Il Barbiere are works endowed with eternal youth; there is no need of singing this refrain that was written to celebrate the happiness of Alcestis and Admetus, and set to such beautiful music by Gluck.

Parez vos fronts de fleurs nouvelles,
Tendres amants, heureux époux!
Le printemps et l'amour, de leurs mains immortelles,
S'empresment d'en cueillir pour vous.

The flowers with which Cimarosa and Rossini knew how to adorn the brows of their favorite scores need not wait for Spring and Love to come to renew them. Genius has given them immortality; they will enchant with their freshness and perfume, the future generations, (to which nevertheless such odd things are dedicated), as they have enchanted our fathers, and as they now enchant us.

It is because this union of Alcestis and Admetus, that model and paragon of human unions, was intimate close, complete, as is also the union of words and sounds, of melodies and situations in these two productions so full of genius.

Never has music spoken better, never has language sung better. There is no need that you should be dilettante, or know a word of Italian; you can understand, the play of the actors assisting you, both the Matrimonio and the Barbiere, not with that mild and vague sort of comprehension which takes in only great things, but with that lively perception, that lets nothing pass, just as you understand the most ravishing pieces of the Theatre Français. O Cimarosa! O Rossini! In your mouths does music indeed become an universal language.

Nor is it alone by a community of genius that these two beloved sons of the Italian Muse are united. There are other bonds of union. See with what expressions of tenderness, respect and admiration, the survivor speaks of his predecessor. Hear him pronounce those words which he repeats so willingly. "When, said he, I was all powerful at the Theatre Italien of Paris, I caused the Matrimonio Segreto to be brought out by Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, Mme. Malibran and Mlle. Sontag. It is a treat which I offered to myself."

We must believe, for the credit of the public of that time, that it knew how to enjoy as it should, the divine enjoyment of such a work given by such interpreters.

In his youth, Rossini had the good fortune to find his equal in love and admiration for Cimarosa. This was the Cardinal Gonzalvi, an intelligent, amiable and tolerant man who constituted alone, during a pontificate, the whole Papal government. Every Thursday the artist went to dine with His Eminence, and in the evening they cimarosa-ed together most zealously. At first it was only two airs, lately taken from the immense repertoire of the author of the Matrimonio, prepared during the week with the greatest care. Then they wandered at pleasure as the recollection or fancy of the moment might dictate. Sometimes the Cardinal shed abundant tears even at hearing mere buffo airs by the master of this class of airs. Stendahl, who knew this fact, attributes it to the great dilettantism of the statesman. But he overlooks a fact which information from the most reliable source enables us to establish, viz: that Monsignore and Cimarosa had been connected by the closest friendship, had passed their youth together, and that they had given, with each other's assistance, many a serenade under the balconies of the fair Roman ladies. And so, all is explained.

Perhaps also, the all powerful minister of State, knew, more surely than it could be known in his time, or in our own, the true cause of the premature death of his admirable friend, which all Italy attributes to the imprisonment of Cimarosa in the abominable dungeons of Naples, after the reaction caused by Queen Caroline and Lord Nelson.

The crime of the composer was having written a cantata in honor of the Parthenopean Republic. It is true that he had also written, in 1786, for a royal birthday, another cantata entitled: La Nascita del Delfino, and that the Parthenopeans had just the same reasons for imprisoning him that the Carolins had. But revolutions pardon oftener than do counter-revolutions.

Whatever the cause, whether dilettantism, memories of friendship, or regret for the loss he had suffered, the Cardinal was never weary of weeping at the music of Cimarosa, and Rossini was never weary of singing it.

So things went along for some time, but with a slight change, which however, is nothing musical in its nature. The maestro could not fail to discover, with his rare erspiciaci, that the table of his Eminence was very far removed in many points, from the immutable laws of the hygiene of a singer. So in the interest of his vocal organ, he came to dispense with the dinners, but always continued faithful to the soirées, the most delightful of his whole life.

Cardinal Gonzalvi had a fine bust of Cimarosa made. As soon as he was no longer all powerful, this piece of sculpture was banished to the obscurest corner of the Capitol. Terrible effect of the cantata, which brought about the ostracism even of the bust of the great man! Surely, musicians should never write anything of this dangerous class.

The fecundity of Cimarosa was prodigious. The Matrimonio is his sixty-seventh work, and, (what confounds one with amazement,) the single number sixty-six, of the catalogue that we have before us, comprises five hundred detached pieces composed at St. Petersburg for the service of the Court of Russia. Now five hundred such pieces are equal in amount, to twenty-five operas of twenty pieces each.

He has left eighty-two works, of which the first is the Baronessa Stramba, and the last Artemisia. One of these works Il Convito di pietra on the subject of Don Juan, bears the date of 1782. It is then anterior to that of Mozart. We must believe that this opera embraces great beauties, for after its first representation the Venetians conducted the author in triumph with torches from the theatre to his residence.

Born in 1754, Cimarosa began his career at the age of nineteen years, which was terminated by death at the age of forty-seven. So, in the space of twenty-eight years, he wrote the prodigious repertory of which we have indicated the extent above by some figures.

The most salient trait of the genius of this great man is the inexhaustible abundance of melodic ideas. Again and again he invents new ones bearing the stamp of the most sparkling comic power or of the most touching sentiment. Nor is he wanting in tragic force, in great situations, although it is not his predominating quality.

At times, he attains it with so powerful a hand that he rises to the level, perhaps even above the most famous masters of the serious school, as in the admirable air of the Sacrifice of Abraham in which the most beautiful and happiest of modulations comes in to give to one of the finest theatrical situations known, an accent and relief altogether unparalleled.

It is needless to say that Cimarosa wrote well for the voice. That would be superfluous. He was Italian and had received his musical education in the Neapolitan school of the eighteenth century, the mother and nurse of so many masters who are comparable at least, for purity of style to our great writers of the seventeenth century.

His orchestration is limited almost entirely to the quartet of stringed instruments. From time to time he mingles some touches of flute, oboe, clarinet, horn or bassoon; but he uses them with extreme moderation. In the Matrimonio, for example, there is no longer any flute after the third morceau. With these limited resources, then, with which our contemporary sonorists would not be contested to accompany the ditties of a little girl playing with a doll, he produces all the effects, obtains all the colors, and brings into relief all the accents. In the celebrated air, Pria che spunti, a simple clarinet added to the quartet gives a coloring, a poetry and a feeling to the orchestration, which it would seem impossible that so simple a thing could produce.

What surprises one the most in an attentive hearing of the Matrimonio is the infinite variety that Cimarosa draws from his quartette of stringed instruments. Mozart has done differently, but has done no better, and if, in his manner of treating the quartet, we find more interior ornamentation, we find more amplitude, more flow, so to speak, in that of Cimarosa.

A complete essay upon the form that Cimarosa gives to his musical morceaux, would, it seems to us, be very interesting; but, as we are unable to give it in this place, we will indicate the principal points.

The morceaux of Cimarosa are almost always divided into two great parts, the first in a slow movement, the second more rapid. In the first, he exposes and develops one after another the ideas of his libretto, keeping the strictest fidelity to the sense and accentuation of the words. His melodies, which might be called the melody of diction, has in truth all the nature of the best recitative; but it has contour, color, and a serpentine line, if we may borrow this expression from the vocabulary of the plastic arts, of which the finest recitative approaches neither the head or the hands as Panurge says.

His ideas once stated and well developed, he resumes them again in the rapid movement of the second part, making use of the same words, to which he returns to strengthen them. It is precisely the way of proceeding of orators in the peroration of their discourses. With this difference, that orators express themselves in prose, while the melody of Cimarosa is an ensemble of the finest musical verses that can be found.

But the difference to be especially noticed between the manner in which Cimarosa treats musical discourse and that employed by Paisiello and Rossini, is that Cimarosa, the better to follow all the movements, all the intentions of the words, and the better to construct, in a word, his melody of diction, invents a new song almost every instant, and does not repeat his principal motif often enough to confirm its character of principal motif, while Paisiello and Rossini make prodigious account of these repetitions, which making a refrain, form, in the body of the musical morceau, divisions and intervals of repose, which give to their songs by a just partition of these interior closes, a light, an effective power, an architectural beauty, so to speak, which those of Cimarosa have not in the same degree.

A morceau of Cimarosa is a discourse in free verse, one by Rossini is a collection of stanzas. Discourse, ode—with these two words, one can get a general idea, sufficiently just, of the differences that separate these two immortal masters, who are united elsewhere by this almost divine faculty of melodic invention.—Opinion Nationale.

Throned.

A TALE OF NORWAY.

In the midst of the most mountainous regions in Norway, there is sometimes found a warm dell, which has been fertilized and afterwards become inhabited. Oftener though, such a place is only fenced in and made available as pasture land. The grass is gathered into a barn and remains stored up there, till winter has hardened the roads, when it is carried by cart-loads down to the principal farm-yard. It seldom happens that any one settles there, more seldom yet, if the small tract of land lies three or four miles distant from other farms; the smooth even road and ordinary weather do not lead exactly to that spot. For this reason it is mostly some adventure-loving soul, who undertakes to venture there upon a neighborhood with himself. Amid such a scene, called the Kettle-bottom, Throned was born. The mother sprinkled him with a little water, saying: "Be called Throned, in God's name; such was the name of my father before thee and it will injure no one, to be named after him." Alf her husband sat by; he said nothing and so that was all of it. This took place during the autumn, but spring must come again, ere the couple could fight their way through to the church, to let the priest's hand sanctify and confirm what had been done. Their kinsfolk in the village had well expected such a ride to church, for when the couple appeared there one Sunday, and begged for company and godfathership, Arne, the blacksmith said: "Tis none too early for you to come." "Hem, early enough!" answered Alf. "This was Throned's first visit to church. He was eight years old, and had not yet made the second. 'Can I not get to see that big house also, which they call church, father?' asked the boy. 'Take him once with thee to the village!' demanded the mother, but Alf replied: 'I have enough to carry besides'—and so the matter was dropped for this time. Since Throned's second year, another had been added to the peasant's family. It was not another child, 'for such I have no room' said Alf. It was a poor servant, who was to nurse the child, while the parents were gone to the woods or into the village; and for that purpose they had taken a girl, ten years old and half deaf, whom they could get without wages. In her presence and that of his mother, the soul of the boy was first roused to consciousness; these two his eyes saw daily, hourly. He was not long in comprehending, that he had to cry aloud to the one, to speak low to the other—which his intuitive imagination interpreted in this way; that all the servant-maid bore in her mind was heavy, but that which filled his mother's soul, was light and cheerful, if he only could get hold of it. The father seldom spoke to him; he had hard work to do during the day, and was tired when he came home. On Sundays he slept, to get fresh strength for the week, and therefore this day was the worst for the boy. 'Hush, be still, Throned!' whispered the mother incessantly, and beckoned menacingly with her hand. But the father had long since attained so large a place in the boy's dreamy fancies, that he did not even wish to talk to him. Such was the case since that Christmas eve, when Throned got his new cap; they had candle light burning on the table (instead of the train oil-lamp,) ate grits with cream and they sang. Then the father had drawn forth a bottle, such as Throned had never seen—for "it was white." After Alf had drunk out of it, he had taken the boy on his lap, had stared gloomily into his eyes and called out: "Pooh, you imp!" Then he had said: "I see thou art not afraid—and therefore thou shalt now hear a fairy tale." This tale told of a fairy who rode in one night from the King's castle at Copenhagen up to Walders (in Norway.) He, the father, stood behind on the sleigh next to Jutul, a goblin, and had great difficulty in holding tight on during the fast ride.

Something so wonderful Throned had never heard in all his life; he could never get it "out of his head," and for several years connected it with the ideal person of his father. If the latter came home late he had been at Copenhagen; if he laid down to rest tired and had a turn, it was only because the goblin had been driving too hard, and on the whole nothing about him went in the common natural course. All that lay beyond the horizon of his home, was in his opinion Copenhagen or Walders; it lay marvellously remote, far, far off and these things did not wind up plainly as every thing at home. The tale filled his mind so entirely for several days and nights, that for a while he did not think of asking his mother or Randi (the deaf girl) for more of that kind. To his great delight however, the mother knew many stories, yet nevertheless none, that equalled the first in any way. The most remarkable feature in those of the mother was, that both the cat and the sheep, as well as the cow, could speak for some time; and if they could not actually do it always, yet "they often come very near it," Throned said—while he cast, somewhat oppressed, a glance across the room at the old cat. Besides there was many a thing in the woods, from which it was best to keep at a distance as it seemed. The goblins were to be seen now here, now there, and when twilight was settling down, Throned fancied he saw, how they wrapt in mists and vapors, the whole little flock of cows and sheep. The father soon found out that the mother was in the habit of telling him tales, but he did not like to hear of it. Only when Throned was afraid to go out-doors, Alf became so angry, that he said to his wife; it served her right that the goblins should come and fetch her away, just for having frightened the boy so. So then it is true indeed that there are goblins, "Throned thought and pressed closer to the mother, seeking for shelter. From this time forth, she would not narrate any thing more to him, and he therefore addressed himself to Randi, who was always so silent and kept by herself. She knew only one story of a blind girl, who might get her sight back, if a beautiful prince should come and offer her his hand and half his kingdom. The Lord's word he learnt late enough; it was the father himself, who made the son acquainted with that, for Alf was a well read man. It was all taught him in the very words of the Scriptures, but it did not quite impress itself in the brain of the boy exactly, as it stood in the book. God, the father, was to him for a long time the highest King of Goblins with a grey beard and large eyes; he lived somewhere quite near and could see all. For his sake it was also not advisable to dip his finger again in the cream pot, while the mother was at the cow stable.

Throned might be about nine years old, when on a winter's evening after Christmas, a stranger entered the house, carrying a box upon his back. "God's peace be over thy house!" said he, looking around; Throned stole quietly over to Randi: "God's peace to thee also!" said the mother, and she pushed a stool towards him, in order to make him sit down. "Are not you the Fiddle-Knud?" she then said, when the fire flickered brighter and lit up his face. "This time you are not mistaken, Aaste, he replied—many a thing we have gone through, since I played on your wedding-day." Now he related, that he had been in the village on the other side of the mountains till after Christmas, and had earned a good deal of money. On his way home, just on the summit of the mountain, he felt so strangely unwell, that he had thought it would be best again to mingle among men, before walking over the heath. Thronnd noticed that the man had black hair, which he had never seen before—and wore a jacket much longer than that of his father. He had a scar on his face and did not say: "In Jesus name," when he sat down to eat. This man soon after became so sick, that he had to go to bed. "I believe, I shall not get up any more," he said. "Ah, don't talk so," replied Aaste and she covered him up warmly. Thronnd had to lie on the floor this night, the fire flashed on the hearth and he could not sleep. All at once he felt very cold, especially on one side; but he well understood, why it was so, for he fancied he was lying out in the forest. He was astonished and wondered how he got there, the fire he saw at a great distance, and yet it must be burning in the house because the stranger guest was sick. He rose to approach the fire, yet he could not move from the spot. He struggled and pressed forward—for how in the name of God could a whole night be passed in the woods? Then he heard singing, far, far away. He had heard the melody previously—it was a choral—first one sang, and that was the mother, then there were two, three, twenty, many—it was so sweet and delightful to hear.—All at once there was a dead silence and one said: "Let us take him up and carry him somewhere." Then he recollected that he was in the wood—he felt cold again and wanted to cry, but he could not. "They say it is good to say a Paternoster," he thought, yet he could not find the beginning. Now somebody seized him by the shoulder, so that he got his speech back again and called out, "Mother!" in a way to make him shudder at his own voice. "You sleep very restlessly," she said; she stood near him and assisted him in getting up. Of the stranger he saw nothing more; he had gone away, the mother said.

The next day the father came home and worked at a black box—the mother came down from the garret in her black dress—she was to go to the village. She came home, accompanied by three men, who looked so much like one another! Though one had a high pointed cap and the others wore flat caps, yet Thronnd could never make out, which of the men it was, who wore the high cap. They ate and then placed the box, which the father had made, on a cart. "Here is one more" said the mother, and then came to meet them with the box, Knud had carried on his back. "Ay this one he may take, one of the men said, pointing at Thronnd. The mother asked him to thank the man. "Use it as well as he did who left it to you," said the latter and laughed. Then they went slowly away. "What is in this box mother?" the boy asked, when they stood in the room again. "Look at it yourself." That he did. In a handkerchief there lay something fine and light; so light it seemed, that Thronnd remained seated and only looked at the thing. "Take it!" said the mother. "It will not break, I hope?" he asked, and put his finger upon it. Quite pale he started back and springing up, "It weeps!" he exclaimed. Thus it happened that Thronnd got his violin. The violin was black and so was also the Bohemian, who owned it, and whether it was for was not he fancied, that the two resembled each other. That which to him was new and mysterious in the man, he ascribed also to the instrument and that night of witcheries, in which the stranger had arrived, lay in it also, with all its contradiction to reality, its dreams and truth. Alf had once learned a little fiddling, and great was Thronnd's earnest devotion, when he learned of his father how to handle it. It filled the boy almost with awe, in spite of himself, when his father compelled the instrument to sing the only two melodies, which he knew, namely: The "Lur-Song" and the "Haukefeld." All the fairy tales, nay even all, that he had ever thought, had now to follow him and actually danced over the chords. The bow was Jutul, the goblin, and when he rushed over all the strings and through all the scales, this was again the fairy, who rode from Copenhagen to Walders in one night. The "soft quint" was his mother, the next string, which always followed the mother was Randi, the third one had a rough voice and that was the father; the bass was a magnificent chord, but mysterious—it resounded up to him, he was almost afraid of it and dared not give it any name. If he brushed it so, that it made only one tone together with the third, then they seemed like the three strangers; they looked so much alike, that he never knew which of them wore the high cap. If he made the bow strike with its own weight, so that it played very softly as if heard in the distance, this was the goblin, who played within the mountain. A blunder on the "quint" was the cat, one on the bass-string—the cow. Every dance which he learned, was again something definite. One was Moses, who stammered and struck with his staff, another one was the mother in her black robe, at last one tune composed only of long strokes,—that was the king. "But for this constant fiddling," the father exclaimed, scolding, "Ah, thou hast no reason to complain, thou art out-doors the whole day long," answered Aaste, but what shall we say, who have no ease nor peace from sunrise to sunset? "Take the fiddle from him!" said the father. "I have often thought of it" said the mother, but on the next day she taught him a new dance. She knew more melodies, than she herself was conscious of, for Aaste had not always been past thirty, and had not always lived as quietly as now. "What dost thou think of mother?" said, the boy sometimes—"for well nigh half an hour, thou hast been singing the same song for me."

Up to this time he had never yet been allowed to go out with them on the pasture grounds; now not a fine day passed, without his wandering about on the heights alone. If he felt oppressed occasionally, he played on his violin and whatever there was of evil about him, that he forced into it too. When he sat on the mountain-bog, playing, nothing stood fixed before him—neither hills, nor bush, nor rock—they floated. Yet when he became older, he made up dancing-pieces by himself, and since he played the greater part of the day, all that he had learned and experienced, became interwoven also. Every dance, therefore, appeared to him alike beautiful and it never occurred to him to try a comparison; for they all were a work of necessity, every piece. He only perceived that formerly whole melodies bore the signification of his father, mother, the mountain or the wood, while now one single stroke might be thus interpreted. Finer and more attractive, every dance became to him, the more he put into it of feeling and imagination. Once he heard his father relate, that a boy, a little larger than he, had made much money by his playing at the last market fair. This startled him and the idea began to whirl about in his brain. "The boy certainly could not play as I do?" Thronnd thought. When the time of the next fair approached, he asked his mother, when not in his father's hearing, whether he might not go to the market with them. "You are crazy, boy! never let any thing of that kind come to the ears of your father!" said his mother. Yet one day, when they worked together in the field, she said to Alf: "We really act sinfully with the boy; only one single time he has got away from the spot where he first saw the light—that was when he was first baptized." "Ay, we shall miss him soon enough," said Alf, so that the mother felt a strange woe creep round her heart. Since that time Thronnd was silent; but then again once, when they threshed rye, she ventured farther on. "He, our Thronnd I mean, plays really so beautifully, that he might earn a fine lump of money at the market, take him along, do!" Alf knew how many things the boy would see there, which would afterwards revolve in his brain,—therefore he said: "That might be dear money to us, which he would earn there." Aaste looked at him and remained silent. But when the boy had once directed his eyes to the outward world, he could never turn them back again into himself. Upon another time, some months afterwards, Alf and Aaste spoke at the dinner table about some new settlers near by, who were just to be married; but they had great trouble in getting one thing and another done for them; among others, they could not obtain musicians. Why, God bless them! could not I be the musician? thought Thronnd; but he did not say anything. He waited for his mother until she should be alone in the kitchen. And in spite of all the father had to suggest and remonstrate against, the mother was on the right way and bade the son to offer himself. "He is only a boy yet, but still he plays so, that you feel quite strange and sorrowful in your heart, said the mother, "Certainly he would come and accompany them to church, according to custom," suggested the bridal couple—"if it should not do—no matter, they would not mind it, but might then take another one at the village." Can you imagine any one more glad than Thronnd now was? All that he expected to behold there, met and mingled already with the tunes he was going to play, and it was only with great effort, that he endured the collision. Little he slept in those nights, which lay between that day and the nuptial festival, and from the moment he rose, till late, when his father returned, he played unremittingly. He went with his violin from the chamber to the wood, from the rocky steep down to the fir tree precipice, and played. "Thou art actually fading away my boy," said his mother, pushing his hair back from his forehead. "Ay, I must see what I can do!" said Thronnd.

The String Quartet.

The String Quartet is one of the purest musical fundamental forms. It grew up with the Symphony both nursed by the hands of the same masters. While these, in their large orchestral works, calculated for large, spacious halls, addressed a large audience composed of the most varied elements, they are, in their String Quartet, so to speak, at home for their friends and selected guests. They then approach us confidentially, and disclose to us their most secret thoughts and emotions. The String Quartet remains far behind the Symphony, in point of power of sound and variety of tone coloring, but it gains by this very limitation an increase of life and richness of development. Precision and delicacy of drawing compensate for the missing charm of colors.

Four of the noblest members of the orchestra step out and form a sub-committee for a general talk on musical affairs. They are all of the same family, and consequently all entitled to an equal share in the debate. Each may demonstrate his individuality freely, but with that due consideration of the opinions of his fellow committee-men which their high standing in the musical world entitles them to. Each must be independent but not inconsiderate; each must sustain an opinion of his own, but also listen to the reasoning of others; in short, the whole must resemble a lively exchange of ideas and remind of the manner in which four well-bred persons converse on a subject which is equally interesting to all. In other words: the characteristics of the String Quartet an polyphonic treatment and the strictest unity and logical development in its construction.—Gumprecht.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 10. — Like another Gibbon, I record another Decline and Fall. I place upon the archives of Dwight's the fall of Bernard the Great and his operatic dynasty.

Ullman had made extensive preparations for this season at the Academy of Music. If you had met him on any street corner during the past summer, and questioned him about the winter opera he would smile feebly at your benighted ignorance in regard to it, and would then hint mysteriously at the vast preparations and vaster plans which he had under way. Only great operas were to be produced this season, and only great singers were to sing them. Formes, Stigelli, Fabbri, Angri, Czillag, Colson, and others would be mentioned and then the Impressario would have given such a significant nod as if to say, "Wait, ignorant, but well meaning mortal, wait till fall and then prepare thine eyes and ears for sounds they never saw or heard before! Wait till Fall!"

Fall came and a fall indeed it proved to Ullman. No promulgated magnificent advertisements and made the usual affecting appeals to the public. He dilated upon Granger's armor and upon the mise en scene of future operas. He announced La Juive for the opening night, and when the time came a crowded house argued well for the success of the season.

Probably, our Academy of Music never before presented so brilliant an appearance at an operatic representation. The boxes were filled with handsomely dressed women and the whole house was brilliantly lighted with the same illuminations used at the Prince of Wales Ball. Then the opera was admirably done. The scenery and grouping were unsurpassed, the processions really splendid and the acting and singing of FABBRI, STIGELLI and FORMES everything that could be desired; there was plenty of orchestra, plenty of good singing, any amount of enthusiasm, not quite enough voice from ANNA BISHOP, and a considerable superfluity of QUINT. The opera was a success and the press was unanimous in its praise.

The second night was not quite so brilliant. Only a few of the extra Prince of Wales jets were lighted, and the audience was not as numerous as it ought to have been. The third night was a magnificent performance but rather small as to audience. On the fourth night it was much the same, and then Ullman came out in a card addressed to the Herald and copied by all the other papers if addressed to them, reading as follows:

SIR:—It is my painful duty to announce to the public that I am myself compelled to close the opera.

Notwithstanding the unanimity of approbation with which the "Jewess" has been received by the press and the public, the receipts after the first night have fallen greatly below the expenses. This I ascribe to the precarious state of affairs in general, and to the disorganization into which the opera has fallen during my absence in Europe.

Under these circumstances I can not do otherwise but retire from the management, and tender my best thanks for the generous aid I have received from the press, the artists, and all the employees of the opera.

I am, Dear Sir, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

Academy of Music, Dec. 4.

B. ULLMAN.

Then the opera singers who had all the time been panting for their salaries as the hart panteth for water-brooks, decided to take the management of the opera themselves, and re-opened it on Monday night with "Masaniello." The scenery was shockingly bad and the part of the Dumb Girl, performed as usual in the most incomprehensible manner. But Fabbri sang her little part of Elvira very well, and Formes was a primo Pietro and Stigelli a magnificent Masaniello. His mad scene in the last act was really thrilling; yet as a whole the opera did not go off as well as it might have done. Stradella was advertised for Saturday, but subsequently postponed till Monday night. The weather is now desperately disagreeable and the artists of the Academy have but a poor prospect of success.

CARL ANSCHUTZ appears to be involved in the fall of the Ullman Dynasty and his place as conductor of the orchestra is taken by THEODORE THOMAS the young violinist who looks "severe in youthful beauty" as he wields the baton — rather nervously it must be confessed — and directs the performance of venerable, spectacled, and bald-headed (no, not eagles) 'cellists and trombonists old enough to be his great-grandfathers. It is always a treat to me to see him in the orchestra. He plays the violin with such careless grace that even his elevation to the orchestral throne does not reconcile me to the loss of his violin performance. Remember that the man don't know me from Adam. I have a sort of general-admiration-for-artists theory. I admire a violin player, a singer (rather wild on the Stigelli question), a horn player, a flutist, and everybody in the orchestra or on the stage, but don't know or want to a soul of them. My experience with smart, clever people and folks of genius, has been that the less one knows of them personally the more one feels like admiring them artistically. So I should deem it an afflicting dispensation of Providence if I had to be personally acquainted with the delightful people I admire. Some day I mean to write you a description of the Academy of Music orchestra and its occupants; but it will be a purely laudatory affair.

That, however, has nothing whatever to do with MASON & THOMAS' soirées, which are certainly the most delightful musical entertainments in the city, after the opera. Dodsworth's room is never crowded to them, and I don't see how they pay. But the audience, though small, is always a splendid one to look at, and you know that staring at people is one of the great delights of going out to public places. There are more strongly individualized "characters" at one of these soirées than in any other assemblage of the same size I have ever joined. But I will not further infringe upon "—t's—" peculiar province by dilating on this entertainment.

Colson, Brignoli, and the rest of the Italian Opera Company are expected here next week to open with a concert the Irving Hall, on the corner of Irving Place and Fifteenth street, the largest public hall in the city, excepting the Academy of Music, which it is so near to. It will be used rather as a dancing than a music room. A concert is also announced for the benefit of HARVEY MAJOR, the one-armed cornet player.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the 42d Psalm; "As the Hart Pants." By Mendelssohn.

Valse, (E♭, op. 18.).....Chopin

So these pleasant concerts are over. And instead of looking forward to a musical treat of a Saturday evening, we shall have to be satisfied with reminiscences, pleasant enough, to be sure, but not the thing itself. We know however, that all things in the eternal round of events must come to a close, and so we yield to necessity and are content as best we can. Fortunately for them, some people can live just as contentedly with, as without those soirées, those at least, that could and did talk quite audibly, having a very nice chat no doubt, during the first and third movements of the C sharp minor Sonata. The only wonder is that such people go to these soirées at all. It seems as if they might enjoy themselves better by staying away. Those round them would surely.

Mr. DRESEL had the assistance of Miss MARY FAY and Mr. KREISSMANN. With Miss Fay he played the Allegro brilliant op. 92, (being No. 21 of Mendelssohn's posthumous works) in A major, and Miss Fay played the difficult Transcription by Liszt, of Schubert's Erlking. We had an opportunity on former occasions to admire Miss Fay's great technical powers. The pieces were well calculated to bring out this proficiency of hers. Her wrist is admirably trained, and the swift staccatoes of the Allegro, as well as the triplets of the accompaniment in the Erlking were played with surprising ease and strength. There was some nervousness apparent in the rendering of the latter piece, which we think might have been avoided by not risking too much. It is never a disgrace to play from notes. Had Miss Fay done so, she would have had strength and nerve enough to play that part of the piece, where it reaches its climax, just before the words of the text: "and in his arms the child was dead," with that degree of force necessary to give it its proper effect. The Allegro opening busily, mysteriously, much like some passages in the Midsummer Night's Dream, has a fine counter-theme in G major, in the style of the two-part songs, and is a most effective, sparkling piece.

The part of the programme played by Mr. Dresel himself included the C sharp minor sonata of Beethoven, with its brooding Adagio, its Allegretto full of pleasant memories, and its passionate, wild Presto—Finale. Whether it was our own frame of mind or not, that had given us an idea of the piece different from Mr. Dresel's conception of it, we are not prepared to say. But in the first movement the rendering seemed too bold and determined, in the last not bold and wild enough. The two preludes by Chopin in D flat and A major, No. 15 and 17 of op. 28, formed a fit transition from the sombre hues of the Sonata. The first of the two with its quiet melody was exactly the piece, to calm down the excitement of the Sonata. The second in A flat, graceful, lovely, contains a beautiful, genial, harmonic effect in its sixth measure, frequently repeated afterwards, where the dominant seventh and the subdominant of A flat follow each other immediately. The half melancholy, half bright Mazurka, in B minor, No. 4 of op. 33, with its trio-like part in B flat, passing in the second statement into B major, and its rovery for the left hand towards the close, was beautifully rendered. So were the two Etudes, the one in E major, No. 3 of op. 10, and the other in E minor from the first book of op. 25. Spirited also was the rendering of the Valse in E flat, op. 18, full of the fresh, fervent feeling of youthful passion. The March from the Divertissement à la Hongroise, op. 54, in C minor, is arranged from the original composition for four hands by Liszt. Schubert wrote a greater number of most beautiful piano pieces for four hands than any other composer. In this arrangement the Trio in A flat major is fortissimo and brilliant, while the original marking reads pianissimo, and only mezzo-forte in the second part. The change of character produced by doing this is to be charged to Liszt. Nor is the end of the piece in C major as Liszt put it. The mood of the slumber-song by Mr. Dresel is so admirably chosen, that it is to our mind one of the best of its kind existing. The feeling of rest combined with the gentle undulation truthfully represent the situation. In perfect keeping are the harmonic changes of the exquisite little piece. This transcription by the composer of the prize-song "Sweet and low" is an improvement on his original. We hope it will speedily be introduced here, when it has left the press of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel in Leipzig, where it is about to be brought out, as we understand. The Andante from Schubert's Symphony was beautifully played. The Symphony is rather full, and Schubert amassed in it enough musical material for two good sized symphonies. One could not help noticing the length of the piece, the orchestral effects adding charms, which were lost necessarily on the Piano.

The vocal portion of the programme was a valuable addition to the beauties offered in the other pieces. We think Mr. Kreissman never sang to greater advantage. His voice seemed to acquire new power and expressiveness from the evident inspiration under which he sang. The selection was unexceptionable. It is impossible to say which of the three songs by R. Franz was more graceful and lovely. The spring-song by Arndt, No. 3 of op. 23, in G major, almost throughout in light sixteenths is innocent and sweet; the summer-song by Goethe, No. 2 of op. 16 in C major, is graceful, with perhaps a shade more of joyous animation, while the "Serenade" No. 20, op. 17 in B major, is full of the serenity and sweetness of a night in spring, in its stillness interrupted only by the low breathing of the fresh balmy air. There is a naïve grace in this song, distinguishing it from the two others. The second song was a kind addition to the programme. Mr. Kreissmann sang them with all the grace the composer had embodied in them. But still more sympathetically he entered into the spirit of the two songs by Schumann. A peculiar, tender, mysterious atmosphere pervades the song Moonlight night, op. 39, No. 5 in E major. It is even more. There is a holiness in the simple melody, which seems concentrated in the second half of the musical sentence (m 10-13). The second song, No. 1 of the first book of op. 25 in A flat, is the dedication of a circle of songs, which he inscribed to his dear wife when she yet was FRAULEIN CLARA WIECK. It is a song of love full of deepest tenderness and warmth. He called those four books composing op. 25—a leaf from his autobiography—a "Myrtle-wreath." The myrtle in Germany takes the place of our orange-blossoms, encircling the brow of the intended wife, when, before the altar, "the vows are exchanged for life" as Goethe has it. This name is therefore a very fitting title to a series of songs written under the holy spell of pure love. The singing of Mr. Kreissmann was full of the fire of inspiration and one felt, that his heart was in his singing. The favorite Song by Robert Franz, op. 21, No. 1, "O, welcome, fair woods" so took with the audience, that it had to be repeated, which Mr. Kreissmann did, singing it as splendidly as the first time.

The hall was crowded to overflowing. These concerts formed an important part of our musical season, and we only hope, that the sequel of concerts may exhibit some of the taste and artistic feeling brought to bear on the arranging and carrying out of these concert-programmes. Such concerts, besides giving to the audience pleasant opportunities of revelling in "the Beautiful" embodied in the art of music, help raising the musical taste of a community, and are thus an absolute benefit. We never can have enough of them. There is a wish shared by many admirers of Mr. Dresel and true lovers of music, to which we will give utterance here. It is this, to hear Mr. Dresel in some sonatas with the violin or the violoncello. Though we were perfectly well satisfied with the programmes of this season, it yet seems as if it would add variety and charm to future programmes, to hear the piano in concert with stringed instruments, many of the purest gems of classical music being written for this combination of instruments.

We bid an unwilling farewell to those beautiful evenings, which brought together audiences of the highest character, the delightful hall being graced by the beauty and refinement of the Boston public. That the concerts were enjoyed and appreciated the full houses testify. These evenings will form a bright chapter of their own "Pleasures of memory" to many. *†

The Concert in aid of the German-English School at the Music Hall, on Monday of last week, was very fully attended, and gave pleasant anticipations of the projected series by the Philharmonic Society. The Symphony was the well known C major of Mozart; and, although the orchestra was inadequate in some respects, the performance gave us sincere pleasure. The violoncellos were sadly missed, and there was a lack of precision which further rehearsals will remedy. The pianists, Messrs. DRESEL, LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER, gave us a duo by Moscheles and the ever welcome "Invitation to the Dance," by von Weber. Mrs. HARWOOD sang Schubert's charming Barcarolle, with as much delicacy and spirit as before at Mr. Dresel's concert. But the poetry of this delightful song seems to us wasted in the large space of the Music Hall; it was far more satisfactory in a chamber concert. Mr. SCHULTZE played a fantasia from "Lucrezia Borgia," with his usual smoothness and grace.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Our correspondents will confer an additional favor upon us by mailing their communications so that they may reach Boston on or before Wednesday. They will thereby secure an insertion in the paper of the next Saturday, and save us the pain of throwing aside communications relating to matters of musical intelligence, that would have been valuable, (often invaluable), if received in season, but which depend for their value upon their freshness.

A FALSE REPORT.—The rumor that has been industriously circulated by mischievous persons the past few days, reflecting upon the credit and stability of Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS, the celebrated Piano Forte manufacturers, has not a shadow of truth. We are happy to say, upon the most reliable authority, that this firm were never in a more prosperous and solvent condition than at the present moment, having but few liabilities and immense assets and resources. With them there is no such word as fail.—Atlas and Bee.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—Mr. Adolph Sax, the inventor of the brass instruments which bear his name, has obtained an extension of his patent for five years.

At the Theatre Lyrique, Orphée has been given, alternating with the Val d'Andorre. At the Grand Opera, La Juive, with Mad. Vandenheuvel Duprez and Mlle. Marie Sax.

An Italian mezzo soprano, Mlle. Maria Talvo, who has attained a high reputation in Italy, has just arrived here. Her voice is one of great compass, purity and flexibility.

A new instrument, the Harmoniflute, has been used at some concerts in the Bois de Boulogne. It is introduced into the orchestra, and in the overture to the Pardon de Ploërmel is said to have been substituted for the organ with much success.

VIENNA.—Haydn's Oratorio Il Ritorno di Tobia which is said to have been found again by Franz Lachner in Munich, was written by Haydn, when 44 years of age, on words by Boccherini, then attached as poet to the Imperial theatre, and was in fact never considered lost in Vienna. The work was first performed in Vienna, on the 2d and 4th of April, 1775, for the benefit of the Musicians' Widows and Orphans Pension fund, repeated in March, 1784, enlarged with two new choruses and performed last in December, 1808. The Oratorio consists almost entirely of Recitatives and Airs written in the old style which Haydn afterwards in his Creations and Saisons entirely discarded. The two most important Choruses in the work have been performed repeatedly in the Concerts spirituels. One of them under the title of Storm Chorus, with Latin text, Insane vanx curæ, has become a favorite Motet for Church choirs. The score of the Oratorio entire may be found in the musical archives of Prince Esterhazy, and a duplicate copy in the library of the Society of the Friends of Music in the Austrian Empire. Notwithstanding all the respect due the immortal master it must be considered an ill advised step to drag this work forth from oblivion.—(Wiener Recensionen.)

DRESDEN.—The bronze statue of Carl Maria von Weber was uncovered on the 11th of October, in presence of the King and several members of the Royal family. The statue is placed in front of the Court-theatre. The model was finished by Rietschel, in 1858, and it was cast the year after at the works of Count Einsiedel, at Lanchhammer. The statue has a height of eight feet. The pedestal, of granite, is of the same height, and bears upon a bronze tablet the simple names of the great composer.

BERLIN.—Press and Public lavish the most extravagant praises upon a new Prima Donna, Signora Zelia Trebelli, from Madrid. She had appeared as Rosina in the "Barber," and Arsace in "Semiramide." Her voice ranges from F sharp below to D above the staff. She is reported to resemble Sontag in her sunniest days.

Mad. CASTELLAN, formerly well known in this country, who first took the rôle of Bertha, in the Prophète, is about to return to the lyric stage, from which she had withdrawn. She will sing first at Hanover.

OLE BULL has determined to make another artistic tour, and is soon to appear in Leipzig.

The Countess de Sparre, celebrated when Pasta sang at the Italian opera as the brilliant Mlle. Naldi, has received a legacy of $100,000. She is the daughter of Naldi, celebrated in his day for a buffo-comico Italian singer; but her retirement from the stage in 1823, upon her marriage with Count de Sparre, a French general, prevented her from acquiring the reputation she might easily have commanded had she pursued her profession. She received this legacy from Mons. Hermann Lippin, an old stock broker, who died childless, and without any kindred, a few days ago.

Hector Berlioz, the Parisian composer, has an admirer, who has proposed to advance $10,000 to the manager of the Lyric theatre, upon condition the latter brings out his opera, "Les Proyers." The malicious say (and this certainly detracts a great deal from the value of the compliment, if it prove true) the amateur who made this proposal entirely forgot to accompany it with his or his banker's address, without any regard for the manager's curiosity, which is greatly excited to discover this particular.

LOW VOICES.—There was a celebrated bass singer, of the name of MEREDITH, who lived some forty years ago, at Liverpool; he possessed a most powerful voice of great compass, and he was a man of six feet high, with a corresponding bulk. Meredith was informed that there was a man residing at a village in the Vale of Clwd, about forty miles from Liverpool, who could sing lower than he could. Jealous of a rival, he determined to pay the man a visit; so off he trotted, and, towards the evening of the second day's walk, he arrived at the village; and on being informed that John Griffith was digging in his garden, Meredith sauntered about for some time, taking a bird's eye view of the unconscious basso, who was but a little fellow compared with himself. At length, he drew himself up to his full height, and, looking over the hedge, said, on low A in the bass, "Good evening to you, friend." The digger rested on his spade, and answered on low D, a fifth below Meredith, "The same to you, friend." On which Meredith turned on his heel, and walked off, rather disconcerted for a time; but afterwards, he used to recount the adventure with a good deal of humor, concluding with, "So, the delver double D'd me, and be d—d to him."

We call the attention of those of the musical parents of this city, who have daughters growing up, to Mr. Zerrahn's advertisement. Children who show a taste for music should by all means be encouraged and taught to sing. It is not everybody who can have the luxury of a piano and a long course of training by a good teacher, nor are there more than one tenth of them that derive any real musical enjoyment from it afterwards. But vocal music such as beautifies one's home, and constitutes the means of admission to Choral Societies, is easily learnt. It will yet, and we trust, in not very distant time, be considered an indispensable accomplishment for young persons of good culture, to be able to read music correctly and readily. In the meanwhile it is well that men like Mr. Zerrahn should give their attention to this branch of instruction. We trust he will find encouragement. We understand that one set of classes such as he proposes is in successful operations.

The editor of the German Musical Gazette in Philadelphia, a paper, by the way, which we heartily recommend to our German musical friends, observes on piano-classes: "The opinions entertained by different competent persons on this subject, all agree, that only a very excellent teacher will meet with success in class-teaching, and that this method is the most inefficient one, when it is employed by no more than common talent."

CHOPIN'S MAZURKAS.—The Mazurkas of Chopin, which have been given in our music pages are taken from a volume of them now in press by Oliver Ditson & Co. It will be eagerly sought for by all skilful pianists on its appearance, who will also be interested in Madame Kinkel's remarks on the composer, to be found in the last number of the "Journal of Music."

New Music.

DES FREYSCHÜTZ, arranged for the Piano-forte by Alfred Devaux. Oliver Ditson & Co.

This arrangement of Weber's famous opera, which has filled our music pages for some time past, is now complete, and is a desirable addition to the musical libraries of amateurs. We learn from the Gazette Musicale that this opera has been translated into ten different languages, viz., French, English, Italian, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Russian, Bohemian and Polish, the original German making the tenth. This fact alone speaks for its universal popularity.

New Books.

A NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE. By Nathan Richardson, author of "The Modern School," &c. pp. 289. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

A method for the piano, containing all the instructions and exercises necessary to the acquisition of a tolerable mastery of the instrument, has long been a desideratum. To meet this want, we have methods by Beyer, Bertini, Cramer, Czerny, Hummel, Hanten, Knorr, Muller, &c.; none of which are entirely satisfactory, although each possesses some peculiar merit. An instruction book for the piano, in order to meet the wants of teachers and pupils, must possess certain characteristics, e. g.: 1st. A sufficient number of mechanical exercises, including the scales in every key, both major and minor, and in all movements. 2d. Studies to aid in the mastery of particular difficulties such as octaves, arpeggios, staccato, legato, singing tone, &c. 3d. There should be interspersed with these a number of extracts from different authors, to serve as amusements, studies in style, and for cultivating a correct taste. 4th. The book ought to contain complete, though concise directions, in regard to the manner of practising each exercise, study, or amusement. And finally, the whole ought to be arranged in a progressive order, from the very simplest exercise for beginners, to the extremely difficult studies, or exercises at the close.

In the Modern School, (published in 1853,) Mr. Richardson, then just returned from several years' study under the best masters in Europe, attempted to solve the problem. The "fundamental conception" was excellent; but the execution was faulty, from a lack, on the part of the author, of an extensive teaching experience, without which no one can write a good elementary book in any branch of knowledge. In the words of Mr. Richardson, the method was unsatisfactory in relation to "the difficult progressions and management of many important features in a course of piano tuition, a skilful treatment of which is indispensable to the pupils' rapid progress." Even the mechanical exercises were not well arranged. The scales in double thirds and sixths were introduced very near the beginning of the book, and their difficulty either discouraged the enthusiastic tyro, or they were too often omitted entirely, thereby depriving the pupil of their very important aid in the development of the muscles of the hand and wrist. The compositions interspersed as examples of the styles of different authors, although tastefully and artistically selected, were too difficult for their place in the book. Indeed, Mr. Richardson seems to have lost sight of the apostolic remark concerning "milk for babes." In the new method he has embodied the results of several years' study of the short comings as well as of the excellencies of the Modern School. A set of plates, showing the position of the hand while in the act of performing different passages, takes the place of the anatomical plates in the Modern School, and is a decided improvement. The elements are quite full and satisfactory. The practical part of the book may be classified as follows:—1. Five finger exercises. 2. A complete library of scales. 3. Studies from Bertini, Cramer, Czerny, &c. 4. Amusements.

These are interspersed in just about the right proportions, and the progressive character of the work is well preserved. Of the necessity of the finger exercises and scales nothing need be said. We are glad to find the book so full in this respect. A study, properly so called, is a composition written expressly to aid in the acquisition of the mastery of some particular effect or difficulty, and the musical effect is made to depend upon the perfect rendering of this difficulty. In Europe much greater prominence is given to studies than in this country. (Indeed, Bertini's method is almost entirely made up of studies, and this is the good point of the work while the drawback is, they are all original, and hence the great uniformity of style.) In this book there is a very good selection of these, numbering twenty-seven, besides some fifteen which are called "amusements," but which properly belong on this head. The "amusements" are numerous and of almost every grade of difficulty. The sources whence these are taken are not indicated; but we are able to identify the following: chorus from Norma (17)—a barcarolle (18)—Hunting chorus in "Der Freyschütz" (29)—waltz (Derniere pensée de Carl Maria von Weber) Reissiger (31)—andante from Clementi (35)—chorus from I Puritani (40)—cantabile by Schulhoff (45)—Mazurka by Schulhoff (46)—Songs without words by Mendelssohn (48 and 49)—nocturne by Drey-schock (51) and a grand finale that looks as if Liszt might have "had a hand in it."

There are some morceaux in this work that will prove grateful "show pieces" for amateur players. We may mention amusements 45, 46, 48 and 51; all good, sensible music. There have been two editions published, one having European and the other American fingering, so that all may be suited in this respect. We have at length an instruction book for the Piano, that is complete without being too voluminous: interesting, but not superficial; thorough but not tedious. If pupils have common sense and perseverance, this book is just the thing for them. If teachers are laborious and painstaking, they will find the "New Method" a valuable auxiliary to their labor, while if they are lazy and careless, it means they should set their pupils at work in the "New Method," in assurance that with it the pupil must make some progress. We believe, however, that by far the most important field for usefulness for a book like this, is in the country; since the city teachers, with their ready access to the music stores, can select such studies, exercises or pieces as are adapted to the wants of their pupils, and the method they may use is of less consequence, while its defects may be so readily remedied. In the country, on the other hand, the teacher, far removed from music stores, is at the mercy of the dealers, who often inflict on him quantities of unsaleable trash. Parents object to an additional bill for music, or the teacher is not competent to select properly, so it happens that scholars in general buy but one "instruction book" and no "studies," and it is therefore important that they be furnished at the outset with a really complete "method" for the instrument. We therefore confidently recommend this book to our country friends, both teachers and pupils, who will here find a complete library of "materials," for piano playing, and a good assortment of some thirty amusements.—National Quarterly Review for December.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

From childhood's dawn. Ballad. Opera of
"Robin Hood." 25

My own, my guiding star. " 25

Two of the choicest gems from Macfarren's new Opera which has achieved a complete and genuine success at the Royal Opera house in London. The first is a sweet air, sung by a Barytone in the Opera; the last one, by the excellent singing of Sims Reeves, has become an established favorite in the English drawing-room. Other songs, duets, &c., from this opera will follow immediately.

At last. (L'incontro.) Romance for Contralto or Baritone. Brambilla. 25

There is such a dearth of good Contralto songs that this really fine Italian Romanza will not have to go begging for buyers. It is easy of execution.

When glasses take their merry round. Song.
C. Lloyd. 25

Likely to become a standard song at convivial meetings.

Hearts feel that love thee. Trio for female voices from "Athalia." Mendelssohn. 25

A most beautiful Trio, published now for the first time in this country. Teachers of female classes in vocal music should not neglect to introduce it. As a Parlor Trio for three solo voices it is also very pretty.

Evening Shadows. Song. Mrs. Howland. 25
A pleasing ballad. Easy.

Instrumental Music.

Shall I again behold thee? (Werd ich dich wiedersehn?) Reverie. C. Voss. 25

This little piece, one of Voss' earlier works has long enjoyed an immense popularity among amateur players in Germany. It is a real gem. The sentiment of the title is charmingly expressed by the music.

Anne Lisle. Varied. Chas. Grobe. 50

A new set of Variations by the always fascinating Grobe is quite a piece of good news for the world of piano-players, at large. His subject this time is a popular song by Thompson, which appears to best advantage as exhibited by the eminent professor.

Rural festival. (Nebelbilder, No. 16.) Oesten. 25

Hope. " " 12. " 25

Lament and consolation. " " 14. " 25

Pretty little sentimental pieces.

LIBRETTOS OF SAFFO, LE PROPHETE, and DI-NORAH, (Le Pardon de Ploermel). Each with Italian and English Words, and the Melodies of the Principal Airs. 25

The above are this week added to the popular Series of Opera Librettos published by Ditson & Co. They are perfect gems in their way and deservedly favorites among the admirers of the Opera.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Sent to Heaven.

I had a message to send her,
To her whom my soul loved best ;
But I had my task to finish,
And she had gone home to rest.

To rest in the far bright heaven—
Oh, so far away from here ;
It was vain to speak to my darling,
For I knew she could not hear.

I had a message to send her,
So tender, and true, and sweet ;
I longed for an angel to bear it,
And lay it down at her feet.

I placed it one summer evening
On a little white cloud's breast ;
But it faded in golden splendor,
And died in the crimson west.

I gave it the lark, next morning,
And I watched it soar and soar ;
But its pinions grew faint and weary,
And it fluttered to earth once more.

To the heart of a rose I told it ;
And the perfume, sweet and rare,
Growing faint on the blue bright ether,
Was lost in the balmy air.

I laid it upon a censer,
And I saw the incense rise ;
But its clouds of rolling silver
Could not reach the far blue skies.

I cried in my passionate longing :
"Has the earth no angel friend
Who will carry my love the message
That my heart desires to send ?"

Then I heard a strain of music,
So mighty, so pure, so clear,
That my very sorrow was silent,
And my heart stood still to hear.

And I felt in my soul's deep yearning
At last the sure answer stir—
"The music will go up to heaven,
And carry my thought to her."

It rose in harmonious rushing
Of mingled voices and strings,
And I tenderly laid my message
On the music's outspread wings.

I heard it float farther and farther,
In sound more perfect than speech ;—
Farther than sight can follow,—
Farther than soul can reach.

And I know that at last my message
Has passed through the golden gate ;
So my heart is no longer restless,
And I am content to wait. A. A. P.

Musical Culture.

V.

CRITICISM.

One of the most powerful agencies for promoting musical culture is criticism. The critic is, or can be the instructor of both the public and the musicians ; he acts as a medium between the two, explaining their mutual relationship, the needs and wants of the former, the character and position of the latter. In short, criticism is an institution indispensable wherever the progress and welfare of arts and artists form the objects of earnest labor. It is, however, not always practiced to promote ends so noble, but often employed as an instrument for carrying out the private designs of unprincipled individuals or whole cliques. The mania for criticizing musical compositions and performances is a characteristic trait of this age. Every one now-a-days is a judge ; though he has not the slightest knowledge of the art, and though his nature and occupation are decidedly unmusical. Just enter the shop of a barber, and it will not be long before you arrive at the conclusion that he wields the critical dissecting knife with the same facility as his razor. He will tell you that he has been at the opera last night, and there was a good deal of bad singing ; and as he waxes warmer will cut up the vocalists one by one so that nothing good is left of them. If a man has a second cousin who plays the piano, then his title to a professional critic is established beyond all doubt ; and we shall not have to wait long before we see him at his post, where, according to his meek or savage nature, he will servilely praise dabblers and masters with equal fervor, or indiscriminately condemn everything that may fall a prey to his pen.

It is quite plain that this trifling with criticism, so common now, must needs tend to weaken its force and lessen its beneficial influence. The result partly is that an able critic, who performs his functions as the disinterested and faithful servant of true art, seldom enjoys the confidence, respect and gratitude, either of the artists or the public, to which his labors entitle him. However pure his motives, however impartial his judgments there will always be persons to whom he appears as the interested champion of a certain party ; such persons, namely, as are unable to rise above the (alas !) popular opinion that a man cannot assiduously labor for a good cause without making it the pretext for some hidden design, which ultimately will be revealed in the shape of — dollars. Musicians are, moreover, a peculiar class of people, especially bravura-singers and players ; it is not always pleasant to deal with them. Their vanity rises sometimes to a marvellous pitch so that they firmly believe that every tone they produce is worth its ounce of praise, if not of gold ; and woe to the critic, who ventures a word on their short-comings ! In the first outbreak of anger they will threaten to cut his throat ; but being cooled down they content themselves with challenging him to come forward and show that he can do better than they ; pretending that no man has a right to pronounce a boot ill-made, unless he is a cobbler himself. Nor can they, in their ignorant or vanity be persuaded that this critic has something better to do than to make such little people an object of persecution ; but, that his duty demands, he should warn them, whenever their performances tend to exert a pernicious influence on the public taste. However, it is but just to add that no one esteems and appreciates an honorable critic more than the genuine musician ; he has in him something of the trust, simplicity and affection of a child, and looks upon the former as his instructor and adviser, nay, as his benefactor ; for which, indeed, he has sometimes good cause.

With respect to our theme we consider criticism as the third institution. Instruction lays the foundation for musical culture and continues it so far as the age and circumstances of the pupils may allow. Then follow public performances as the college follows the common school, where those desirous of improvement may enlarge their knowledge and perfect their taste by listening to music of a higher order, of more varied forms and styles, and on a larger scale than the instruction could provide ; they may also learn how to improve their execution, after the manner of the professors and virtuosi who appear here as the performers. Lastly comes the critic who tells them what was good and what was bad in the pieces performed, their tendency and history, the rank and character of the composers, and so on. He also commends or censures the performers in as much as they succeeded or failed in correctly rendering the works ; that is correctly with respect to the designs and intentions of the composer on one side, and the rules and laws of the practical, or executing, art on the other. In short, he seizes every opportunity for imparting useful information ; and while he corrects and elevates the taste of the public he holds up to the musician the ideal of pure and true art and encourages them to renewed efforts. The immaculate image of the divine muse is entrusted to his care, and like a faithful watchman his warning voice resounds whenever it is in danger. His is the noble prerogative to stand up for a genius, whom ignorance, false taste, or it may be malignity, have so long refused to recognize ; his the equally noble task to keep the reputation of acknowledged masters undefiled and to save their glory from the hands of those misguided critics, to whom nothing is sacred ; his also the meritorious, though often disagreeable, work to expose the emptiness and hollowness of the idols which cliques and factions set up for a credulous public to worship. Thus his influence is of the most beneficent kind, while his power seems unlimited.

But his functions do by no means permit him to live and labor continually in the highest spheres of the art ; he is frequently called upon to descend some steps lower and employ his influence for objects more tangible or practical. We must remember that the relation of artists and public is like that of two opponents. The former endeavor to obtain as much money, applause and fame from the latter as they possibly can, and sometimes they are unscrupulous enough to attempt obtaining it by cheat. The public, in their turn, demand an equivalent for what they give and often a great deal more ; their pretensions sometimes assume singular forms which tend to bewilder the artist, if not to ruin him. Some call for this kind of music, others for that kind; these expect to hear Beethoven, while those wish for Rossini; and thus there is no end of demands one contradicting the other. How useful a medium is here the critic, how easily can he allay the confusion! The impartial friend of both the contending parties he is constituted umpire between them, and his word is law. He is expected to know what the public need and what the musicians can and ought to do. He is solicitous that a good feeling be kept up between the parties, and, therefore, warns the performers when they imprudently commit actions that must necessarily disturb it; when, for instance, by ostentatious advertisements, they entice the public into a concert, where they find themselves sadly disappointed. They do not scruple to promise an orchestra of an hundred performers, though they never numbered more than fifty; they pledge themselves to play a Symphony and coolly leave out one-half of it, or substitute an inferior one for that announced on the programme. And thus we could go on a while mentioning practices alike insulting to art and public. While the critic exposes and thoroughly condemns such frauds he is nevertheless guarding the interests of the musicians in more than one way. With a few words he dispels preconceived notions, unfavorable opinions and prejudices, that might have materially damaged their artistic reputations. As he is the personal friend of the most prominent members of them; as he is always present at their social meetings and partaking of their pleasures, he is initiated into all their secrets and mysteries. He always knows when the singers have got bad colds, or when they have met with those small mishaps, that are of no consequence to an ordinary mortal, but which mercilessly harrow the poor nerves of a prima donna. Why did Signora Pollini sing so execrably, last night? Her intonation was uncertain, her time wavering, no tone clear and pure; what was the cause? Ask the critic; he knows it; he was in the "green room" before the commencement (to which of course he has admittance at any time), where he found Signora very much agitated. He will probably allude to it in his criticism; at all events he will inform the public that her failure last night must be ascribed to circumstances beyond her control; he will not suffer the reputation of an otherwise excellent artist to be injured.

But how should we finish, were we to enumerate all cases by which the practical efficacy of criticism is so clearly demonstrated?

The practical tendency of these articles, (as well as the present state of music in this country), relieves us from the obligation of treating of that kind of criticism in which musical compositions are judged, reviewed, and analyzed apart from performances. This forms a most important department in art journals, musical papers and reviews of the first class. The critic has here perhaps better opportunities than elsewhere for exerting his talents, his power and his influence in respect to musical culture. This branch of criticism can of course assume form and character only where the art of composition flourishes, of which it is the natural consequence. Let us hope that some creative genius may soon arise among us whose efforts will command the admiration of his country, and thus give abundant work to all critics, reviewers and art philosophers that are now or who may arise hereafter. BENDA.

The Diarist Abroad.

PARIS, Nov. 26. 1860.

"Hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

This comes from authority so good, as immediately to gain assent, and yet experience gives one a very different and much more vivid sort of faith in the saying.

The sixth week is passing since I came here and I still wait the "yes" or "no" which is to grant or refuse me permission to examine a mass of papers in one of the Archives, now musty with the lapse of three or four generations. But in these days of Italian Revolutions and Chinese wars, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has other things to think of than the petition of a "Yankee man from America," (John Galt's phrase). But to make a journey from Germany to Paris on the faith of French readiness to aid the cause of Art and literature, and not get a sight of papers a century old is a "sell" on the Yankee man.

Meantime, there are pictures to be seen, new and valuable acquaintances to be made, items to be gathered for "Dwight's Journal," Antiquarian bookstores to be searched, an opera occasionally to hear, "Paris to be learned," and divers other things to be done, to fill up the days and make them seem too short for the work to be done.

Speaking of — well, anything — I called again this morning on Alexander Vattermare, and my respect for the energy of the man and my wonder at his success amid discouragements which would have deterred almost any other man from further labor, were increased. What is the reason that his efforts in the cause of international exchange of books, &c., seem to be so little aided in our country? He told me of instances in which his letters offering valuable collection of books, to Libraries remain unanswered! I never saw a greater enthusiast for our country. Here is a proof of his determination to make us known "to the ends of the earth." He has established a library of American works (400 volumes) in Teheran, in Persia!

Three or four of his rooms are crowded with books in various languages and on all conceivable subjects, in part American works for Europe the rest European and Asiatic works for America. One large pile he designs for Boston, and this brings me to the point for which I have spoken of Vattermare.

Among the collections received from the king of Holland for exchange is a set of publications by the great Musical Society of Amsterdam. I noted several overtures, a mass, a Tantum Ergo, and Te Deum, all in full score, and several of the annual reports. Upon expressing my desire that these works should go to our Public Library in Boston, he said he would add them to the other books for that city with great pleasure, only desiring something musical to send to Amsterdam in return.

Now, can there be any difficulty in making up a package of musical publications, reports of musical societies, reports upon music in schools, volumes of "Dwight's Journal" and the like, to be sent to Vattermare?

The Society at Amsterdam is an association for the "befoordering der Toonkunst" — the advancement of music," and the works, which I wish to have secured are by musicians of Holland — a field unknown to us in music almost.

Why could not an interchange be effected through Vattermare of the principal musical publications of Boston and Paris? Why could not our publishers find it in the end profitable to give our Library a copy of their publications for this purpose? Could they not often find works in the exchanges, which it would pay to print? It certainly would seem so.

So much for Vattermare, whom the more I see him the more I respect and like him. His patience and continuance in well-doing, in spite of much very shabby treatment, is worthy of all praise.

I have spent many of my hours of forced leisure, in visiting the studios of American painters and students of painting here, and here are some notes upon them.

Cranch — our well-known "C. P. C." — poet and painter — has now nearly or quite finished several pretty large pictures; two are views of the mouth of the grand canal, Venice, (one of which, in particular, has the brilliant glow of the Italian morning sky) and two are water and coast scenes in the bay of Naples. He has also several new studies of trees and forest glades from Fontainebleau. One of the Venetian pieces I am happy to say has been ordered by a gentleman of Boston.

May, of New York, is just completing a large picture with figures of life size, Columbus writing his will. The subject is, I believe, from Lamartine. The hero, a grand figure, sits supported by an attendant at a table, the pen in his fingers upon the blank leaf of a missal, but at this moment he is not writing, for his thoughts are recalling the scenes of his past life, and dwelling upon the ingratitude which veils his last years in sadness. Two other pictures, in progress, and much less in size, are the Murder of Admiral Coligny, and the duel scene in the village inn, from Waverly. Would not he be the man to paint the great scene described by John Adams, "the colossus of American Independence," in his letters to Judge Tudor, viz., the birth of the American Revolution, or James Otis's speech on the "Writs of Assistance," in the old State House, Boston?

Howland, of Adams, Mass., has upon his easel a large picture, "The Prisoners." The subject is the carrying off of several beautiful women, in a boat, by corsairs, of the Mediterranean, and gives the artist free play for his taste in color. He is just now executing an order for a beautiful female head and face, with a black veil thrown over it, for a gentleman of Boston. Among his sketches are a girl listening to a serenade, and two from Faust.

Babcock, of Boston, is busy at present upon a small pictures, in which the brilliancy of color, which attracted so much attention in Boston three years ago is still marked. At that time, great fault, I remember, was found with his drawing; happily he has been paying special attention to this branch of his art, and with great success.

Boughton, of New York, whose studies have been unfortunately interrupted by illness, has a picture of Whittier's Maud Müller under way, but he has occupied himself mostly for some time in drawing from life.

Colman, of New York, is at work upon a view of Seville, of which his brother artists speak in high terms.

Brigham, of Boston, is hard — nay, too hard — at work studying in the Louvre, and drawing from life. Rubens is his idol, at which I do not wonder. He has several fine sketches and subjects for large pictures at some future time. Indeed he ranks with the best of our young artists. I am very sorry to hear that he expects to return home next year, for he exhibits so much promise, it would be a loss to our public not to have him have opportunity for the best and fullest development of his powers.

Baker, of Pennsylvania, seems to be devoting himself mainly to figure and portrait painting.

Dana, of Boston, has a large picture upon his easel, "Excelsior," the moment chosen is that in which the youth has fallen and is half buried in snow, but still holds the banner upright. The Alpine peaks with the snow are very effective. He says it is not yet finished, — an artist only can tell why. Some New Yorker ought to give him an order for a picture of the Three Wise Men of Gotham who went to sea in a bowl, and very queer chaps they are.

Thom, of New York, is studying with Frère at Ecouen. I am told he exhibits remarkable talent.

Bancroft has just come to Paris for the winter. He is devoting himself to landscape. I have seen none of his works.

Buchanan Read passed through the city some days ago on his way to Rome, after a stay of some months in England. He brought thither a small portrait of Longfellow, which he intended to keep, but the English would have it, and he changed it into gold. He described a beautifully poetic subject, which he is going to work out, but memory has proved treacherous.

Yowell, of Iowa city, I am told, is mostly engaged in filling orders for copies of fine pictures, in which he is remarkably successful. His own works are mostly figure pieces.

I do not know whether all our American painters now in Paris are included in this list; it contains all of whom I have any knowledge, except two or three young students, just beginning their career.

Greenough, the sculptor, is very busy, I hear, but I did not see his studio.

A young Valentine, of Richmond, Virginia, is a promising student of sculpture.

And so — finis.

Thron.

A TALE OF NORWAY.

(Concluded.)

On that Sunday morning when he wandered over the mountain-range in a new coat, the sun rose bright and clear in a pure blue sky. The mother sat on the threshold under the rough little porch, and followed him with her eyes as far as she could; the father stood at the window, but he went away to lie down, when he heard the mother coming—none of them were to go to church that day. When Aaste had prepared the breakfast, and they sat eating, she spoke it out before Alf, that she really wished to follow him. "Do as thou pleasest," said Alf, and now she dressed in great haste and went. Thron while on his way, thought that the birds had never sung such manifold songs, and it was likely that he himself would sing along with them. But still the best thing will be to spare one's own strength, he meditated; he had not slept the whole night.

He came to the bridal house, actually without knowing how; he could not eat and placed himself at the head of the procession, as his duty prescribed. But neither the procession, nor the spectacle of the bridal pair, inspired him with the least interest, for the expectation of what he was going to see, almost blinded him to the scenes before him. He went in advance, and it seemed to him, as if bride and bridegroom, old and young people, birds and wood, heaven and sun, more singing with him, if not aloud, yet in their inmost hearts. He did not get tired stepping onward like one intoxicated, who does not feel the ground under his feet, he looked out into the dim distance, far far out and played. Sometimes he felt like being soon in the village, yet there was constantly some turn in or hillock on the road. He comforted himself by thinking that after a while the place would appear all at once before his eyes, for he knew distinctly where it must lie. "Let us only turn round the Kammer, (a rocky hill) then we are right in the village," so he heard some one say behind him. His bow made stronger strokes, the finger pressed more heavily upon the string, and, there the Kammer glided by. He saw a light blue smoke rise up to the horizon, and below it there was glimmering and glittering a lustre and a sparkling which he was not able to discern and divide at first sight. By and by it somehow dissolved, it flew and glided asunder, and shaped itself into distinct objects. He perceived different roads and passages, and there lay a house with so many windows, that he supposed he saw an icy plain on a sunny winter's day. Here lay another one, so large, that his father's house might have been placed under the roofed porch with ease, even with the stable towering on its top. And all around, house by house, yard by yard, one white, the other red, not one had a thatched roof but bright slate-covering, which made one's eyes ache. Fine and light it stood there, the whole village, fine and light the mist hung over it, artificial like his violin, nay more artificial was everything around. The carriages within the yard, the horses which stood by unharnessed, the colored dresses of the people, the dogs, playing at the edge of the wood, the children who stood about gazing on, and over all this—away and off—sounded tones long and strong, in decided rhythm, so that he fancied everything he saw, was moving after this measure.

All at once he remembered his own tone, his own music, but in God's name, what had become of that? Certain it was, that the violin must have burst, for no trace of sound was in it any more. Just now, when I wanted so badly to use it! Thron cried, in a low voice, turning pale; perhaps he only did not strike strong enough. Therefore he put all his force into the bow. Some little good this did, but the violin must be burst nevertheless; for well he knew how it would sound—and when he thought of that he was very near bursting himself—into tears. Then he looked again straight forward on his way and noticed a house, much larger than all the others and so wondrously beautiful, that it looked like the shadow of a tree, reflected in the water. For a lofty top it had and finer and more slender grew this, the higher it rose up to the skies. Windows were there, as high as the whole house, and as it lay there—surrounded by a wall and pointing upwards—Thron comprehended all at once, that the sounds he heard came really from above. The whole house itself became music within his thoughts, every part of it must sound and was original song. "That is the church," he thought. An immense crowd of people stood around, they all looked alike and all of them looked cheerful. "They are those, who built the church," he mused, and he did not venture to look upon them out of sheer respect. Then he thought of himself, of what he did here, of the miserable tone the violin had got, just here, where all those stood, who built the church. He was ready to sink deep into the ground with shame, but onward he must go and even at the head of the procession. That cannot be the right march, thus he comforted himself. Another one resounded under his bow, but gone was all, that it had expressed before—it was only stroke upon stroke and nothing more. "Oh, do not forsake me, thou dear, dear Lord!" the boy prayed—he took refuge in the best and highest he knew. He felt, they looked at him, those "who built the church;" he could not remember anything now—neither the waterfalls nor the woods, nor what they contained—much as he tried to do so. It is well, that neither father nor mother are here, to see my shame, thought Thron—but to his fright, he now thought he saw his mother in her black dress, in the midst of the crowd, she looked so pale. "Ha, ha, ha!" he heard, it must have been close behind him, for he saw no one laughing. His finger lost the right grasp and the bow was gliding over the board; "now I cannot even catch the right tone," this whirled through his brain, he pressed the violin under his chin, took the bow in his firm grasp again, and with the power of anxiety, he hurled a tune down over the strings, straight forth from his very soul; some dance it was, but he did not know it himself. He went up and down on two strings and on three, he wanted to take the fourth along also; there should be even a fifth and sixth, but he could not reach either of the two. "Hey, now it goes well, don't it?" such laughter he heard, he saw the gipsy sitting on the ball of the spire, making faces at him. "Have you come—you too?" and now he felt as if the violin must go up there, if he could not succeed in playing the gipsy down from his seat. His play changed into clouds, which passed to and fro before his eyes; the point of the spire bent and went up again with the Bohemian, the houses danced, people stood fixed, some elf went up on the rocks—if his fingers would only endure it, if only no knots should get into the strings! But out of the crowd, his mother strove to get up to him. "For Heaven's sake, what is it, you play?" He looked at her and plunged back into the mist—far—far. "Yes, go with me, then! I must help myself as well as I can!" He laughed though he trembled all over. There he stood at the church-door, and without looking at the procession, he turned round all at once, his bow in one hand, the violin in the other, and swift as if flying through the air, he rushed by the people, off, away, on and on without aim, passing farm-yards, fields, trees—as long as his strength lasted—then sank down on the ground and cried bitterly. For a long while he lay so—his face turned downward, stillness reigned all around—and so still it was, he thought he heard the Heaven's rustling. Then he rose and beheld his violin, it lay close by him and said not a word. "Yes, it's yet all thy fault, I know," Thron said, seizing it: thou shalt go to pieces, because thou mad'st me tremble so. He clutched it in his hand, ready to fling it to the ground with all his force. But then again it seemed to him, that still it encircled all that he had experienced, lived and learned, he remembered again the waterfalls, his father, Jutal the goblin. Thron wept again. "Yes, yes, it may remain whole, as it is—but these wretched strings I must cut—for playing? no! I never shall dare to play again in this world." He drew forth his knife, hastening as much as he could, as if no time were to be lost, and set it at the "quint." "Woe! quint." "I must pretend not to hear it," thought Thron, setting his knife at the next string. This one burst likewise, the third also now only the bass was yet left—"the bass is a dear string, thought Thron, it is hard to get it; I believe, I will leave it on there," said he furthermore, and looked around mysteriously—half bewildered.

* * * * *

When I had read this to my friend, I stopped for a few minutes, but as he did not say anything, I was obliged to look at him. "Why and what else?" he asked. "How so?" I questioned in reply. "Why, the conclusion!" "The conclusion." "I thought you might have comprehended the boy in a way, to furnish the result yourself. "And did he become an artist?" What I answered I will write down here at my friend's request, if it were only, to do him a service. "He is the same young man who sits by thy side, playing." No power in the world would have brought Thronde back into the wood. He would have liked to attempt playing what he had seen on that day and what he was still seeing, when withdrawing his knife from the bass. He had first set it on, when the gipsy had shown himself upon the ball of the spire, and had tried to draw the violin up to him; it was only a moment, but Thronde was then ready to loose his senses. This playing it was, that shocked and awed, but it lured also, he thought of it, when he cut the three strings through—but he thought of it likewise, when he spared the fourth. He is now no more doubtful whether he will attain it, nay what is more, he knows that he will attain all that, which sang around him, but for which he could not find strings enough. You hear yourself, how daringly and despairingly he plays; he plays on towards that aim. Years have past, years will come and go, and there he still sits and plays. Wonderful things he fancies and ventures on sometimes—but strange, very strange is one piece, in which he wails so, that my eyes overflow; for he thinks he sees the fire flicker on the hearth of his home, while he himself lies out in the wood—and he feels cold, especially on one side. But I ever thought of the day, when Thronde told us his story. How a man, an artist, is growing to be one, can hardly be represented or described; but in some such way, I think, it must be brought on. He certainly has certain dreams from his childhood upward, and a dim instinct which comes over him with the instrument; but one point (perhaps unconscious to him) it must be, from which he catches his passionate love for it, one, at which he suddenly seems to lose all his faculties, just where they rise to life and activity. If there is real worth in him, his object and aim stands all at once before him, so hugely great, that to him his instrument seems burst asunder. Is there real earnestness in him, he plays in such a moment for his life or his reason. If he is a strong sound nature the temptation to hazard another attempt, will be victorious; the allurements hung at last only on one string, but this was a deep one. In a moment of rage, Thronde cut the three strings through, without knowing what he did. Sometimes afterwards, when he sat alone, thoroughly forsaken, poor, hungry—he understood, what strings he had been cutting. This is artist's life.

Beranger.

Pierre Jean de Béranger was born in Paris, the 19th of August, 1780. His father was a money-broker. Of his mother, the principal fact known is that she placed her son out to nurse in the country. To be sure, from this fact alone it must not be concluded that she was perfectly regardless of him, since such was the fashion in those days; and possibly fashion ruled then over the womanly part of creation as despotically as it does now. It is, however, a noteworthy fact, that the man who, of all the noticeable men of modern times, lived his life in the strictest accordance with the laws of common sense as applied to the needs of his own nature,—who disregarded all the rules and prejudices of society, when they conflicted with the development of his own character in his own way,—should have come from a society which was so artificial, that the possibility of any woman other than a peasant nursing her own children, was considered a discovery, and announced as such by the philosopher Rousseau. Perhaps the fact that the great men of the French Revolution sprang from the artificial society of the eighteenth century, is a proof of the wonderful recuperative and compensatory force there is in nature, and that we could apply with advantage some of its suggestions to our physical life.

The infantile Béranger certainly flourished under this apparently unnatural arrangement; and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that his foster-mother appears to have been as negligent of her assumed duties as his mother was of her natural ones. This Béranger deduced from the fact that he remembered nothing of his nurse, while all his youthful recollections clustered about the memory of the husband of the woman to whom he was entrusted, and who seems to have assumed all the care of the young poet, and to have conceived so warm a love for his charge, that he refused to take any pay for his trouble. "It would seem to me that I sold him," he said. At the age of five, Béranger was brought home.

His maternal grandfather, a Mr. Champi, who had been a tailor, and exceedingly strict in the discipline of his own children—whence, perhaps, arose his daughter's neglect of her maternal duties in mature life—assumed the entire management of his youthful grandson, and was as indulgent to his childish whims as only a fond grandfather can be. The young Béranger went to school, or not, pretty much as suited his own good pleasure. The principal occupation of his early years was, however, taking walks with his grandfather, and playing in the streets of Paris.

Thus obtaining the education which such advantages afford, the young poet grew to the age of ten, when he was sent into the country, to Péronne, and placed under the care of a sister of his father, who kept an inn, was named Madame Bouvet, and who appears to have been very fond of her nephew, and to have understood him better than any one, and aided him more in the formation of his character. Madame Bouvet was a Liberal, and from her Béranger first heard the liberal sentiments which were then fast leading to the French Revolution. It was also from her that Béranger first received the idea of writing songs. With Madame Bouvet he remained until he was seventeen, when he returned to Paris, and went to live with his Grandfather Champi, from whose house he saw the destruction of the Bastille. His father was a Royalist, and firmly convinced that the Bourbons would soon return. In his speculations as a money-broker, he formed all his calculations upon that basis. His son did not agree with him either in politics or in his business operations; but still there was no direct controversy between them.

The elder Béranger was so decided in his politics, that he was finally arrested as a Royalist. This of course ruined his financial operations, and left his son dependent upon his own exertions, and without any means. The loss of money did not disturb Béranger at all. He had so few artificial needs, that it required but little to gratify them. He commenced to write, and was employed by Landon to prepare the text for several volumes of the "Annales du Musée."

In 1810, through the assistance of a friend, he obtained an office in the University of Paris. From this time up to 1813, the date of the Roi d'Yvetot, the song from which his reputation began, Béranger was constantly at work, and probably wrote much, though nothing is known of what he then produced. Chateaubriand says Béranger told him that inspired by the "Genius of Christianity," he had commenced to write Christian Idylls. It was from the fact that Chateaubriand's works had roused Béranger's ambition, that Béranger always had a warm appreciation and friendship for Chateaubriand. Béranger himself said that in his early youth he had tried all sorts of composition, tragedies, dramas, odes, etc., but was satisfied with his success in none of these. The Roi d'Yvetot made a great success, and Béranger felt sure that he had discovered his speciality, and yet the first volume of songs was not published until 1815, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. The volume had a great success. Under the form of light verses the early songs in the collection concealed the bitterest satires against the increasing tyranny of the Emperor, and expressed the popular feeling of the French people, who had not yet forgotten that they had achieved their own freedom. But when Napoleon was unsuccessful, and the allies brought in the Bourbons, Béranger's enthusiastic love for the greatness of the fallen hero, his distrust of all kings and contempt for all authority which relies upon the brute arguments of strength and arms for its support, his passion for liberty, and his sympathy with the national love of independence and of the glory of France, which felt humiliated and insulted by the presence of a king thrust upon them by foreign invaders, expressed themselves in such terms that no wonder the people eagerly welcomed him as the exponent of their sentiments, and the rulers in an equal degree hated and feared him. He was not, however, molested. The government, desirous of gaining the confidence of the people, did not dare to trouble their singer.

In 1821 he had a second volume prepared for publication, and was warned by the Ministry that if he issued it he would be removed from his place in the University. Undaunted by this mean threat, Béranger sent in his resignation to the government, and sent out his volume to the public. This course of action was against the advice of all his friends, many of whom broke off with him. "The people will be with me, and my friends will come back again," he said, and the result showed that he was right. The Government however prosecuted him as a dangerous person, and an utterer of seditious sentiments. The court-room in which the trial was held was crowded with the prisoner's friends, but the trial went against him, and Béranger was sentenced to spend four months in the prison of Sainte Pelagie. During these four months of confinement Béranger was visited by crowds of enthusiastic admirers, nor did his muse desert him. The songs he composed were committed to memory by his visitors, and by means of copies, either in manuscript or secretly printed, spread rapidly.

In 1828 Béranger published a third volume, and in December of the same year was again tried as a dangerous and seditious person, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the prison of La Force, and to a fine which, with the expenses of the suit, amounted to over eleven thousand francs, say twenty-three hundred dollars. His friends wished him to flee, and it was shown him that he would be allowed to reach Switzerland. But Béranger preferred to go to prison. The fine was paid by his friend Berand, before the public subscription which had been opened for that purpose was completed. During the time he spent in La Force, Béranger interested himself in the condition of the prisoners who were detained there, and succeeded in having their comfort greatly increased, and some attention paid to their needs as human beings. In this work he was more interested since a large portion of them were boys, the orphans and vagrants of Paris, who had been arrested for vagrancy and the small crimes consequent to such a condition in a civilized and rich city.

In 1830 came the constitutional monarchy, which placed Louis Philippe upon the throne. The leaders of the movement wished Béranger to accept some of the spoils of victory, and pressed office upon him. He persistently refused all such offers, giving as his reason, that he should never be anybody unless he remained nobody.

In 1833, Béranger published his fourth volume, and in 1834 made an arrangement with his publisher Perrotin, by which he was to receive for the right of publishing the songs he had already written, and those he should hereafter write, an annuity of eight hundred francs, which should revert to his friend and companion, Judith Frère. This annuity Perrotin afterwards increased to three thousand francs; and notwithstanding this generosity and the lavish expense he incurred in getting up the various illustrated editions of Béranger's songs, he made the greater part of his fortune from this contract. In 1847, Béranger added a few songs to the illustrated edition published by Perrotin, that year. These, with the posthumous songs published after his death in 1857, form the whole of his works.

We must accept his success as a song-writer, from the fact of his immense popularity. The charm and grace of the French song is too subtle to stand the rude test of translation. The terseness of their style, the condensation of their thought and expression, their suggestions and their humors are the qualities which made Béranger's songs popular alike among the educated and the illiterate classes. It is only the works which appeal to the broad facts of human nature that underlie all the distinctions of rank or convention, which men are so foolishly prone to institute among themselves, that obtain so wide spread a recognition and become the classics of a nation's literature. The value of Béranger's life to the world, certainly to this portion of it, is however rather to be found in the life he lived as a man than in his merits as an author. The common sense which he made the rule of his life, the self-reliance which he always displayed, the distrust of those in authority, the self-respect which led him to place not his trust in princes, the faith which he evinced in mankind, the honesty, the charity, the kindly feeling for those who were truthful and the contempt he displayed for all charlatans, whatever might be their social position, these qualities it is which makes his character and his life a fit study for the world.

Perhaps these qualities can better be shown by quoting his own words than in any other way. The following extracts of his conversation are taken from his Memoirs, written by Savinien Lapointe, a shoemaker, a poet, a pupil, a friend, a companion, and a biographer of Béranger.

Speaking of a literary life, Béranger says: "Keep yourself clear of the lower class of literary men, and all hack writers by profession."

Of the comparative merits and lasting interest of the various branches of literary composition, he says: "We commence with Lamartine, then we go to Hugo, sometimes to Delavigne, who does not always respond to our thoughts—and then having rounded the circle, we come back to the song-writer."

Advising Lapointe upon the necessity of trusting rather to severe and long-continued work than to what is called inspiration for the production of works of real merit, he says: "I do not wish just now to criticize you too much, I would be afraid of making you timid by so doing. You should preserve your originality, your boldness, only you must strive to find the right word. You must come to see me, I will lend you a book of synonyms. I myself have worked all my life with dictionaries, and have not yet ceased to consult them. As for the dictionaries of rhymes, that is a different matter, though they are sometimes of use."

Lapointe had called upon Victor Hugo, and told Beranger of his visit, and of the advice Hugo had given him to read a great deal of poetry. "I think differently," said Beranger. "A man should read a great deal of poetry while he is seeking the form in which to express himself. You have found your's, set about perfecting it. Read history; events are the fathers of poetry and of ideas; put the knowledge of events in your head and leave the poets alone."

When Lapointe called upon Victor Hugo he found Henri Heine there. Hugo opened the door himself, and showed Lapointe into a richly furnished room, welcoming him with the sentiment, "Enter sir, enter; poets are kings." At hearing this, Beranger shrugged his shoulders and asked, "What did you answer?"

"Nothing, I bowed again, and was silent and embarrassed."

"In your place I would have said, I came sir to measure you for a pair of boots."

This freedom from parade, this common sense, this self-respect which made Beranger too honest ever to play a part, or to assume a position which he knew he could not fill, while it characterized his life as a song-writer, and was condensed by him into the saying "facts are poetry," was almost the most noticeable fact in his public life. When his friends opposed the publication of his second volume, one of them offered him a much larger sum of money than Beranger hoped to gain from the volume, if he would refrain from issuing it. This offer Beranger refused. Lafitte, the banker, offered him a situation; but Lafitte was his friend, and Beranger would not be indebted to any of his friends. "It is," he said, "because I know how strong an influence gratitude has over me, that I am afraid to contract such an obligation even towards those whom I most esteem." His friend Manuel left him a large bequest; but Beranger felt that he was amply provided for by Perrotin's annuity, and refused to take anything but a watch, which should serve him as a memento.

After the Revolution of 1848, he was elected to the Assemblée Constituante, by over two hundred thousand votes, and wrote to the Assembly declining his seat. The Assembly voted unanimously not to accept his resignation. In his letter acknowledging this compliment, Beranger again declined the honor, and requested to be allowed to live as a private citizen. "This," he wrote, "is not the wish of a philosopher, still less of a sage,—it is the wish of a rhymist who fears that he would not survive it, in the midst of the turmoil of events, he should lose his independence of soul, the only possession for which he has ever been ambitious. For the first time I ask a favor of my country: let not its worthy representatives refuse the prayer which I address to them in again requesting my dismissal; but let them pardon the weakness of an old man, who cannot hide from himself the honor he forgoes in separating himself from them." This second resignation was accepted.

Perrotin, who became quite rich, often wished the poet to leave his simple and unpretending home, and come to live in his country-seat; this invitation Beranger would never accept. "I should feel like an exile in so grand a house," he said, "and my poor friends would not know how to find me."

In 1855 Napoleon III. hearing that Beranger was poor, proposed to give him a pension, and knowing how impossible it was to make Beranger accept any favors, the offer was made through the Empress Eugénie. This offer Beranger also refused to accept, though such an evidence of respect touched him to the heart, and made it difficult for him to adhere to his determination never to put himself under any obligation. "People do not know how much courage it requires to refuse," he said.

Beranger's political opinions may be stated concisely, as a faith in the people, in their ultimate decision upon any question, in their honesty and in the future of the democratic principles of the age, which would, strangely enough, appear visionary and absurd in this republican country. He was no reformer, had no desire to coerce men into freedom, his belief was in leaving them to work out their own destiny. His position in politics was therefore always in the opposition, since it is always safer to distrust the governors than the governed. The first require to be corrected by opposition in their errors, the last correct themselves, since they are the first to suffer from the evil effects of their mistakes. It was this principle which governed his course toward the great Napoleon. "My enthusiastic and constant admiration," he says, "for the Emperor's genius, the idolatry which he inspired in the people who always saw in him the representative of the victorious ideas of equality; that admiration and idolatry which eventually made Napoleon the noblest subject of my songs, never blinded me to the constantly increasing despotism of the Empire. In 1814 I saw in the fall of the Colossus, only the misfortune of a country which the Republic had taught me to adore."

It was the need he felt of always preserving his independence, so that he could express his opinions without any fear of praise or blame, that made him refuse so persistently all office, whether offered him by a ruler or by the voice of the people.

And certainly in this Democratic age few persons have so ennobled the proud position of a private citizen as Pierre Jean Beranger. In this independence of character, this love of personal freedom, this disgust at all cheap notoriety, and contempt for all the modern appliances by which it is gained, this quiet and unobtrusive firmness in maintaining the privacy of his private life, and asserting his right to live as best suited his conviction of his own needs, that Beranger has set an example to the noisy vulgarity of our modern life which cannot be too highly commended.

The life so passed came to a close the sixteenth of July, 1857. His old friend and companion, Judith Frère, had passed away on the ninth of April, in the same year. Beranger had promised her that he should not outlive her more than three months. He was then suffering from the disease of the liver, and the bleeding at the lungs, which caused his death. He died upon his sofa, supported in the arms of Madame Vernet, the wife of Vernet, the painter, and in the presence of some of his most intimate friends. His sister, a nun, had brought a priest to be present at the last moment, and offer those consolations of religion which are needless in such extremities if the life of the subject has been governed by higher aims and a nobler faith than are common among men. Beranger felt that his life had been so lived, that he needed no hasty preparation for death, and therefore quietly dismissed his sister and her priest. He was not more afraid to die than he had been to live, for death to him was not more solemn and mysterious than life. So calmly did the final moment come, that his friends who were in the room hardly knew that his life had ceased.

Though he had requested that his funeral should be as quiet and unostentatious as possible, the population of Paris came out in crowds to pay their last respects to him. His body was placed in the tomb of his friend Manuel, at the side of Judith Frère.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 15.—The last week or so, has given Philadelphians quite an abundance of music. The Italian Opera Company have been singing here, and have presented us with two novelties, "Il Giuramento" and "Moisè en Egitto." The former opera has not been played here since the days of Truffi and Benedetti, and has give much pleasure to the habitués of the Academy. The principal artists acquitted themselves admirably in their respective rôles, COLSON and FERRI having particularly distinguished themselves. SUSINI has been suffering from chronic bronchitis, which has made him so very hoarse, that it is painful to listen to him. It is to be hoped that we shall have some more of the compositions of Mercadante; Elisa e Claudio would amply repay any management bringing it out. Rossini's Mosè was played but twice, and it must be said, that to the public at large, it failed to give the satisfaction the artists had expected.

The chorus was not good, and the concerted music, upon which everything in this opera depends was not as well rendered as it should have been. We regret to say that with one or two exceptions only, the houses were smaller, than we have ever seen. The troupe have joined their forces and now manage for themselves. If their loss here should give them a hint to be less exacting as regards terms with operatic managers in future; it will do no harm. Colson has been contending against "fire and sword" as the other evening she set fire to her dress from a lamp from which the alcohol burned over the side and dropped on her. With great presence of mind she crushed it out immediately, escaping with a burnt hand. A few evenings later, she fell on the dagger in the stabbing scene of "Il Giuramento," and injured her arm quite badly. On Friday evening the Maennerchor Society celebrated their twenty-fifth anniversary at Samson Street Hall. The proceedings commenced with a concert, the following was the programme:

1. Festgesang. . . . . Mendelssohn
(Solo, quartet, orchestra and chorus.)
2. Polonaise, (E flat), piano. . . . . Chopin
Mr. Charles Jarvis.
3. Evening Hymn. . . . . C. Zillner Maennerchor.
4. Trio (D), piano, violin and 'cello. . . . . Reisinger Messrs. C. Jarvis, S. Hasler and C. Schmitz.
5. A Criminal Case. Comic operetta in one act, arranged by
A. Birgfeld, Director of the Maennerchor.

The concert passed off very agreeably, and the operetta gave much amusement to the audience. At the conclusion of the concert the guests proceeded to the supper room, where a delightful repast awaited them, to which full justice was done. Speeches were made by a number of persons, among whom were Hon. Wm. B. Mann, Adolph Birgfeld, the pleasant director of the Society, the first President, &c. After supper, young and old went into the ball room, and dancing was kept up until an early hour of the morning. Everybody went away delighted. The Maennerchor Society have held weekly meetings, and have done much toward the cultivation of musical taste in our city. We have in pleasant prospect for next week, WOLFSORN AND THOMAS' second Classical Soiree, and on Christmas night the Handel and Haydn Society bring out the "Messiah" for which they are making extraordinary preparations.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

THIRD CONCERT.

1. Tenth Quartette, in E flat, op. 74. . . . . Beethoven
Introduction, Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo—Presto—Finale,
Tema con variazioni.
2. Abend Ständchen. . . . . C. Kreutzer
Vocal Quartette.
3. Piano Trio, in D minor, op. 49. . . . . Mendelssohn
Allegro agitato—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Allegro.
(Repeated by request.)
Messrs. Lang, Schultze and Fries.
4. Andantino and Scherzo, from the 34th Quintette. . . . . Onslow
5. "Komm Stiller Abend Nieder." . . . . L. DeCall
Vocal Quartette.
6. Quintette, in D No. 4. . . . . Mozart
Introduction and Allegro—Larghetto—Minuetto—Finale, Allegro vivace.

We were offered, as will be seen from the programme, three capital pieces by the trio of tone-poets, who are sure to delight and inspire an audience that loves good music.

The Quartette in E flat by Beethoven grew upon us, as we expected it would. We have hardly to add anything to the remarks made after the first performance of it. The impressions received then were strengthened on hearing it again. It leaves a feeling of pleasure behind, like that of beholding a strong man of a cast of mind rather serious, indulging in genial fancies, unbending from his more earnest work, and showing the marks of satisfaction in his lit-up countenance. Quiet in the first movements, the latent force breaks forth a little more distinctly in the Scherzo. The graceful second theme, as if dallying with grief that has been overcome, forms a fine contrast to the impetuous beginning. And the still more impetuous Prestissimo again sets off the first two parts to great advantage. The last movement closes strong and brilliant. The Club did well by their audience in repeating the piece, and deserved all the applause they received for their good rendering of it. Mr. LANG did himself a great deal of credit by playing his part of the Piano Trio by Mendelssohn, as well as he did. The first, third and fourth movements were especially good. He played with taste and feeling, and many passages were exquisite. Mr. Lang gave us much pleasure by his appropriate rendering of all light and humorous places, which were played with much grace and ease. His accentuation and phrasing showed that he had carefully studied his work. And it is our conviction, that Mr. Lang need only follow his impulses, and in slow movements his expression will be still nearer to the very best in musical elocution. The fine grand of Messrs. Chickering assisted Mr. Lang very well, and we think he treated his instrument with taste and understanding. Mr. Lang does honor to America, and Boston especially, and we were glad of the very favorable remarks, his playing elicited from the very greatest of living pianists, Dr. Liszt, as we happen to know from a trustworthy source.

The Quintette by Mozart was a most pleasant close to the concert. Mozart is ever beautiful. The introduction in a similar character to that of the Beethoven Quatuor, prefaced a charming Allegro, of a good deal of mirth and humor, and grace withal. The Coda repeating the introduction and the first melody is almost surprising in its abrupt close. The Adagio, a charming quiet melody of great beauty went very well. The Minuetto full of kindly pleasant feeling has a Trio full of sparkling, gladsome joy. This in a still higher degree takes possession of the Finale, which sweeps along gloriously in its first melody. The second one is finely worked up in a short counterpoint, exhibiting an exciting contest between the different parts, until they unite again in the first melody with which the piece closes. The playing was generally well done; only in the first viola an absence of broad tone and treatment was noticeable, which sometimes disturbed the ensemble of the other instruments. Mr. SCHULTZE was especially happy in bringing out the humorous element pervading the work.

The two movements from Onslow's 34th (!) Quintette sounded rather tame, pleasant as they are. Such music is quite comfortable, it does not excite. Though we wish by no means to undervalue Onslow, who has the great merit of cultivating a pure style, and forming it after the best models, we would yet ask how that second theme got into a "SCHERZO?" It is quite pleasing, and the staccato melody in the violoncello impresses one as something original. But what, we ask, has it to do with a Scherzo?

The songs by the new organization, the Orpheus Quartette Club, including the principal soloists of the Orpheus Musical Association, were sung quite well as these gentlemen are accustomed to do; the first one better in the repetition, which the gentlemen kindly assented to, when encored. But why select a piece like the second, belonging, as it does, to a superannuated, we had hoped, extinct race of beings in the four-part song creation. Such fossil remains did very well some thirty or forty years ago; but now, when we have a new generation of songs—we will not quote names, merely refer to programmes of Orpheus concerts—why reach back, to bring to light again a piece—of historical value, showing how a text ought not to be composed? Should the gentlemen favor us again at some future time, we would most earnestly urge upon them the expediency of singing a live song, fully developed and organized after the fashion of these later days.

The concert left a very pleasant impression on us. Such sterling pieces as the three, numbers 1, 3 and 6, make any concert agreeable and worthy. A suggestion may be ventured as to the fitness of repeating the parts of compositions in the manner the composer directed it. When Mozart thinks it best to have a part repeated, he is the best judge, we take it. If by doing so the concert would last longer than is desirable for those that live at a distance, it seems to be the best plan to leave out a piece of less importance; we mean, not put it on the programme at all. On the other side of the Atlantic such chamber-concerts frequently consist of two quatuors and one trio, or of a quintette and two quartettes. If we must have "a variety" on this side, to make a chamber-concert attractive, do not let us have it at the expense of a work of standard value.

The hall was crowded. Good and effective ventilation is still a desideratum however. The room grows too warm, and the carbonic acid set free by a large audience is not the best material to keep air sweet and wholesome. When will architects begin to study ventilation? It is a good number of years since Dr. Bell wrote a most thorough treatise on this indispensable requisite of domestic architecture and—what is more—proved the truth of his theory in practice. Is it so far to Somerville—or did architects never hear any thing of the subject?

We are glad to see that the labors of the Club, working in the right direction now for twelve years, are rewarded by a goodly attendance. The next concert will take place on the first day of next year, and we hope the Club will continue to give us fine programmes, and to prosper generally in the year incoming, beginning it as well as they closed this. *†

The Concert Season in Boston.

Our notices of the concerts that have taken place up to this time, show a record of crowded houses, and that too, to concerts of the very highest class, not only in the character of the programme, but in the price of admission. We refer to the concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and of Mr. Dresel. We are glad for the sake of these artists, who have been unwearied for years, in providing the best for their audiences that their success has been so great. But it is not easy to understand why the offers of the Philharmonic Society addressed to a much larger public, at a very low price, and of the Handel and Haydn Society, should have failed so entirely of any response. Both of these societies have promised the public entertainments of the highest order in their respective departments, and promises too (not like those of opera managers) which the public knew would be faithfully performed; one waited for the public to come forward and sign its subscription lists; the other solicited the public by individual appeals, but both alike have failed of success. We cannot but regret deeply that we are this winter to be destitute of the admirable choral performances of the Handel and Haydn Society, and the Orchestral Concerts to which for so many years we have been accustomed, but such we understand to be the result of the efforts that have been made to secure remunerative audiences. The theatres meanwhile are well filled every night, and other places of amusement are not without audiences. We trust that another season will tell a different story.

We are glad however that the Handel and Haydn Society is, as usual, to give the MESSIAH on Sunday, the 30th, with the aid, we understand of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS and other able assistance.

CHRISTMAS is coming apace, and those who are in search of the tokens of love and friendship so commonly interchanged at this time, we would recommend to look, (if they are musically disposed,) at the numerous volumes on the counters of our publishers, the classic treasures of the divine Art, of immortal worth, joys forever. We mean such books as the Sonatas of Beethoven and Mozart, the Songs without Words of Mendelssohn, the Oratorios of Handel and of Haydn, the operas of Mozart and Rossini and Donizetti, and a host of other works which we see there, in compact and beautiful form outwardly, while within they are filled with the choicest inspirations of genius that the world has known.

For very young singers we have (from A. Williams & Co.,) the time honored catch, "The Three Blind Mice," illustrated, with the music, printed on cloth, washable and indestructible, and published by Dean & Son, London.

Jamaica Plain.

It was our privilege to be present at a soirée given by Mr. O. DRESSEL, on Wednesday last, at Jamaica Plain. The hospitable mansion of a family living at the beautiful pond and known for their great love of the best music, was thrown open to an appreciative audience, some of whom had come quite a distance to hear Mr. Dresel. He played two sonatas by Beethoven, the one in C major, op. 2, No. 3, dedicated to father Haydn, and the A flat sonata, op. 26, with the theme and variations for its first and the funeral march for its second movement. He also played the Romanza by Schumann, which was admired so much at the second soirée in this city, and Etudes, Valses, Polonaises and Mazurkas by Chopin. The entertainment being of a private character, we can merely chronicle it. But we may say that the audience, mainly composed of persons of musical culture, highly appreciated the selection and were enraptured by the rendering of the pieces. Two songs, one from Fidelio, the other from Don Juan, were sung by a German gentleman, connected with the management of one of the largest firms in Boston, to the no small enjoyment of the audience.

The dwellers in that charming locality seem to be in high favor with Mr. Dresel, to have two sonatas by Beethoven on the same evening. We might almost grow envious of them, if we had not been present ourselves. As it was, the audience were highly gratified by the noble entertainment, and it was altogether a very pleasant evening, with a home-like charm about it, that made it seem rather hard to leave as early as the last car compelled us to.

Musical Chit-Chat.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The interior decorations of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which are now nearly completed, are on an entirely novel principle, as respects similar places of amusement. All the traditional scroll-work, gilding, emblematic figures, composition caryatides, papier maché ornaments, and flamboyant trumpery, which time out of mind have been used in the ornamentation of theatres, ball-rooms, and opera houses, have been discarded, and the plainest and most matter-of-fact carpenters' work substituted in their place. The painting is of a corresponding simplicity, being nothing more than a crimson ground, picked out with two shades of salmon color, and what is the most surprising about it is that the effect is extremely agreeable and refined. It looks like a place intended for rational amusement and not a gilded pandemonium, where the chief objects aimed at are to bewilder the imagination and weary the eye. The small concert room attached to the Academy is ornamented in a style of corresponding simplicity and good taste. One of the advantages of this style is that the mind is put at rest immediately by discovering the actual strength and solidity of the structure, as every beam, pillar, and apparent support is exactly what it pretends to be, and not a hollow sham. The Brooklyn Opera House is a novelty, both externally and internally; and though no one could imagine from its appearance for what purpose it was designed, we believe it will be pronounced one of the best adapted buildings of the kind in America. Not the least admirable feature of it is its roof. It is so rare to find a building in New York with a becoming roof to it, that it will be a comfort to any one with an eye for architectural proportions to look upon this very remarkable building.—N. Y. Tribune.

CHICAGO.—The Philharmonic Society has organized under Mr. Balatka, formerly of Milwaukee. We learn that their subscription list numbers thirteen hundred. A contrast to the list of our Boston Philharmonic. Here is the programme of their first concert:

PART I.

1. Overture—"Max Robespierre".....Litolff
2. Romance for Tenor.—With accompaniment of Violoncello and Piano.....Tiehsen
Mr. Louis Maus.
3. Grand Concerto in E, op. 11.....Chopin
For Piano, with Accompaniment of Orchestra. Larghetto, Vivace.

Performed by Mr. Paul Becker.

4. Terzetto and Chorus—from "Elljah".....Meudelssohn

PART II.

1. Introduction and Chorus—from the Third Act of "Lo-bengrin".....Wagner
2. Allegro Scherzando—from the Eighth Symphony.....Beethoven
3. Aria for Soprano—from "Gemma di Vergy".....Donizetti
Miss Anna Fessel.
4. Overture, "Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart

THE MUSICAL UNION, at their annual meeting, elected Dr. L. D. Boone, President, C. M. Cady, Vice President, and Geo. F. Root, Conductor. Mr. Root intends taking a permanent residence here, he having an interest in the flourishing music-furnishing establishment of Root & Cady, heretofore E. T. Root only having been associated with Mr. Cady in the business.

By this accession they doubtless have become so firmly rooted that no wind of rivalry can upturn them.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN.—At the Victoria Theatre Verdi's Traviata has been given for the first time, Madame de Lagrange making her debut in the part of Violetta, and displaying a prodigious facility of execution joined to acting full of energy, she produced an extraordinary impression. It is pleasant to read the accounts of the appearance of singers so familiar to us, who came here without European reputation, but become famous in this country, without that prestige, such as Tedesco, Mad. de Lagrange and the veteran Badiali, and to see how the verdict given here in their favor is affirmed by the judgment of cultivated European audiences.

Mlle. Trebelli, the new contralto, has not accepted the engagement offered her at the opera in Berlin.

ROME.—A new opera by Pacini, Gianni di Nisida, has been brought out here, with great success, Bettini taking the principal tenor part.

FLORENCE, Nov. 19.—Amid all the martial stir, and the shock and excitement of revolution, Italy does not lose her love of music, or neglect to seek the means for gratifying it. It would be strange indeed when such an admirable political harmony has begun to exist and a generous and wise patriotic union is growing up, that there should not still be heard on every side the old concord of musical sounds. Here, in Florence, we have been having a musical season of six weeks. Opera has been given at three theatres of as many different grades, from the more exclusive Pergola, down to the popular Nazionale. Il Profeta has had a run of about three weeks at the former theatre, and Il Barbiere di Siviglia, at the latter. Bellini's opera of Norma has been put upon the stage at the Pergola during the past week, with the Frenchwoman Masson for prima donna, whose success in her part, both as singer and actress, is well spoken of. So far as the public is concerned, the opera is tolerably well sustained, notwithstanding the absence of so many of its former supporters. To the managers, however, it can hardly prove a profitable enterprise.

Last night the Philharmonic Society gave a concert or accademia, as they call it, for the gratification of about four hundred invited listeners. This society, as is well known, is the high court of musical art in Florence, and the repertory of the productions which it brings out, is generally of a very superior character. Both the society and its audience is composed of those most skilled in, and the best judges of art and the reunions have always a somewhat elegant and fashionable character. Like a ball, the concert commences at about nine at night. The present entertainment was more interesting than usual to us Americans, because to one of our countrywomen of talent was assigned a conspicuous part. Miss Abby Fay, of Boston, sang to the satisfaction of all her friends, and with much applause, from the general Italian audience, the very sweet cavatina, "Come per me sereno," from Bellini's opera of La Sonnambula. I have heard but one expression, that of warm praise of the excellent manner in which the part was performed, both as to the bearing of the singer upon the stage and the musical execution. Among much that was good in the eleven pieces executed at the concert Miss Fay's performance was acknowledged to be among the best. From Italians I learn that this singer has already acquired a very high degree of artistic culture, and only needs the inspiration of passion with somewhat more of technical discipline, to insure professional success.—Cor. of the Transcript.

In the great singing festival held at Liege on the 30th of October, more than 2,000 voices—French Belgians, Germans—took part. The first prize was carried off by the Concordia Society of Aix-la-Chapelle.

A Festival Cantata for the arrival of the new king of Italy, in Naples, has been prepared by Maestro Pistilli.

Signora Floretti, a prima donna who made a favorable impression at the Theatre San Carlo, Naples, a couple of years ago, has been transplanted to St. Petersburg, where she is said to have satisfied that critical public in "I Puritani."

M. Chelard's opera, "Macbeth," has been successfully revived at Vienna.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—One line may chronicle the doings of the English Opera during the two weeks past. The success of Robin Hood continues unabated. It will take three lines, however, to chronicle the doings of the Italian Opera in the same space of time, although nothing absolutely new has been adventured. The week before last Il Trovatore, Don Giovanni, and the Huquenots were given on alternate nights with Robin Hood; but the success of Verdi, Mozart, and Meyerbeer has in no way lessened the attraction of Mr. Macfarren. English dramatic music is at present decidedly in the ascendant. The prospects of "National Opera" never looked so flourishing. The success of Robin Hood is a warrant for that. There is just now no hint about what is to succeed Mr. Macfarren's opera. Mr. Wallace's Amber Witch, we hear, is not yet ready, and should a new work be required at this side of Christmas, Mr. Frank Mori's Bride of Florence has, we believe, the best chance. The first operatic essay of the composer of Fridolin, and some of the most popular songs of the day, will be looked forward to with interest.

At the ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA Loder's Night Dancers was revived.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The third season was inaugurated on Monday, Nov. 12, most propitiously. The programme was agreeable and interesting from end to end, the performers, all of the first class, playing and singing their very best, and the audience that crowded St. James's Hall as able to appreciate as eager to applaud. Three great composers, who, though they have fulfilled very different missions in art, have each in a remarkable degree contributed to its progress, and, moreover, possess a something (almost, it may be, undefinable) in common—Spohr, Dussek, and Weber—were drawn upon for the selection, vocal and instrumental; and certainly, belonging as they all do, more or less, to the "romantic" (in the deep-felt, earnest signification of the term) and, at intervals, quasi "melancholy" school, their united efforts resulted in as cheerful and brilliant a musical entertainment as, perhaps, was ever provided. Here and there a bit of "sentiment," it is true, peeped out; but it came like a stray sunbeam on a bracing winter-day, and the contrast only helped to endow the predominating vigor of the rest with the additional life and charm. We subjoin the programme:

PART I.

- Quartet, in G minor (strings).....Spohr.
Song, "Rose softly blooming" (Asore e Gemma).....Spohr.
Canzonet, "Name the glad day".....Dussek.
Sonata, in C major, Op. 24. Pianoforte solo.....Weber.

PART II.

- Sonata, in B flat, Op. 69 (pianoforte and violin).....Dussek.
Song, "Restore those visions bright".....Spohr.
Song, "Glückseln im Thale" (Kuryanthe).....Weber.
Quartet, in B flat (pianoforte and strings).....Weber.
Conductor—Mr. Bennett.

Paris.

Nov. 7.—The Italian Opera is now in the full swing of the season, and latterly there has been a complete run upon Rossini. Il Barbiere with Mad. Alboni, and MM. Badiali, Zucchini, Gardoni and Angelini, and Cenerentola have awakened all the early and bright memories of old opera-goers. Badiali's Figaro, though not so fresh and youthful as might be desired, is admirable in style, and Gardoni's Almaviva exhibits both talent and grace. The Rosina of Alboni, however, is matchless. In the singing lesson, she has gone back to Rode's air again instead of the piece by Hummel, which she had latterly substituted for it, and all who heard her had reason to be thankful for the change. But with so lovely a voice it matters but little what she sings. The most common place strains are converted into strings of pearls as they issue from that enchanted larynx. Alboni's reception in Kosina was a succession of encores and calls before the curtain. Cenerentola was not quite so warmly received. It is difficult to say why, for it is masterpiece of the buffo style, and proceeds throughout with unflagging spirit. The finale of the first act and the sextuor, Questo nodo are pieces, which once heard, engrave themselves forever on the memory. Alboni was, of course, the principal figure in these as in the first-named opera. Her final rondo was electrical in its effect, and the last variation was called, or rather shouted, for, unanimously. Gardoni and Zucchini were well up to the mark, and Badiali's Dandini was of the good old stamp, and showed that this artist is thoroughly master of the secret of the buffo style which so enchanted our fathers.

Halevy's Val d'Andorre has been produced at the Théâtre Lyrique, having been made over to that house by the former manager of the Opéra Comique.

The Pardon de Ploermel has been produced at the Opéra Comique, with the remarkable feature of the part of Hoël being sustained by the female bass, Mlle Wertheimer. Her success was complete, and Mlle. Wertheimer entirely won the favor of her audience by her excellent acting, and the masculine vigor of her singing. Mlle. Monrose made her first appearance as Dinorah, in which she showed considerable grace, and a power of free, nimble, and correct execution. Mlle. Belie sang the scena, written by Meyerbeer for the Italian version played in London.

Nov. 10. — The month of November is not propitious to the operatic or dramatic world. A skirmishing party of colds, catarrhs, and influenzas prelude the advance of winter, and many a distinguished artist, disabled has to retire to the rear. Among others, M. Gueymard has been incapacitated by a severe lumbar affection, or, as we should say, a lumbago, and the revival of Halevy's Juive would have had to be postponed had not a M. Renard been in readiness to supply the gap. Mlle. Maria Sax made her first appearance in the part of Rachel, and thoroughly succeeded in the attempt. Mad. Vandenheuevel-Dupres, as the Princess Eudoxia, was no less successful; while M. Renard looked the character of Eleazar to perfection, and acquitted himself of the music to the entire satisfaction of the audience. All three artists were called before the curtain.

The Italian Opera has been in a perfect torrent of prosperity. The re-appearance of Mario, and the return of Ronconi to Paris after an absence of ten years, have been the very intelligible cause of this flood of good fortune. Mario, Ronconi, and Alboni are the only Almaviva, Figaro, and Rosina of the day, and we doubt whether either has been surpassed of yore. The good Parisians, for once, are sensible of this artistic verity, and applaud them ad nubes.

The new opera comique by Scribe and Auber is in full preparation. The principal artists to whom it is to be intrusted are Mlle. Montrose, Mlle. Prevost, M.M. Montaubry, Coudere, Barrielle and Ambroise. There is also immediately forthcoming a new opera in one act by M.M. Sauvage and Ambroise Thomas. It is generally reported that an important change is about to take place in the staff of the Opéra Comique. Mad. Ugalde is to retire and Mad. Saint-Urbain is to exchange the boards of the Italian stage for those of the Salle Favart.

At the Théâtre-Lyrique Orphée has been taken up again with Mad. Viardot, who has thus anticipated the period announced for her re-appearance, namely the beginning of January. A Mlle. Oruil made her debut in Gluck's opera with some success. Her voice is fresh and flexible, though somewhat weak in the middle notes.

Nov. 20.—M. Gueymard having recovered the painless flexibility of his lumbar regions, the run of the Prophète has been resumed.

Nad. Penco has made her first appearance this season in La Traviata. She was recalled at the end of the first act, after the grand air "Follie, follie," and was warmly applauded in the brindisi, the duets with Gardoni and Graziani, and the whole of the third act.

The Opéra Comique is up to the roof in preparations. Another new opera, entitled André, in two acts, has been accepted. The words are by M. de Leuven, and the music by M. Porse. At the same time the new opera by Scribe and Auber is being zealously pushed forward. Meanwhile Mad. Cabel has been re-engaged, and has played in La Part du Diable and l'Etoile du Nord. Mlle. Saint-Urbain, of whose intended debut at this house I said something in my last, is to play the principal part in M. Offenbach's new opera, instead of Mad. Ugalde.

The Odeon has just put forth an amusing "proverbe" entitled Une Epreuve après la Lettre, and the Palais Royal presents its frequenters with a parody on Orphée, called J'ai perdu mon Eurydice. At the Variétés we are presumed a "Revue," with the title, Oh là que c'est bête tout ça. The gods avert the omen!

Vienna.

Nov. 6.—A second hearing of Der Fliegende Holländer confirms the impression that it is the most satisfactory and the least eccentric of all Wagner's operas. Written apparently before the ambitious intention of forming a new school of music for the future had seized and fettered the mind of the composer, it is a work containing some of the freshest and most vigorous efforts of his genius. Instances certainly occur where novel effects are attempted, in which the style subsequently adopted by Wagner is foreshadowed; but they are rare and almost forgotten in the many points of excellence to be admired. The overture—a composition of neither the form nor importance to justify that title—opens with a subject which most frequently recurs throughout the work. This theme pervades the opera, and is that with which the Holländer, in thought and presence, is identified. It is very effectively introduced, as the commencement of Senta's ballad in the second act, when she relates the story of the Flying Dutchman, and foretells her own destiny. Whether dramatically or musically considered, the treatment of this subject is most successful, and increases the interest of the whole work by the skilful manner in which it is made subservient to the progress of the plot. The notion may not be original, but its development evinces a knowledge of the resources of his act, which none but a thorough musician can attain.

To the first act the storm and the chorus of sailors on board Daland's ship forms a spirited introduction. As the tempest temporarily subsides, the tenor solo, a mariner's love song, contrasts well with the preceding and subsequent description of the elemental strife. The storm rises again (most graphically portrayed in the orchestra), as the vessel of the Flying Dutchman appears. The grand scena of the Holländer, "Die Frist ist um," and his following duet with the bass (Daland), are both in Weber's style, and would not be unworthy of that master's signature. The act terminates with a chorus of sailors as the ships set sail. After a short instrumental prelude the second act begins with a melodious chorus for female voices, sung by Senta's companions, while they spin. In this a striking effect is made by the women laughing in chorus, jeering Senta for her melancholy. Then follows Senta's ballad already mentioned, a composition full of character and dramatic feeling; after this there is a duet between the soprano and tenor, Senta and Erik, her betrothed, when the lover urges his suit in a most plaintive melody, not altogether new, but so harmonized and instrumented as in a great measure to disguise its Italian origin. At the conclusion of the duet Erik departs, and Daland (Senta's father) returns accompanied by the Holländer, in whom Senta recognizes the object of her ideal love and destiny. It is in the treatment of this situation, the most important moment of the libretto, that the composer fails. The Holländer and his victim are made to stand and look at each other for some time, while their emotions, supposed to be under various influences, are very inadequately depicted by music in the orchestra. The result is such as might be expected—the situation is lost. A solo for Daland "Mögst du, mein kind," the duet between Senta and the Holländer, "Wie aus der Ferne," and a terzetto for the three just named, are the other morceaux in this act. The third and last act opens with a chorus of sailors about to leave the port; they are joined by women bringing provisions. The ship of the Holländer, lying at anchor, is hailed by the women and sailors, but no reply is given by the mysterious crew. Suddenly the wind rises, and the spectral mariners man their ship, singing the refrain with which the Holländer has been identified. A double chorus between the two ships' crews follows, and is the noisiest and least effective piece of music in the opera. Senta subsequently appears, followed by Erik, who endeavors to dissuade her, in a duet allegro agitato, "Was musset ich hören," from following the Holländer. The last finale, in which Senta, Daland, the Holländer, the choruses of the sailors, and the women take part, is admirably contrived, and forms a fitting termination to the work. It is somewhat singular that Wagner should consider the Fliegender Holländer as the least important of his operas, another instance that composers are not by any means the best judges of their own productions.

At the Kärntnerthor Theatre the repertoire is almost similar to that of last week. Some changes will, I believe, be made in the performances announced, for even an opera house, under the management of an Emperor's representative, is not exempt from such casualties. "I have sent word that I shall not sing this evening," exclaimed one of the artistes whom I met yesterday. "Not sing," I replied; "but you are announced, and will not surely disappoint us." "No, no! I won't disappoint you," was the reply. "But let the Director think so. A few hours' Bauchweh will do him no harm."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Sons of the greenwood. Cavatina.

"Robin Hood." 30

The greatest plague on earth is love. Duet for Soprano and Tenor.

"Robin Hood." 25

Two more vocal gems from the new sensation Opera by Macfarren. The first is a brilliant air, written in the florid style, the second a very pleasing duet which is well adapted for the parlor, and sure to become popular.

Good night, good night to all. C. Robbins. 25

Lines written on the death of an accomplished young lady, an only daughter, who was burnt to death by the explosion of a fluid lamp. Her last words as she parted from her friends on that fatal evening were "Good night, good night to all." The music is appropriate. The piece has a very pretty vignette.

From love and home and thee. W. Guernsey. 25

Sentimental ballad with a pretty melody.

Jenny the pride of the glen. Lon Morris. 30

A sweet pretty song sung nightly with great applause by the popular ballad singer, Mr. Ambrose A. Thayer, whose likeness is on the title-page.

Instrumental Music.

March from the Oratorio of "Abraham."

Melique. 25

This is quite a remarkable production. At the first performance of the Oratorio at the Norwich (Eng.) Festival this noble march created a furor. The best English critics call it "the finest march written since Mendelssohn's Wedding March."

I'm leaving thee in sorrow, Annie. Transcription. Brinley Richards. 40

An elegant piano arrangement of a beautiful melody. The "Warblings at eve" by this author, one of the most charming piano pieces ever written, will no doubt prepare the way for these admirable Transcriptions of English, Irish and prominent operatic melodies of which this piece is the last number.

WEBER'S THEORY ON MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

Treated with a view to a Naturally Consecutive Arrangement of Topics. By Godfrey Weber. Translated from the improved German edition, with Notes. By James F. Warner. 2 vols. Price, $4.

Weber's work is prominently adapted to this country. Its admirably clear and simple style, taken in connection with the copious detail of its matter, renders it, as the author himself very justly observes, peculiarly appropriate to those who have but little or no present acquaintance with the subject. On the one hand it is the best authority that the world contains; on the other, it is simple and easy to be understood. The word "Theory" seems rather an unfortunate one to be used in this connection. To the apprehension of many, it carries the idea of something that is far removed from the practical and useful, and that it is attended with no real, substantial advantages; while in point of fact, the term, as employed in the present instance, designates a body of principles and a mass of knowledge which is practical in the very highest degree, and which sustains very much the same relation to musical action, as a helm does to a ship, or a guide to a traveler, or sunbeams to all our operations in the external world.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

A Day Dream.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

A day dream by the dark blue deep ;
Was it a dream, or something more ?
I sat where Posilipo's steep,
With its grey shelves, o'erhung the shore.

On ruined Roman walls around
The poppy flaunted, for 'twas May,
And at my feet, with gentle sound,
Broke the light billows of the bay.

I sat and watched the eternal flow
Of those smooth billows toward the shore ;
While quivering lines of light, below,
Ran with them on the ocean floor.

Till, from the deep, there seemed to rise
White arms upon the waves outspread,
Young faces, lit with soft blue eyes,
And smooth, round cheeks, just touched with red.

Their long, fair tresses, tinged with gold,
Lay floating on the ocean-streams ;
And such their brows as bards behold,
Love-stricken bards, in morning dreams.

Then moved their coral lips ; a strain
Low, sweet and sorrowful I heard,
As if the murmurs of the main
Were shaped to syllable and word.

The sight thou dimly dost behold,
Oh, stranger from a distant sky !
Was often, in the days of old,
Seen by the clear, believing eye.

Then danced we on the wrinkled sand,
Sat in cool caverns by the sea,
Or wandered up the bloomy land,
To talk with shepherds on the lea.

To us, in storms, the seaman prayed,
And, where our rustic altar stood,
His little children came and laid
The fairest flowers of field and wood.

Oh woe, a long unending woe !
For who shall knit the ties again
That linked the sea-nymphs, long ago,
In kindly fellowship with men ?

Earth rears her flowers for us no more,
A half-remembered dream are we,
Unseen we haunt the sunny shore,
And swim, unmarked, the glassy sea.

And we have none to love or aid,
But wander, heedless of mankind,
With shadows by the cloud-rack made,
With moaning wave and sighing wind.

Yet sometimes, as in elder days,
We come before the painter's eye,
Or fix the sculptor's eager gaze,
With no profaner witness nigh.

And then the words of men grow warm
With praise and wonder, asking where
The artist saw the perfect form
He copied forth in lines so fair.

As thus they spoke, with wavering sweep
Floated the graceful forms away ;
Dimmer and dimmer, through the deep,
I saw the white arms gleam and play.

Fainter and fainter on mine ear
Fell the soft accents of their speech,
Till I, at last, could only hear
The waves run murmuring up the beach.

The Diarist Abroad.

PARIS, Nov. 27, 1860.

I wrote formerly of the pleasure given me by the sound, healthy music in these days of "the future," by Offenbach, as heard in two of his operettas, which had gone from the Bouffes Parisiennes, to the German theatres. It so happened that the first performance, which I heard here, was his "Orphée aux Enfers," at the aforesaid Bouffes. The thing as the name implies is a burlesque upon Gluck's Orpheus, and an immensely comical affair it is, even as seen without understanding the dialogue—for my knowledge of French is that of the eye—spoken it is "all Greek" to me. The piece has now reached more than 300 representations. One reason of its running so long is doubtless the small size of the theatre—the smallest I ever saw. Still the piece itself has great merit as a burlesque, and the music is delightful in itself and delightfully appropriate. A song by John Styx is quite remarkable for its humor. Of the broad farcicality of this burlesque, perhaps this will give an idea. Orpheus is deprived of his Eurydice by the shepherd Aristæus, who is in fact Pluto in disguise, and who takes the lady down to his own regions, where he may make love to her at his leisure. Jupiter, who is sadly henpecked by Madame Juno, hears about the affair from Mercury, and determines to "cut out" his brother god. This he undertakes to do in the form of a huge blue-bottle fly. The scene in which he visits Eurydice in this form is one dangerous to diaphragms.

I meant to have heard it again, for the sake of the music, as well as the laugh, for it—the music, not the laugh—besides its melodiousness, shows a variety and beauty in its orchestration, a working up of themes and a general effectiveness, which seems to prove more genius than we have met with in many of our younger composers ; a genius, too, which is content to do what it can do well, without straining after awful sublimity, where it would be all out of place. Offenbach is of a Jewish family of Cologne, I am told ; at all events he is a pupil of Ferdinand Hiller, of that city—and a creditable one.

Another evening I went to the Theatre Lyrique to hear Gluck's "Orpheus," with Mme. Pauline Viardot as Orpheus. I had heard and read so much of this lady as a great lyric artist that my expectations were sadly disappointed. Could she ever have had a voice ? A great actress she assuredly is, and her style of singing very great. The character is, however, with me, identified with Johanna Wagner, as she was five years since. And she, in all points except vocal execution, is (as in stature) head and shoulders above Viardot.

In putting the opera upon the stage, too, what a falling off from the royal stage in Berlin—the scene in Tartarus perhaps excepted—but what a Frenchy Elysium ! That wonderful piece of music, the dance of the demons, was omitted, a piece which as played in Berlin adds so much by contrast to the musical painting of Elysium. Nevertheless, it was a great treat. Why could not this be brought out, with an English text, at the Boston Museum, instead of shallow pieces, which are neither one thing nor another ?

At the same theatre I have seen Halevy's "Vale of Andorra, an opera in which most of the scenes are spoken dialogue and not to be understood by me. The music pleased me much, far more than anything else which I have heard by Halevy. The only good singer was the old bagpiper, a splendid barytone and a very fine actor. He would be a valuable accession to the New Orleans French company. The ballet is introduced twice, and very good dancers appeared in it ; not much inferior to those I have seen on royal and imperial stage in grace ; equal in sprightliness and far beyond them in lasciviousness. As a rule I dislike the introduction of ballet in opera, anywhere except in ballet pantomimes, and would most gladly have dispensed with it here. Not so the French audience. It was immensely delighted. The auditorium is not very large, the stage is a fine one, the machinery and scenery excellent. Why need our stages be half a century behind those of Germany and France in these respects, as all my friends here agree they are ?

Having a curiosity to see one of the famous French pieces of Magic, I went into the Theatre Imperial du Cirque, to a performance of the "Hen that laid the golden Eggs." The eggs had an explosive mixture, and the actors had but to crack one upon the stage to have their wishes fulfilled. The transformations were, many of them, very fine and surprising. In one instance, the breaking of an egg changes almost instantly half a dozen windmills on hillocks, into magnificent barges floating in (stage) water, and filled with cavaliers and ladies. A very comical idea is that of introducing, what I suppose must be the King of all dunghill cocks—in shape of a man dressed to imitate that famous bird, whose gestures as well as the jokes he uttered were received with roars of laughter. This piece had a great interest for me as being an excellent specimen of that sort of magic opera which was so much in vogue in Vienna 75 years ago, and to which we owe Mozart's "Magic Flute." I am told, however, that another piece at the Porte St. Martin, of this class, is still finer. The music is partly new and partly selected by a man named Clairville. Among the selections is the huntsman's chorus from "Der Freyschütz." As a whole it is very light, melodious, and pleasing; very enjoyable. Some of the scenery is superb, particularly one of the infernal regions, in which, my friend H. tells me, the French are very great, and with whom it is a favorite subject. Solo singing mostly poor, poor voices, poor execution; chorus good; the songs, as a rule, little more than repetition of words, half spoken, with a nice orchestral accompaniment. One comical musical effect was new to me.

One of the actors begins a song and at the end of the first line others strike in with a single note, fortissimo. No. 1. stops, eyes the others, as Ravel used to eye the man who stole his bottle, for some six or eight bars, and then goes on again, with another line, only to be broken off in the same manner. As the pauses were nicely calculated, so as not to lose the rhythm, and the music really pleasing, the effect was very ludicrous.

I have been to hear the "Prophet," partly because in spite of Blank and Dash, I like the opera and partly because this is a good work by which to see for myself in the Grand Imperial opera in Paris is in fact so far above and beyond anything which one can see in Germany. I have been so often assured (generally by friends who have never been in Berlin!) that if I really would see one of Meyerbeer's great show pieces I must come to Paris, that my curiosity was greatly excited. The music is, of course, the same to all intents and purposes orchestras of very nearly the same number of performers; choruses also, both large and good; solo singers six of one, half a dozen of the other; here Fides was Tedesco, now a pretty extensive, middle-aged, dark-eyed German woman, singing just so roundly as of yore at the Howard Athenæum, when she so captivated Henry, her voice, I think somewhat worn, her execution exquisite. There (Berlin) Johanna Wagner, with a grand, full voice, that always took hold of my feelings at once, a great actress, but as a singer deficient in those graces and that execution, which only early and the right culture can give one. Which of the two I should choose to hear in this part, it is quite difficult to decide.

As to the putting of the "Prophet" upon the stage, on the whole I prefer Berlin. Certainly the skating scene and the sunrise there are far more beautiful and true to nature than here. The Berliners know how to skate—these people did not. The Cathedral here was more showy but was very nearly an impossible one, while at Berlin you saw old Münster on the stage and a real Gothic edifice. Here it would seem to be the aim to dazzle the auditor; in Berlin to give him true representations of nature. Hence, when one sees Spontini's "Vestal," the "Magic Flute," "Orpheus," and the like plays there one gets a fund of knowledge from the scenery. I am told that "Semiramis" is thus put upon the stage here, now, but I have not seen it.

I believe these are all the operatic notes which I have to impart.

As to other music I have heard none, save some very fine pianoforte playing at "C. P. C.'s". The performer was a young woman, Miss Colmache, daughter of a well-known literary lady here, and sister of the singer, whom the Journal must know as Mlle. Vaneri, of Her Majesty's Theatre, in London. I was exceedingly impressed with Miss Colmache's performance, particularly Beethoven's C sharp minor Sonata, op. 27; not more by her execution than by her poetic conception of the music. A more simple, unaffected natural person one does not often see; an enthusiast for music for music's sake; full of Beethoven and Chopin. What is more, she has thought and can talk of the art sensibly. I wish she was in Boston. I hear that her sister, now engaged in Italian opera, is a fine English oratorio singer. I saw Thalberg the other morning. He is going to Naples, to my great disappointment, as this deprives me of a sight of many valuable manuscripts, which I hoped to examine.

Nothing further about the production of Tannhäuser here. There is a story that the director of the opera gave as an insurmountable objection to the work, that it contained no ballet, with which Wagner refused to have anything to do. But thinking better of it, he wrote all night and the music was finished. But as he would have the ballet at the opening of the work, (in the hall of Venus), the director was not satisfied, and how it will be arranged is still the question. It can be nowhere else without violating the principles on which Wagner constructs his work.

Letters on Musical Subjects.

VII.

A LETTER FROM ZURICH—MARX ON BEETHOVEN'S LIFE AND WORKS.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—Since writing my last letter to you, (see Journal of April 21st,) much time has elapsed and much land and sea has been between us. I feel so little like beginning where I then left off, that you will have to excuse me to-day for letting some one else speak. The extracts from a letter received a few days ago will be as interesting to you, I hope, as anything I might write. It is dated Zurich, Dec. 3d, and was written by a lady friend, a teacher of music. Concerning a little scholar, who began with her about the middle of September, she writes: "As long as we did not play from notes, instruction was mere play; with them some difficulties came also, of course. Now we have quite a long part of the road behind us. She plays without mistakes, moderately fast, all the major keys through two octaves, without an undue motion of the hand, raising her fingers nicely from the joints. She knows of course how to form the scales, as she learned long ago the difference between the whole and halfstep by ear. She knows how to find the tonic chord of each major key in its various positions—the names of the inversions I do not use yet—and plays them as broken chords. From any given fundamental tone she finds without hesitating large and small second and third, fifth and octave; less readily the fourth, sixth and seventh. She also knows the intervals by ear when I play them. In naming them I use the terms first, second, &c. degree. She used to play little pieces from Knorr's edition of Müller. Now, since she has made good friends of the bass key and the bass notes we play from the second book of 'Köhler's Volks-melodien' besides other little pieces, which she learns by heart quite readily. When she knows a little piece quite perfectly, I play it to her once more and then tell her, now look at every note with the intention of learning it by heart; after having played a short musical sentence in this way, I make her look at her hands and she knows it by heart. In this way we go over the whole piece, and then she plays it from beginning to end without interruption."

I quote this extract as it may show you how intelligent teachers think and proceed with reference to learning pieces by heart; a practice which is still condemned by some and also to give you an example of how much may be accomplished in two and a half months, with a daily lesson of half an hour's length. Most beginners get too few lessons. Little at a time, regularly and often is the best rule for the nursing of children, concerning their physical, mental and musical diet.

"The little musician knows all the portraits of the great tone-masters hanging in my room, and might tell you something of every one of them. My little pupils, boys and girls look forward with eager anticipation to Christmas and to Mozart's birthday, which the crowd of little ones are going to celebrate at my house. In winter I have once or twice a month a musical Sunday at my rooms. I made this arrangement as we have here so few opportunities of hearing good music and this is a point of so much importance. My older pupils come, we make music and read something on music. For a change we read Goethe's Egmont on Sunday last with Beethoven's music, of course only in the arrangement for four hands, as we have no orchestra at our command. Making music at the piano by oneself does not make a person musical; therefore such reunions are necessary."

"We have just now one of the most famous piano players here, ALFRED JAELL. He gave one concert and will give one more. I confess that he did not come quite up to my expectations. From all I had read and heard about him, I expected more. His technical ability is perfect, his touch is capable of all the shades from the most tenderly breathed piano to the greatest force; and yet—he is wanting in that which raises FRAU SCHUMANN so high above most piano players—soul." It may be added here that the lady is a personal friend of Frau Clara Schumann. She continues: "In hearing him play one cannot help thinking that he feels nothing of it himself. One admires, but is not taken hold of by the magic power which in Clara's playing at once transports one unto other undreamed of spheres. A remark of one of my pupils, a young man, best characterizes his playing. I had given him lately Hanslick's book on the Beautiful in music. Hanslick denies, as you know, that music expresses any ideas, restricting it mainly to a play in beautiful forms. After the concert the young man said: If one were to hear music played in such a way only, Hanslick would be right, no doubt; but as we fortunately hear it differently done, he is wrong."

"A few days ago an interesting little book came out entitled: 'The Spirit of Music by L. Nohl.' It is based throughout on Vischer's Aesthetics; in the purely musical part of it, however, he unfortunately does not always refer to sources as infallible as that. That he bases his remarks concerning Mozart on Otto Jahn is quite right; but the views of Marx on the last works of Beethoven seem to me after all somewhat too vague. Old Mr. Marx, who used in former times a number of unnecessary words, shows quite plainly the marks of old age; he is frequently quite too wordy. This footing on Marx even misleads the author, who is otherwise correct and original into some contradictions,—a pity, since the book is really excellent. I am looking forward with lively anticipation to some interesting new works. Some serenades for the orchestra and the first concerto for the piano by Johannes Brahms, will shortly be published by Reiter-Lindemann in Winterthur. This publisher is certainly quite praiseworthy. He never yet accepted, and never will accept for publication an inferior composition. But from unknown talents, who cannot find a publisher, he takes everything. Is he not an excellent old man?"

That they are beginning in Germany to lower the concert-pitch, you know, I suppose. Cologne has the honor of having taken the lead in this movement. All the old wind instruments have been abandoned, new ones having been bought, which are in accordance with the normal (Paris) diapason. Now if Meyerbeer's operas vanish from the répertoires—there is little hope for it, to be sure—and if Wagner's do not take their places, we shall have less ruined voices in future." So far my extracts.

The lady's allusion to Marx' book on Beethoven calls to my mind an intention which I had since those articles on Marx appeared in this paper (April 21st and 28th, 1860). They were written with a great deal of knowledge on the subject, but also with a great deal of malice. We will admit all the author of those articles says about the faults of M.'s book as to biographical data; we will even admit that he quoted other works incorrectly—an admission which we only make because we have not got a copy of the second edition of Schindler's life of Beethoven before us, in which Schindler speaks in the highest terms of this same book of Marx. But what business had the writer to put in stories to prove the vanity of Marx even if they be true. Does this foible incapacitate Marx from judging of the contents of Beethoven's works. What the opinion of a thorough German critic on this work is, the translation of some articles written by Mr. Brendel, of Leipzig, the editor of the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," in the next "Journal" will show you. The evident gusto with which the writer of the paper in this "Journal" drags forth personalities, that have absolutely nothing to do with a review of a work containing musical criticism of the highest order, shows that there is another motive at the bottom. There is a bitter feud existing between a faction of old school musicians and those who follow Marx, who has undeniably written the best book on musical composition. As long ago as 1835 Marx attacked the old school, taking for his text a work by Dehn on musical composition. Dehn and his friends never forgave Marx the utter annihilation of the book and its system. And thus it happens that all possible personal abuse is heaped on Marx by that faction. As these private matters are utterly irrelevant to the impartial review of a momentous work we abstain from any further remarks on them. And by way of fair play we will translate and publish the review of Dr. Brendel, which is written by a person competent and impartial.

You subscribed to the Philharmonic concerts—of course. Pity that not more persons did the same. The lists look rather blank. It would be a nice thing for Boston not to have any Philharmonic concerts this season. Well, after the old Handel and Haydn Society fell through with their subscription list, anything in this line seems possible here in our Athens. G. A. SCHMITT.

Lurline.

A REVIEW OF MR. WALLACE'S NEW OPERA.

It is not usual to criticise an opera before hearing it on the stage; but when the score, neatly printed and adapted to the ability of musicians of only ordinary skill, appears from the press, it appears to us that it possesses as many claims to notice as a new book, at least. There are thousands of amateur piano players and vocalists in this city who are fully able to play and sing most of the pieces in Wallace's Lurline, and for them the present brief analysis of the opera, as published by Hall & Son, is intended.

Mr. Wallace is known personally to many of our citizens, and as a composer his name is familiar all over the country. His piano-forte adaptations of operatic and other airs, and his original compositions for the piano, are among the most graceful and effective ever written. As an opera composer his reputation in this country rests entirely on his Maritana, and he has but recently finished the Amber Witch, of which much is expected.

Lurline, his best work so far, was first produced at Covent Garden Theatre on the evening of the 25th of February, 1850, and has already been played some fifty nights with renewed applause. It has proved an undeniable success, and while it has brought money to the management it has proved a happy vehicle in which the singers engaged could ride still further into public favor, and has also done infinite credit to the composer. If Wallace's next opera proves as happy a success as Lurline, he may rest contented.

The libretto of the opera is by Mr. Fitzball, who has had considerable experience in this line, but it must be confessed, has not done full justice to his subject, the Rhine story of the syren of Lurleiburg. Mendelssohn commenced an opera on the same subject, but did not live to finish it. The following is the plot of Lurline:

Act I.—Count Rudolph, an extravagant young German in an antique castle on the banks of the Rhine, having dissipated his patrimony among his graceless followers, proposes marriage with Ghiva, the daughter of a baron reputed rich, who, thinking his daughter's suitor wealthy, approves of the project; but an explanation taking place, the proposed alliance is mutually decided to be inexpedient. Previous to this rupture, Lurline, the Nymph of the Rhine, who, by her enchanted harp and song, lures vessels to destruction in the whirlpool of the river, has seen Count Rudolph in his bark and fallen desperately in love with him. Accordingly, she presents herself to him at a wild banquet, (the last that he and his companions have determined to hold in the castle,) and surrounding him by spells, places a magic ring on his finger and disappears. On recovering his reason the Count has become enamored of the beautiful Water Queen: the notes of her bewitching harp and voice attract him to the Rhine; he embarks, despite all interferences, is engulfed and supposed to perish.

Act II. opens in the coral caves under the waters inhabited by Lurline and her nymphs, in which, by virtue of his talismanic ring, Rudolph is enabled to exist. His followers are seen in a boat singing a requiem for the loss of their chief, by which he is so affected that he urgently desires to return to them for a short time. Lurline consents to his departure for three days, and agrees to wait his return on the summit of the Lurleiburg at the rising of the moon on the third evening, and he departs laden with gems and pearls from the ocean balls.

Act III. On returning to his companions Rudolph discloses to them, and to the Baron and Ghiva, the source of his newly acquired wealth, and the old matrimonial project is renewed. Ghiva, fearing again to lose her betrothed, steals from her his enchanted ring, by which alone he can return to the coral caves, and throws it into the Rhine. In the meantime Lurline, inconsolable in the absence of the young count, sings her lament to her harp nightly on the Lurleiburg, where a gnome in the service of the Rhine King finds and brings her the enchanted ring as a proof of her lover's infidelity. Lurline resolves to upbraid him for his perfidy, and visit him with her vengeance.

The old mansion on the Rhine is now the scene of great festivity, but amidst it all the Count thinks sadly of his forsaken Lurline, but dare not present himself before her without the lost ring. Lurline appears to him alone and demands it. A scene of reproach ensues, ending by her denouncing the treachery of his companions, who, grown envious of wealth, had plotted to destroy him and plunder the castle. Rudolph is implored to take refuge in flight by Ghiva, but he prefers death at the feet of Lurline. The assassins approach, when Lurline's affection returning full force, she seizes the harp, and by the spell of music causes their destruction and saves her penitent lover.

The opera is preceded by an unusually long and elaborate overture, opening with a slow choral movement in D sharp major, which key predominates throughout. The overture without being a plagiarism, at once reminds the hearer of that to Weber's Oberon; and it may be remarked that the critics have generally noticed that in Lurline Wallace adopts Weber's style, and indulges in some of the orchestral effects which Weber has already made familiar to us.

The overture finished, the orchestra proceeds with a brief introduction, in which the smooth triplets, which serve as accompaniment to the melody, serve to suggest, with tolerable clearness, the idea of waves. Rhineberg appears and sings an accompanied recitative, containing little snatches of melody, and followed by a rapid air in F minor, "Idle Spirit," supposed to be addressed to some supposititious gnome. A dialogue in recitative—there is no spoken dialogue in the opera—follows, between the gnome and Rhineberg, leading to a spiritual chorus of water-spirits, welcoming the King of the Rhine:

In the halls of liquid crystal,
Where the water-lilies bloom,
Where the music of the billow
Lulls thee on thy wavy pillow,
King of the Rhine!
Welcome to thy home!

—the melody of which is repeated by the voices, with a varied accompaniment. A brief recitative that leads to Lurline's opening air, which is indeed the theme running through the whole opera. The words sung by the syren are these:

I.
Flow on, flow on, oh! silver Rhine,
Convey to him these tears of mine;
Ye rocks that wildly spread around
Let th' echo's note his name resound,
And breathe to earth and sky
My love and secret sigh;
Waft, echo, waft above,
Oh! Rudolph, thee I love.

II.
Ye flowers that strew the crystal tide
With perfume, tempt him to my side,
Ye nymphs that dwell beneath the wave,
Transport him to my coral cave—
Oh! Rudolph, thee I love.

Exquisitely beautiful is this melody, while the harp accompaniment gives to it peculiar effect. It is one of the most elegant and happy of Mr. Wallace's vocal compositions. It is followed by recitations and a romance for Lurline, "The Night Winds," a weird plaintive melody in A minor. The words are:

Where the night winds swept the wave,
And the white surge forms a grave;
When the moon withdraws its beam,
When the stars no longer gleam
Then my wild chords pierce the gale.
And distract the mariner's sail;
On the bark plunges through billows and gloom,
To the Lurleiburg whirlpool, its wreck and its gloom.
Yet when 'tis calm and Nereids charm
Is hushed and silent as the deep,
And the mariner pale as his own white sail
Lies fathoms down in his quiet sleep
Oh! then I weep.

And the syren proceeds to tell her father a youthful knight gazed on her from his skiff and her harp fell tuneless from her hand. She was, of course, in love.

Very beautiful is the succeeding chorus in D flat major: "Sail! sail! on the midnight gale!" Its rapid, march-like movement has already made it a favorite with our brass bands, and it is probably the most ear-taking melody in the opera. A buffo duet for Ghiva and the Baron follows, with a sparkling accompaniment in the Rossini style, for orchestra. A trio and chorus—"Drain the cup of pleasure"—lead to a quaint and beautiful romance for tenor—"Our bark in moonlight beaming," in which Rudolph tells how he first heard Lurline. This is one of the most original pieces of the opera. A highly dramatic concerted piece concludes the act.

Act II. opens with a chorus of gnomes, followed by a delicate melody, "Under a spreading coral," by Lurline. A brilliant chorus and dance, "From his palace of crystal," lead to a romance for tenor, "Sweet form that on my dreamy gaze," of the Balfé school. Lurline has a pleasing drinking song, "Take this cup of sparkling wine," followed by a rather insignificant quartet and chorus. A drinking song for the gnome (basso) shows some singular orchestral effects, which again suggests Weber. Ghiva then has an easy and pretty ballad, "Gentle Troubadour," the melody of which unites both simplicity and originality. A hunting chorus, for male voices, with accompaniments for wind instruments, which follows, is usually encored in the representations of the opera. Rhineberg has a rather mawkish ballad, "The nectar cup may yield delight," and then enters the very beautiful scene in which Rudolph, beneath the waves, hears his companions singing his dirge. The andante movement—

Peace to the memory of the brave,
Tranquil may their slumbers be,
Peace to the dead beneath the wave:
Rudolph, peace to thee;

alternates beautifully with the interpolated strains of Rudolph and Rhineberg. This is one of the most finished compositions in the opera, as regards its harmonies and dramatic coloring. The act closes with a superb and melodious concerted piece, which, like those of Donizetti's and some of Bellini's, is worked up to an admirable climax, and followed by the usual stretta. Altogether, this act is the most effective of the work.

Act III. opens with an orchestral introduction leading to another ballad in the Balfé style, "My home, my heart's first home." A rather dreary chorus about "Gold," and a duo for Ghiva and Rudolph, with exquisite melody running through the accompaniment, brings us to an elaborate scene for Lurline, in which the interest is hardly sustained to the end. A very beautiful unaccompanied quartet, "Though the world with transport bless me," which will become a popular concert piece, brings us to a grand duet for soprano and tenor, noticeable rather for dramatic coloring than melody, and then, after a few intervening recitatives and bits of chorus, we have the finale to the opera in a recurrence of Lurline's opening air, in which the disappointed syren sings:

Flow on, flow on, thou lovely Rhine,
The spell has ceased which made thee mine;
Oh! bloom enchanted scene
While young and pure hearts beat,
Or pure and gentle lips repeat
The Legend of Lurline;

while the chorus listening to her distant strains maintained a subdued vocal accompaniment. As the air concludes, Lurline darts off into a series of graceful fioturi, the chorus still accompanying. Then, as she strikes her harp, a prolonged thrill on E, gradually dying away, is the last note of the syren which we hear.

"Lurline" is indeed a beautiful work; and, what is quite as important, it is published, either entire or in parts, by Hall & Son, and easily accessible. We direct the attention of amateur singers to it, and pianists will find in its melodies accompaniments sufficient to occupy their attention for many a pleasant evening. That Lurline will be popular here when better known there can be no doubt; for rich harmony, graceful finish, and gushing, fresh and easy melody, is always popular with true music lovers; and all these qualities are combined in Mr. Wallace's new opera.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Notes of Birds; A Hint for Musical Critics.

There is an old saying to the effect that it takes all sorts of people to make a world." For instance, a Mr. W. D. Hipkins ("Phœbus! what a name!") is just now descanting most learnedly and amusingly, in the columns of a London journal, on The Mystery of London Bird-Fancying. In order that our readers may form some idea of the solemn importance of this mystery, we subjoin three brief extracts, expounding most luminously the vocal characteristics of three among the chosen tribes. We commence with the Linnet. Hipkins loquitur:

Linnetts are said by bird-fanciers to possess certain properties of song, which are thus denominated:—Weeting, chowing (rough and mellow), feering, laughing, piping, rattling, scrigging, wying, and whisking. The bird that sings sweetest is said to do his song in the finest key, and, if he goes through his song without stopping, to lead and finish well. If he begins imperfectly, or stops in his song, it is termed a bad lead or finish. The birds are distinguished by the terms battling-birds and song-birds; the former, from singing matches, and being continually carried about to rooms where birds of a similar character are brought, become lavish and hurried in their song. The latter (which are better fitted to teach young birds, and are principally kept for that purpose) are said to keep good time, and are noted for the beauty of their song; and I may mention that a song-bird linnet, the property of Mr. R. Moody, was lately sold for £10. I now proceed to the detail of song—the jerks. Of these, of course, I can only give a portion, and those the most approved at the time I went to hear matches sung. The following are the names of a few sung by the best birds:—Tollic tollic chay, ic ic quake aweet; lug lug orch aweet; ter weet, &c.; tollic chou, ic ic quake chou; egip egip pipe chou; ogip egip poi; tuc tuc fear; tuc tuc vizzy; and a very rare old song, au au chay chawisk. Some birds do an objectionable song called the donkey, ic au jah; and some, after finishing a jerk, end with chite chite chite. This, with good fanciers, would, notwithstanding that they did plenty of "toys" (a term for good song), cause them to be parted with as cast-offs, lest they should spoil their nestlings, branchers, and young linnet-mules; they were, however, readily bought for battling-birds, in which this defect of song was often passed over, provided they were spirited birds. I may mention here the linnet's calls, as they are sometimes named at the commencement or during the song. Tollic, tollic, pew and poi, and the chuckle; they are so plain that any one who has once noticed them would immediately recognize them.

Very good and clear for the Linnet. The Goldfinch comes next, and we really think our Operatic critics might learn to distinguish betwixt the "tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee" of their subjects, by careful study of Hipkin's discriminations. Thus does Hipkins define the Goldfinch's strong points.

I will now describe a portion of what fanciers designated as the best song of the goldfinch. The properties were peeping, sublinking, and chumying or churmying; there are but few birds at present that excel in the latter property, and the owners highly prize them. The running song was, Sublink, sublink, churmy churmy chink (or churmy chay); sepat sepat, churmy chay; widdle widdle chay, &c. It was the first of these jerks in particular for which Foote's mule was considered so valuable, from its rarity. It led and finished well, and its song was clear and distinct. It was considered one of the best song birds of its kind to be found, and, I think, better than any goldfinch or mule to be heard at present. The present favorite song, as read by fanciers, is Sipit slam slam, widdle widdle siwity, off which jerk some birds do the hussle chay, and the sipit widdle widdle, slam slam widdle chay. Slamming was formerly disregarded, not being considered a good property, as birds singing their natural note (those caught after moulting in the fields) were distinctly designated rough slamming birds. The song of the latter, however, is not so distinct and clear as that of birds which have been taught; but there is not to the uninitiated so marked a difference between the songs of the taught and the untaught birds, when heard together, as there is between those of the furry and the song-bird linnet.

You may exhaust a pipkin by emptying it of its contents. Hipkins tapers off when he comes to speak of the Chaffinch, which he does in this fashion.

The English fanciers have several strains of birds, thus denominated in former times; the chocweydo, the whitfadoo, the kissmedear, &c., but the chocweydo is considered the best song; one of the best limbs being ching ching ching, ull ull ull, chocweydo; the last note the oftener repeated the better—technically termed heavy in the mouth; this applies to all the notes, the principal difference being the termination or finish of each strain. The birds vary the notes in each limb, but terminate with whitfadoo, kissmedear, or chocweydo, according to the strain to which they belong.

If we should ever have Frezzolini, Fabbri, and D'Angri simultaneously on the boards of our Academy of Music—for example, in Zerlina, Donna Anna and Donna Elvira—why, this number of the Albion ought to be in great demand.—N. Y. Albion.

NEW SERIES.

BERLIN, Dec. 2, 1860.

Already five or six weeks in the heart of musical Germany! And not a word of it recorded for our readers! Long weeks of travelling and novelty, too, before that, where music was not a direct object. But the kind reader knows what news came one day with a stunning blow upon the happy traveller, palsyng the hand that writes. But God's sun still shines, life still goes on. Nature is beautiful and still speaks to the soul, and so do Art and Music, still divine and true to our deepest needs, even when sorrow shakes the whole bright and wondrous fabric of this life, till life and time appear unreal.

A brief sketch now, a catalogue of what these five or six weeks have afforded of the richest musical opportunity, enough to occupy perhaps several letters, and then we will return at leisure to the interesting topics. And first

A WEEK IN LEIPZIG.

It was quite late in October. At the edge of evening, wet, muddy, dark and cheerless, with every outward impression of the gloomiest, unacquainted with a human being there, alone, with a great isolating grief for a companion, the traveller entered this Mecca of a music-loving pilgrimage. The heavenly ministry of music was now truly to be tested. It was not many hours before he stood within that homely, quaint old architectural curiosity, the Thomas Kirche, in which old Sebastian Bach was Cantor for so many years. There was the old organ, far up, in the second gallery, at one end of the church, and there were assembled the boys of the Thomas School, some thirty or forty in number, to sing, as they always do at one o'clock on Saturdays, motets and anthems; and hundreds of lovers of such serious music make it a point always to be present. This time we had not the good fortune to hear anything of Bach. The pieces were: 1. a Motet by Richter, one of the present professors in the Conservatorium, a composition of much contrapuntal merit and much beauty, in a somewhat Mendelssohnian vein; and 2, a Pater Noster, by Meyerbeer. The music in itself was not unedifying; but the sound of those sweet, clear, fresh young voices, beautifully blended, and without accompaniment, was something almost angelic, and fell like a refreshing dew upon the weary spirit.

The next morning (Sunday), in the same place, the Lutheran service opened with a chorale, followed by an elaborate Cantata in several movements, with chorus, soli and orchestral accompaniment, composed by Richter, after the traditional example of old Bach, who every Sunday for some years made it his religious task there to produce a fresh, original Cantata of this sort. The cleverest musician in our day would think it not a small achievement to produce a few such in a lifetime. Verily, if ever music was the daily service and religion of a whole life, praising God with all one's heart and all one's soul and all one's strength, forever striving with a pure zeal and contentment for the highest, inspired with true creative faculty and ever fresh designs, inspired with love of work, to realize them, it was so then and there with Bach. Such gigantic industry, so patient, cheerful, happy, inspired by such genius, and aiming ever at the most beautiful, the perfect, undisturbed by any poor anxiety about the world's applause, but thinking always only of the best and reaching it with certainty of aim proportioned to such singleness of purpose, is about as good an illustration as human biography affords of what may be meant by "the beauty of holiness." A man of genius constantly producing his greatest in the routine of weekly service! And for whom? For what? For the congregation of a local church, who can scarcely be supposed to have appreciated the wondrous skill and subtlety of such art, or to have been struck by the Cantata otherwise than they may have been by any idle passing notice of the Gothic ornament upon the walls and colored windows of their churches; and where too it must seem very doubtful if the means existed for any adequate rendering of the music, such as we now have. They heard each Cantata once, and then it was put away and forgotten, not to come to light again until now, a century later, when these works are for the first time published and performed in concerts, to become henceforth the admiration and the study of all musicians and all music-lovers who are in earnest with their art. It is as if Albrecht Dürer or Da Vinci had every Sabbath hung up a fresh painting, a production of his highest art, before the altar, to be wondered at for the moment, and then put aside most probably forever.

On this occasion the composer had for his Cantata the advantage of a modern orchestra, which Bach had not. It was a sight hardly to be seen elsewhere, we imagine, in a plain Protestant church on Sunday morning, the organ-loft bristling with violin bows and bassoons, the fascies (fagotti) of the orchestral commonwealth; and it was a sound as strange to hear the confused tuning thereof going on amid the chorale of the morning service sung by the congregation down below. And among these violins were famous men, as David and Dreyschock, and Dawidoff among the 'celli. Conductor of the whole was the learned contrapuntist and professor, Hauptmann, now for years the occupant of old Bach's post of Cantor. It was a sweet, soothing, tranquilizing music, fit for the religious hour; a rich offering at the same time of artistic skill, both in the contrapuntal texture and the instrumentation of the work; the softer and more sentimental passages (not in a bad sense of the word) being again in a kindred vein with Mendelssohn. The choir, of which the sopranos and altos consisted of the boys we heard the day before, sang it as well as one could wish. The only drawback was the place itself, and the strange position of the choir up in that "sky parlor" of a great cold, dreary house.

The next Wednesday morning gave me the first taste of the famous Gewandhaus orchestra. It was the rehearsal for the concert of the following evening, which I also heard. Certainly here was an assemblage of such musicians, such artists as I had never seen before in one orchestra. Here, too, were the traditions of the place, where the spirit of Mendelssohn reigned so long, reviving and continuing the influence of Bach; here the local pride in art, in conscious striving for perfection, progress, ("Aufschwung," as the Germans have it), which, whether real or in large part fancied, is admirably expressed in the motto it has set up for itself over the arch and the bust of Mendelssohn at the stage end of the tasteful little hall: Res severa est verum gaudium, (The severe thing is a [our] real delight). There was an inspiration at least in the audience, in large part furnished, particularly at the rehearsal, by those engaged as teachers or as pupils in perhaps the most earnest and ambitious musical conservatory in the world. The galleries, sunken in the wall on three sides of the room, above, were filled with the pupils of both sexes, who have free admission to all these twenty concerts and rehearsals; while below one listened the more earnestly that he found himself sitting in the company of Moscheles, Richter, Hauptmann, Wenzel, Pappeitz, professors in the school, besides much of the first musical society in Leipzig. It is an orchestra of eighty. At the head of the unrivaled body of violins was Concertmeister David, on a raised seat, a strong, impetuous looking man, with the confident air of one long accustomed to go ahead and set the tempo in all musical movements where he is concerned. To look upon him one wonders at the rare feeling and expression with which he plays in solo, say in a Sonata of Beethoven, as I heard him once in private. As Conductor or Director there stood forth a man of gentler, finer mould apparently, one who seemed almost physically weak for such an energetic office, in the person of Carl Reinicke, the young successor to Rietz, who has removed to Dresden. There is something in the voice and general appearance of the man that reminds one of our own Otto Dresel, and he is evidently a musician of the same fine, firm fibre and the same clear, earnest stamp. He is certainly one of the most masterly pianists and genial composers of the day, as he with simple kindness gave me opportunity to know one morning, when he played to me not only some of the most imaginative works of Schumann, but also some truly significant and beautiful variations of his own upon a theme of Bach, and a charming Notturmo. Amid the artistic surroundings and in the cheerful and serene atmosphere of his artist home, it was too much like hours now ever sadly to be remembered, and the sympathetic tones touched deeper springs perhaps than they intended. The critical opinion of the Leipzigers upon the new conductor as such, and whether he is to make good the place of Rietz, seemed then to be not quite made up. Of the three preceding concerts there had been some complaint of something like timidity, want of that heroic vigor and decision in the taking up of movements, to which they had been accustomed. I have heard nothing to the contrary of the most cordial understanding, personal and artistic, between him and the sturdy coryphæus of the violins above-named; but one may easily imagine a conflict of temperaments, beyond the control of either, in such a relationship of leaders, which, in so delicate and sensitive a matter as the conducting of the orchestral ship through all the rough and smooth seas of a symphony, would naturally most disturb the finer nature of the two.

But Leipzig knew too well the value of the man it had called to itself, and is proud of the possession. As presiding spirit and director in the Gewandhaus concerts they feel that Reinicke is the right man. And this is felt particularly in the important function of determining the programmes, selecting and preparing the subject matter of the concerts. These have been so far of remarkable interest, representing many sides, while always classical and sterling. Indeed the selections have had quite an historical character, illustrating progress, and contrasting new with old, not afraid even of the newest tendencies. Thus the leading features of the first concert were one of the latest works of Beethoven, the overture, op. 124, and a Symphony and Violin fantasia by Schumann; of the second, Beethoven's 7th Symphony, Of the third, Handel's "Water Music"; a tenor Aria and a Concerto (C minor) for two pianos, by Sebastian Bach; a Symphony by his son, C. P. Emanuel Bach; a Symphony by Haydn, Aria from Mozart's Idomeneo, and Overture by Gluck. One would gladly have arrived a few days earlier for that. Another evening has been largely occupied with Cherubini, a composer much too seldom heard, taking advantage of the anniversary of his birth. The Concert which I heard rehearsed and finally performed was the fourth of the series and presented the following works;

FIRST PART.

1. Symphony (No. 4, A major).....Mendelssohn.
2. "O weint um sie," from Byron's Hebrew Melodies, for Soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, (first time).....Ferd. Hiller.
3. Frühlings-Fantasie, Concertstück for 4 solo voices, orchestra and pianoforte.....N. W. Gade.

SECOND PART.

4. Music to Byron's "Manfred," with connecting poem read.....Robert Schumann.

All fresh and modern again; but by composers who had too much genius of their own to need to try by the discarding of old forms to hide the want of genius.

I can never forget the sensation produced upon me instantly by the first notes of the fresh and buoyant allegro of Mendelssohn's well-known "Italian" Symphony, as it sprang so fountain-like into the air from those instruments that seem quickened with one soul. It was a delicious surprise, thoroughly stimulating to the whole musical and poetic sense, and transporting and possessing you at once. Truly I had never heard a symphony so admirably played. And yet the orchestra had imperfections. Some of the wind instruments, especially the horns, were coarse, — a temporary misfortune which no doubt will be, if it has not been already remedied; for of course the spirit exists there which must bring the whole up to the standard of past years as completely as the mass of strings, which is magnificent. A task of more difficulty was successfully essayed by the orchestra in rendering the overture, accompaniments, interludes and melodramatic bits of Schumann's "Manfred" music. To the entire work we listened with profound interest. It seemed to be in all respects one of the very best of Schumann's works, full of imaginative thoughts, and happy always in the expression of them. Indeed a real work of genius. The overture (which has been heard once in Boston) is a powerful reproduction in tones of the dark and melancholy soul of Manfred, with all the dreams of beauty and of love that play across the guilty and mysterious background. The songs of the Spirits of Air, Water, Earth, and Fire, with the Alpine suggestions of the accompaniments, are full of poetic beauty and rare and exquisite surprises. The tremendous chorus of the spirits Manfred summons up is of an overwhelming grandeur. Then, too, there are nice bits of pastoral relief now and then in the orchestra, such as the chamois hunter's horn, and so forth. And the Requiem from the cloister in the distance, introduced for a finale, has a solemn, beautiful effect. One thing marred the whole, and that was the connecting poem, which was well read, but which was not Byron; instead of that a miserable abridgment of the "Manfred" had been concocted by some bardling in such a manner as to empty it of all its poetry and still protract the performance to a tedious length. The choruses were finely sung by members of the Sing-Akademie, the Pauliner Sängerverein and the boys of the Thomas choir. The solos were badly sung; uninteresting voices, and often out of tune.

Ferdinand Hiller's mournful music, if not strikingly original, is masterly in style and treatment, and an adequate, beautiful, impressive rendering of the lamentation of the Hebrews in their exile. It is such music as truly meets and fills the soul that is in grief. It flows in a rich, full flood of solemn euphony. Would not our Boston societies do well to procure this work?

Gade's "Spring" fantasia is an elaborate work marked by the same individuality as all his works — the constant individuality of the man and not any new individuality of the work itself. The same wild seashore reverie, not unlike Mendelssohn in his "Hebrides" and "Scotch" Symphony, but weaker far, pervades it. Portions, particularly of the purely instrumental interludes, were very beautiful; but as a whole it grew monotonous, and the musical reflexion of the thought in some lines of the lively little lyric poem was tame and commonplace.

The hall was uncomfortably crowded at the concert. One wonders that such an orchestra, giving such famous concerts, must needs imprison itself in and limit its audience to a room accommodating not more than 800 persons; and this time many seats were canceled to make room for the chorus. It is true the place has its charm and its tradition. It is no wonder that they like to keep alive good music in the very room where Mendelssohn so long presided. And so that little hall, somewhere in the middle of the vast gloomy old pile of building, centuries old, is made light and genial with all the symbols and suggestions of pure Art; it is a beautiful hall; most tasteful in its proportions and adornments; Mendelssohn's bust and the motto over it, above the stage, keep the first meaning and intention always present; and of course it is inspiring. They have a notion too, that it is a hall particularly good for sound — so it is; and that you catch all the finer shades of the orchestra there much better than in large halls, where much would be lost. But we could not help feeling that the fortissimos were sometimes lost, too, in the small place. One must not stand too near, if he would see a colossal work of architecture or sculpture. Leipzig has no large music halls. In Dresden it is even worse, the Symphonies, as well as Chamber Concerts, there being given in a still smaller room in a hotel. In Berlin it is not much better, as to size. Strange that we, in our American cities, with not the tenth part of so much noble music to be accommodated, are so much better off for music halls!

But I forget. Leipzig has vast halls — magnificent, sumptuous halls, worthy of royal halls of state, in which music is made day and night, the year round. And so has Dresden, and Berlin, and the other German cities. But these are cafés, beer and billiard saloons. Strange scenes they present to the uninitiated. All the population throngs to them apparently; through three or four hours of an afternoon or evening, thousands of people, of all ranks and ages, women and children, whole families often, go and sit there around little tables, sipping coffee, beer, or what not, the whole place cloudy with cigar smoke frequently, many of the women knitting or sewing in the most comfortable, sociable way, as if in their own houses, chatting away in the intervals of the music, but all as silent and attentive as at a lecture or a sermon when the orchestra begins.

There are several such places and such orchestras in Leipzig; always one or more for a resource, if time hangs heavy on one's hands. Here the programme seemed mostly miscellaneous and light, now and then a good overture or symphony offsetting quantities of polkas and fantasias. But in Dresden and in Berlin they have larger orchestras, and programmes loaded with solid classical music, in such amounts and such variety, that the most eager music-lover can hardly keep the run of his too many and too tempting opportunities. Would you believe, reader, that I have actually heard in one of those places, amid all the smoke and beer and coffee and knitting needles, the ninth symphony of Beethoven—the three first movements entire, and a pretty formidable abridgement of the fourth (the choral) movement to boot! So also the entire "Egmont" music; and often in one afternoon two symphonies, three overtures, and something else. These are the people's concerts. Of course they are not counted among the high festivals of Art. But how much they are doing to make Beethoven and Mozart, and Mendelssohn and Schumann, &c., as familiar as household words among all classes that can be called respectable! How they make the finest music at least as generally appreciated as the finest poetry and other literature! What an education to the heart, mind, imagination of the masses! What an intellectual resource to couple with amusement, and make life safe while it is free and happy! Grief itself can look on such a scene and thank God for the inextinguishable sunshine, the symbol of his presence, and for the genius of joy that never dies out in his children.

I had hoped to say something in this letter of the Musical Conservatorium in Leipzig, and to have made myself more fully acquainted with that famous institution. That must be reserved for another time. That week I was on my way to Berlin, to get settled for the winter after some four months of constant travelling, in the hope of frequent visits from that centre to Leipzig, Dresden, Hanover and other musical places. But reading that those two noble artists, Clara Schumann and Joseph Joachim, were to give the first of three concerts the next evening in Dresden, how could I hesitate to go first there; and how that providential impulse was rewarded it will take another letter to tell. A rich week was spent there; and such rich acquaintance, friendship I may say, commenced, that already the cloud and the heaviness of long weeks of bitter, restless solitude began to seem lightened, and the world itself again. And then came the attraction back to Leipzig for one day again, by so rare an opportunity as a performance of the Christmas Oratorio of Bach! And now several weeks in Berlin, rich with the Orpheus of Gluck, the Fidelio of Beethoven, several operas of Mozart, the "Ruins of Athens" music of Beethoven, nearly all his symphonies, and more than we have ever heard in America of the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, and many more by others old and new, all the four Leonora overtures, works of Schumann, noble choral works, and works of all kinds, the mere list of which would be longer than this letter. So indeed would be the mere list of what is announced for performance during the next eight days here.

All this is yet to be recorded,—not to speak of the great blank covering a period before this, which may still yield up some reminiscences in chance connection with appropriate topics. And now that it has pleased the good God to lift this ban of silence, we trust our broken Correspondence will continue, as before, its even flow, perhaps in somewhat deepened channels. D.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 24.—I regret that indisposition prevents me from giving you any more than the programme of our last Philharmonic concert,

PART I.

Symphony, No. 6, "La Pastorale," Op. 68, in F.... Beethoven
Concerto, for Piano, in A minor, Op. 64.... R. Schumann
Mr. S. B. Mills.

PART II.

"Festliche," Poème Symphonique, 1st time.... F. Liszt
Grande Fantaisie Russe, for Violoncello.... A. Kummer
Mr. F. Berger.
Paraphrase de Concert, for Piano, "Rigoletto".... F. Liszt
Mr. S. B. Mills.

Overture, "The Jubilee," in E.... Weber and remarking that the whole was very finely performed. Mr. MILLS proved that he has only gained in excellency as a pianist since his arrival here, when he played this same beautiful concerto at one of the Society's concerts. Mr. BERGMANN showed himself a perfect master of his instrument. The Society, in spite of the gloomy prospects of the present winter, is flourishing in an unusual degree. The first concert, instead of being, as I mistakenly asserted some time ago, not as full as usual, was the best first concert of the season that has ever taken place—and since then the number of members has greatly increased.

MASON & THOMAS' Soirées have met with a very annoying interruption. Mr. BERGMANN, infected probably by the spirit of a portion of his adopted country, has quarreled with the rest of the Quartet, and followed the example of "our little sister Caroline." As he is a rather more important element in the Union to which he belonged, than the above-named young lady in hers, the delightful concerts in which he took a part, have come to a sudden stop. The general sympathy is with the deserted, however, and every one hopes that they will find some one to show that Mr. Bergmann's place can be filled.

CHICAGO, DEC. 19.—Philharmonic Society's Second Concert.—One of the largest audiences assembled on Monday, Dec. 17, at Bryan Hall, to testify their appreciation for the really excellent concerts, given monthly by this Society. At an early hour the Hall, which is one of the largest and most beautiful in the West, was filled and every seat occupied.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Max Robespierre".....Litolff
2. Romance for tenor, with Accompaniment of Violoncello and Piano.....Tiebout
Mr. Louis Maus.
3. Grand Concerto in E, Opus 11.....Chopin
For Piano, with Accompaniment of Orchestra. Larghetto, Vivace. Performed by Mr. Paul Becker.
4. Terzetto and Chorus, from "Elijah".....Mendelssohn

PART II.

1. Introduction and Chorus, from the third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
2. Allegretto Scherzando, (Eighth Symphony).....Beethoven
3. Aria for Soprano, from "Gemma di Vergy".....Donizetti
Miss Anna Fessel.
4. Overture, "Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart
Conductor, Mr. Hans Balatka.

The orchestral performances throughout gave general satisfaction, and the ever pleasing Allegretto from the 8th Symphony was enthusiastically encored. Mr. PAUL BECKER, the classical pianist, in his usual smooth and graceful style, played the Grand Concerto in E, by Chopin, a composition full of originality and peculiar effects. The Choruses from Elijah and Lohengrin, sung by the Mendelssohn Society and members of the Philharmonic were poorly sustained and lacked spirit and animation. The Recitative and trio to the former were almost a failure. Miss ANNA FESSEL sang an aria from "Gemma di Vergy" with good effect, and was heartily applauded. She has a good vocalization and a voice of great power. Having but lately removed from Milwaukee, it was her first appearance here, and certainly a very successful one.

The third concert is announced to come off on Monday, Jan. 14, and is looked forward to with high expectation by the numerous friends of the Society.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Dec. 20.—A correspondent (from whom we shall be glad to hear again), sends us a notice from the Nashville Union, of the second concert of the Philharmonic Society of that city. Everywhere but in our own Boston, Philharmonic Societies seem to thrive this winter.

"Second Philharmonic Concert."—The Philharmonic Society are giving excellent fulfilment of their promise to devote themselves to the study of the great masters whose compositions have been stamped as classical, by the acclamation of the musical of all nations. Their programme on Tuesday night embraced the following pieces, each a gem in its way:

1. The Introduction and Allegro movement of Haydn's Grand Symphony in D, (one of the twelve composed for Salomon's concerts.)
2. Lanner's Lauterbrunnen Waltzes.
3. A concert Overture by Kalliwoda.
4. Mendelssohn's Wedding March.

The performance of Haydn's Symphony was, we think, much the most successful effort the Society has yet made; the beauties of Haydn's graceful melodies were enthusiastically and skillfully interpreted by the various performers, and the ensemble derived from Mueller's masterly guidance a precision and concert of action which brought out all the finely grouped harmonies of the work.

The set of waltzes next on the programme was the only piece which connoisseurs will hesitate to receive as strictly classical; but really when such a composer as Lanner uses the waltz as the form of his graceful compositions, we lose sight of the original destiny of such works as subordinate to the business of the ball room, and enjoy the sparkling fancies of the composer as much as if he had constructed them upon the more dignified model of the overture or symphony."

Our correspondent writes:

"In addition to what is there stated, perhaps a little information about C. H. MUELLER, our conductor may be acceptable; he is not unknown to Boston musicians having I believe for a season conducted the concerts of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society; long before that he was known to the present writer as leader of the orchestra in the Norwich Theatre, England, and of the Choral Society of the same city; this Society is not unknown in musical history being the substratum of the celebrated Norwich Musical Festivals for which Spohr, Benedict, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Belfield, Molique and other eminent composers have written some of their best works. Among the musical people of that most musical city, Mueller was highly esteemed as a first class orchestral conductor, and has since held important positions in London, and in various American cities; whatever breeze it may have been which first landed him in Nashville, it blew good fortune to our Philharmonic Society which has made wonderful progress under his direction, partly attributable to his skill as a conductor, and partly to his extensive and recherche musical library, which contains a variety of scores of the great masters almost unheard of in this country. CITHARISTA.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

Procrastination is also the order of the day at the Opéra Comique. The new opera which M. Offenbach has been writing in conjunction with M. Scribe, is still only in the state of promise. The performance has, however, been positively announced for this week. Mlle. Saint Urbain, who is to play the part originally intended for Mad. Ugalde, is said to be thoroughly "up" in her part, and panting for action. The opera which M. Aime Mailland, the composer of Les Dragons de Villars, has written for the Théâtre Lyrique, is also in the limbo of suspense, owing to the unabated attractions of Orphée and the Val d'Andorre.

At the Bouffes Parisiens the egregiously protracted run of the parody on Gluck's opera, Orphée aux Enfers—over three hundred nights—is about at last to be arrested, and Fortunio will reign in its stead.

Mad. Penco is shortly to make her appearance in Norma at the Italian Opera, and a new tenor from Sicily is to play the character of Pollio. There is also to be another début on the same occasion—a comprimaria recently engaged by M. Calzado, whose vocal powers are highly spoken of, will canvass the snuffrages of the public as Adalgisa. There is a rumor, of which I am unable to test the truth, that Signor Ronconi is shortly about to perform a histrionic tour de force, by playing Don Basilio and Figaro the same night. That this accomplished and versatile artist is fully capable of executing this feat, and keeping the individuality of the two characters in question as distinct as though there were two Ronconis equally gifted with the dramatic faculty, there can be little doubt. But whether the proceeding is not somewhat undignified, and savoring of a vanity unbecoming so great an artist, is another question. From this point of view, knowing the strong good sense of Signor Ronconi, it seems more than probable he entertains no such intention; at any rate, the feat is only possible in the first act.

At this moment is proceeding a sale of autographs of considerable interest, being the collection of M. Lajarricte. A few of the letters may be referred to here, as especially connected with "music and theatres." First, there is a little note from Boieldieu to Choron, in which he fixes 2,400 francs as the price of a "Te Deum" for the Church of Notre Dame. Paer, who was not so well off, addresses a petition to a minister of state, containing the very modest request that "his superannuated pension may be continued." Favart, in a charming letter to his wife, while he admits that the Flemish women are amiable, protests that he will never have eyes but for her. Gavandau, who, in 1793, was dismissed his post of officer in the milice Parisienne, supplicates the members of the Comité Révolutionnaire to reinstate him, not for his own sake, "which is of little matter, but for the sake of the honor and esteem of his comrades in arms, the highest pleasure and foremost need of a true Republican." Rouget de L'Isle writes for the directorship of the Opera. He promises "to rescue that magnificent manufactory, that immense centre of French industry, and to make it a truly national stage, the most splendid and the least burthensome which has ever existed in France or elsewhere."

There is a letter from Rachel. She is to make her re-appearance on the 1st of June. "But is it permitted," she asks, "in a theatre, that a tragic actress should sometimes suffer human affliction (her sister Rebecca was ill)? It requires (viz. the theatre), like a despotic tyrant, that our souls should not extend beyond the foot lights. Allons, since I have a salary, I must turn somersaults like the clown (Paillasse) when the bills announce me."

There is also a letter from Mad. Raucourt to André Dumont, a member of the Committee of Safety, urging him to obtain the liberty of a woman who had been arrested. She says, "Put my note in your pocket, that you may be reminded of my entreaties. Adieu, André, adieu. Thine!"—London Musical World, December 1.

Vienna.

The reputation of the Kärntnerthor Opera House, although, for reasons which shall hereafter be considered, now somewhat on the wane, will give an interest to the following list of the managers and singers at present employed in the undertaking:—

GENERAL DIRECTORS—MM. Esser and Schöber.
FINANCE DEPARTMENT—Herr Steinhäuser.
COMPTROLLERS—Comte Lanzcoransky and Hofrath Raymond.

PRIME DONNE—Mad. Caillag, Mad. Duetman Meyer, Mad. Wildauer, Mlle. Kraus, Mad. Hoffman, Mlle. Liebhart.

CONTRALTO—Mlle. Sulzer.

SECONDE DONNE.—Mlle. Ferrari, Mlle. Weiss, Mlle. Kudelka, and Mlle. Koschok.

PRIMI TENORI—MM. Ander, Wachtel, and Walter.

SECONDI TENORI—MM. Gunz, Campe, and Barach.

BARITONI—MM. Beck, Hrabaneck, Libisch, and Rudolph.

BASSI—Drachler, Schmied, Meyerhofer, Koch, Grauer and Hülzel.

1st VIOLIN—Herr Helmesberger.

CONDUCTORS—MM. Esser, Proch, and Dessof.

The band and chorus, formerly of such remarkable excellence, have suffered considerably from the fact of three conductors being appointed to a post which one alone should fill.

The retirement of Eckert from this position cannot be sufficiently regretted. Since he left the precision and vigor of both the orchestra and chorus have but too evidently diminished, and it is hardly a matter of surprise, when it is considered that three conductors, Esser, Proch, and Dessof, supply his place alternately, and thereby prevent the possibility of that unity of feeling so absolutely necessary between a band and its conductor, which can only be attained by long and constant practice with each other. It is to this system of divided management that the decline of the Kärntnerthor Opera House is to be attributed. Its effect is observable in every branch of the establishment. Most evident in the band and chorus, it is also apparent on the stage in the slovenly costumes and careless mise en scène. Let us hope the system will be changed, and before it is too late. Comte Lanzcoransky regain your vigor, and don't let the Opera House, which formerly was an honor to you, lose its reputation through your indifference and neglect.—Ibid.

London.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—On Monday night an operetta in one act, entitled the Marriage of Georgette, was produced with unequivocal success. Les Noces de Jeannette, the French original, from the joint pens of MM. Barbier and Carré (authors of Dinorah), was brought out some years ago at the Opéra Comique. The music, by M. Victor Massé gained the first laurels for a young composer who has since taken rank among the most popular disciples of the late Adolphe Adam, and whose latest notable performance, La Reine Topaze, was, like Les Noces de Jeannette, composed expressly for the now celebrated Mad. Miolan Carvalho.

The Marriage of Georgette was preceded by the ballet of The Ambuscade and followed by Mr. Loder's admirable Night Dancers. Mr. Balfe's new opera—Bianca, the Bravo's Bride—is in active rehearsal.

DEATH OF RELLSTAR.—The most celebrated of the journalists of Berlin, Louis Rellstab, died on the night of Nov. 27. The evening previous he had been present at the opera, and the next morning was found dead in his bed. He was born April 18, 1799, at Berlin, where his father was a music publisher and afterwards a bookseller. Having finished his classical studies, Rellstab, in 1815, entered the service, which he left in 1821, with the rank of lieutenant. In 1827 he became connected with the Gazette de Voss, to which he contributed articles concerning music. He was also one of the collaborateurs of the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris. Our readers have not forgotten his recent correspondence, which was distinguished by the poetic elegance of style, filled with images. Among his works unknown to criticism may be cited the libretto of the "Camp of Silesia," for which Meyerbeer wrote the score. A long procession accompanied his mortal remains, among whom were seen Meyerbeer, M. de Hulsen, superintendent general of the Theatres; the Aulic Councillor, Schneider, and a host of artists from the theatres, journalists, &c. The singers of the Opera executed several morceaux around the bier, before the body was removed. After the funeral oration, pronounced by the preacher Stahn, the procession moved, preceded by the bands of the Cuirassiers and of the Dragoons of the Guard.—Gazette Musicale.

Signora TREBELLI, it is said, has been engaged at Berlin for five years.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB hardly need that we should direct our readers' attention to their advertisement on the first page. There will be much curiosity to hear the new quintette, by Mr. Eichberg, the accomplished conductor of the Museum orchestra.

THE ORPHEUS QUARTETTE CLUB announce a concert which should be fully attended. The gentlemen composing this Club are the very élite of the Orpheus Society, and gave the highest satisfaction at the last concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

THE MESSIAH. Our readers will not fail to notice the advertisement of the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY. They offer the MESSIAH for Sunday night, and we learn that on the success which attends this performance depends some projected performances at which it is hoped to secure the assistance of Formés previous to his approaching return to Europe.

M. R. P. is informed that Rau's works on Beethoven are not biographies but a sort of romance. They are alluded to by the "Diarist" in a recent letter and have not been translated into English.

NATHAN RICHARDSON.—An Instruction book for the Piano has just been published, which purports to be a collection of the last efforts of the lamented NATHAN RICHARDSON, when in fact it is but a re-modeling of an old production, which he himself discarded as imperfect. The title-page of the book is "The New Modern School for the Piano Forte," with a portrait of Nathan Richardson, and purporting to contain "all that is original, important, and valuable, in Mr. R's former works," and it is made to resemble in its general appearance the "New Method for the Piano," which has met with that eminent success which the genius of its departed author could not fail to secure for it.

Persons purchasing carelessly are quite likely to be misled, and to take the book when they suppose they are getting the New Method, though a very casual examination of the contents of the two books will reveal the great difference between them. It is deeply regretted that any publisher should be found willing to issue the book in its present form, as to the extent it may be sold it is injurious to the fame of the author, who is no longer here to protect himself, and takes from his widow so much of the only means of subsistence left to her by her distinguished husband. From the proceeds of the sales of the New Method, the copyright of which was her legacy, she has brought the remains of her husband from a foreign land, and deposited them in the roll which was familiar to his youth, and from future sales she must rely for her support.

The unnecessary cruelty of introducing as a compliment, a portrait of Mr. Richardson into a book designed to do him incalculable injury, we forbear commenting upon. These facts, we trust and desire, will induce the friends of music to do justice to the dead and the living.—City Item.

Music and Peace.

Music is the language of harmony. It is the highest mode of articulate expression, and its true voice ever speaks for peace and love. The devil has taken possession of all the best tunes, said an old divine, once upon a time, and he might have added that he hired all the poets too. But it is one of the hopeful signs of this transition age that not only poetry and music, but the general arts, are returning to their legitimate offices of advancing the general harmony and elevating the general virtue. The poets, whom Horace stigmatized as cowards and humble laudators of the deeds they were disqualified to perform, now stand, like Lamartine, and Victor Hugo, and John Bowring, and Bryant, and Longfellow, in the van of liberty, and have braved oppression and wrong; and painters, whose grandest tableaux were of battles, now present to the eyes of the people, like Edward Landseer, the beauties of peace beside the horrors of war. Music, when attuned to the harmonies of nature, always subdues and softens the soul. Thibaut, the celebrated professor of law in Heidelberg, relates that a young man, his guest, who had listened to the performance of a composition of Lotti, exclaimed, when he left his house, "Oh, this evening I could do no harm to my greatest enemy." Zwingle, the Swiss reformer, when reproached by Faber, afterward Bishop of Vienna, for cultivating music, said, "Thou dost not know, my dear Faber, what music is. I love to play a little upon the lute, the violin, and other instruments. Ah, if thou couldst only feel the tones of the celestial lute, the evil spirit of ambition, and of the love of riches, which possess thee, would then quickly depart from thee." When the child upon its mother's knee is weeping, she soothes it with a song. "The ancients pretended," says Madame de Staël, "that nations were civilized by music, and this allegory has a deep meaning; for we must always suppose that the bond of society was formed by sympathy or interest, and certainly the first origin is more noble than the second." Among the instrumentalities of peace and love, surely there can be no sweeter, softer, more affective voice than that of a gentle voice breathing music.—Burritt's Citizen.

Influence of Music on the Mind.

The love of sweet sounds has prevailed in every age and every clime as one of the most prominent characteristics of humanity since the world began. From the reed pipe of the shepherd, with which he endeared himself to his bleating flock, and obtained a solace for his own heart, to the grand choruses of the Grecian drama, where refinement and luxury came as aids to the potent spells of harmony, man, whether savage or civilized, whether in war or peace, in comfort or distress, has ever sought for emotions of pleasure in the concord of sweet sounds.

The ecstasies of the mind when brought under the influence of modulated sounds, have often operated as powerful aids to heroism, and to lofty purposes of good, and have inspired feelings of poetry and devotion, such as in a silent world could never have been born. The tragedian Alfieri composed all his beautiful dramas either when listening to soft music, or immediately after having heard it; and at such times his soul was so completely possessed with the beauty of the melody and the bewitching powers of musical strains, that he was as one inspired by some higher power, and felt himself immortal. In fact, with many men of refined feelings, and possessing delicate sensibilities to the charms of music, the performance of beautiful composition acts as a spell of enchantment, and deprives them of all power to resist its influence. Such men as Alfieri, when under the sorcery of music, are as men bewitched. Milton exquisitely expresses this in a passage where the marriage of poetry and philosophy is for once perfect:

But let my due feet never fail
To walk the cloister's studious pale,
And love the high-embowered roof,
And antique pillars massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced choir below.
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may, with sweetness through mine ear
Disolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.

To the potency of music in influencing the feelings and conditions of the mind, must we attribute the attachment of races to their native music and national songs. A rude, uncultivated, and dejected peasantry may suddenly be roused from their serfdom by the airs and songs of their homes; and, while awakened to a consciousness of their wrongs, inspired with strength and purpose to destroy them. The effect produced on the Swiss soldiers, when in the service of the French, by an ancient air known in Switzerland as the "Ranz des Vaches," was so powerful, that it was forbidden to be played; it so forcibly reminded the men of their homes amid the mountains, as to make them desert. Scarcely any people are more attached to their native music than the Scotch; and whenever they hear the airs of their own hills, they are fired with enthusiasm and the love of home. At the battle of Quebec, in 1760, while the British troops were retreating in great disorder, the general complained to a field officer in Fraser's regiment of the bad behavior of his corps. "Sir," replied he, with some warmth, "you did very wrong in forbidding the pipers to play this morning; nothing encourages the Highlanders so much in the day of action: nay, even now they would be of some use." "Let them blow like the devil, then, if it will bring back the men," answered the general. The pipers were ordered to play a favorite martial air, and the Highlanders, the moment they heard it, returned, and formed with alacrity in the rear. In the late war in India, Sir Eyre Coote, aware of the attachment of the Highlanders to their favorite instrument, gave £50 to his troop to buy a pair of bag-pipes after the battle of Porto Nuovo.

The effect of music on the mind is much influenced by association and memory. In the attachment of men to the songs and airs of their native land, there is also associated the scenery, the green valleys, the brown woods, the mountains, moors, and streams; which memory, with fancy's vivid pencil, paints upon the heart when awakened by the songs of home. But there is something deeper, something more occult and mysterious in the power of harmonious sound. When we listen to the performance of exquisite overtures and passages selected from the great masters, when wholly unaccompanied by the magical tones of the human voice, we become conscious of an effect the cause of which lies more remote than the associations of scenery and the dear memories of home, and which can only be explained by attributing them to an internal and intuitive perception of the mind, by which it clings with rapture to these waves of sound, not for the memory of scenes which they awaken, but for the love of harmony alone. Milton, when his darkness was approaching him, speaks of rays of light rushing upon him with a kind of noise; and the blind have frequently attached a perception or idea of color to sweet sounds. The senses all mutually affect each other, and the use of either suggests to the mind certain objects which belong to the others also. It is by this unity of sense that the whole being becomes enchained by modulated sound, and the correspondence between musical vibration and nervous action, is so close, that music alone is capable of influencing the health of the body and the soundness and character of the mind. In the Asinaria Asylum, many insane persons have been restored by means of music; and the reports made by inquirers into the treatment of lunacy, invariably testify to the value of music in restoring the insane. The highest geniuses are frequently but a few removes from madness; and, in such, the extreme susceptibility of the nervous system renders music one of the most powerful of charms. Mozart, even when young, would turn pale at the sound of a trumpet, and become convulsed at a harsh discord; and only a melody and touch like his own could soothe and becalm his heart.

The old fable of the bite of the tarantula being cured by the sounds of music only, deserves to be regarded with more reverence than an old wife's tale. Democritus tells us, that many diseases may be charmed away by the melody of a flute; and it is well known that Asclepiades treated sciatica successfully with the sound of a trumpet: and what is worthy of remark, he tells us that the malady did not disappear unless the diseased part trembled in sympathy with the sound.

There is no music either so soothing, or so capable of inspiring the mind with energy and warmth, as that of the human voice, and it is only in so far as each instrument corresponds with some tone of utterance belonging to human passion, that it becomes capable of raising the mind into action, and endowing the nervous system with force, precision, and vigilance.—Life Illustrated.

THE TELEGRAPH IN THE OPERA.—In the new French opera house about to be erected," says the Constitutionnel, "the electric telegraph will, it is said, play a very prominent part. An instantaneous line of communication is to be established between the Cabinet of the Minister of State and that of the director of the theatre; a wire will also run from the box office to the principal hotels, so that strangers will be able to engage places immediately on their arrival in Paris, and by the aid of the same electric power the prompter will be enabled to give notice to the actors and actresses in their rooms when the curtain is about to rise."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

She is thine. Ballad. S. O. Grover. 25

An easy song, well written and likely to be received with much favor by amateur singers.

The hunters wake with early morn. Ballad.

"Robin Hood." 25

Ample vengeance. Duet for two baritones.

"Robin Hood." 30

The first is a fine song for a baritone voice. The duet should meet with a ready sale as the few operatic duets for low men's voices that have been available for amateurs, are pretty well worn. This new one will be a favorite with singers and hearers.

Instrumental Music.

Der Freischütz. Rondo. J. E. Muller. 25

A pretty and instructive piece for young scholars.

Hope Waltzes. (Hoffnungstrahlen.). Four Hands. Johann Strauss. 75

One of Strauss' best sets, which is known wherever the waltz is danced, in a capital four-hand arrangement. When well played these waltzes have a wonderful effect.

Silvery Shower, from Balfe's "Enchantress," arranged for a Brass band of 14 or less numbers.

Burditt. 1,00

A valuable addition to the list of Ditson's Brass Band music, which already comprises the best and most popular Serenades, Marches, Waltzes, &c.

Yelva. Mazurka de Salon. J. Ascher. 50

A new mazurka by this popular author. It will soon be on the piano of every amateur player who is fond of the light sparkling parlor music, which Ascher writes so well.

Books.

THE HOSANNA. A new Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Anthems, Motets, Sentences and Chants, for the use of Choirs, Congregations, Singing Schools, and Musical Associations. By Leonard Marshall. 75

In presenting a new edition of this work attention is particularly called to its adaptation to the wants of either full choirs or quartets. As simplicity in pieces designed for general use is undoubtedly a great desideratum, a large number of the tunes in this book have been made as easy as possible, always, however, with a care that a just musical effect should not be sacrificed to mere facility of execution. A sufficient number of pieces composed with particular reference to quartets and singers of more extended musical education, have also been inserted. Care has been taken not to omit those old and well approved tunes which have been found so useful for congregational singing; and several American compositions popular a quarter of a century ago, also, the Anthem for Easter are included.

The Anthems, Sentences and Choirs form an important feature in this book.

The Elementary department is on the Pestalozzian system, it is thought that the intelligent practice of these exercises will impart not only a theoretical, but a practical acquaintance with all the elementary principles of vocal music.

Robert Franz.

Robert Franz was born on the 28th of June, in the year 1815, at Halle on the Saale. His parents belonged to the middle class, and had in their characters none of the elements to which the artistic tendencies of their son could be traced. His father was, as it not seldom happens, a sworn enemy to all so-called unprofitable things and gainless arts. Notwithstanding this, he must have been the more gifted of the two for music; for in his old age he sang to the great enjoyment of his children, a number of chorals and motets, which he had from time to time heard and learned in his school-days, with the purest intonation and most undeviating accuracy. These artistic manifestations only extended to church music—he was insensible to all other musical impressions. His mother possessed sound and sterling qualities, and sought by her own diligence to supply the deficiency of culture which was a necessary result of the manner in which she was brought up. She took great interest in the education of her son and daughter; the employments of the father kept him the whole day away from the house, so that he concerned himself but little about his children.

In this way the boy grew up, while his relations, and perhaps even he himself remained unconscious of the musical capacities slumbering within him. His father took him sometimes to church on high festival days; when the customary church music was to be performed; "which must have whirled around wonderfully in my head, for I well remember to have dreamed and hummed about the house for weeks afterwards." But there the thing ended. When old enough he attended the grammar school of the Halle "Waisenhaus," whose higher classes practised singing one hour weekly. "The 'Cantor' now and then allowed us to sing two and three part songs: the second part was sung by carefully chosen pupils, to whom I in no way belonged, and who were placed upon a separate bench. I sat with the larger number. Often I could not resist the strong desire I felt of extemporizing a second part, and drew upon myself, in consequence of this unlawful private amusement, many hard boxes on the ear from the 'Cantor,' which did not however prevent me from running courageously into the same danger on the very next occasion. The rest of the school did not sing by note, but only by cipher; in the higher classes alone did the 'Cantor' venture to exercise us in reading by note.

In his fourteenth year he left the grammar school and entered the Latin school, formerly the "Waisenhausgymnasium." About this time, as he himself relates, his first musical tendencies were manifested. One of his relations had a son who was a piano-maker, in Vienna, and who, while on a visit to his mother, had discovered an old clavichord at an auction. This spinet like thing, not leathered but quilled and without dampers, he strung anew for his own use, and then left it with his mother for her own private entertainment. "The good woman sat for hours at the instrument, and thrummed unweariedly on the keys, without having the least idea of music. My mother gave me an account of this interesting pastime, and curiosity, or if you will, an inner voice, impelled me to take a personal observation of these performances. This decided my fate. From this time I was not to be separated from my relation, and vied with her in attempts—quite enough to make one's hair stand on end—to draw harmonious sounds from the dismally groaning instrument. The mere playing upon it naturally could not long content me, and I forthwith betook myself to more earnest studies. In the drawer of the clavichord I discovered a written set of long forgotten dances, probably a relic of the first possessor, and this furnished the basis of my artistic development. At the grammar school I had learned some violin notes, and I found out with my own hand the tones corresponding to them. The bass-notes naturally gave me more trouble, but these also I gradually learned, and was thus placed in a position to lay quite extensive plans. With the most striking perseverance I contended boldly with all obstacles, though it is to this day a complete riddle to me, how I succeeded in successfully overcoming them." His mother must have been at first greatly astonished to witness this absorbing interest, but finally, though with many shakes of the head, she consented that he should ask his father to purchase the beloved instrument for him. Then arose an energetic opposition; his father would not have such a disturber of peace in the house; but finally yielded to his repeated solicitations and bought the instrument for eight Prussian thalers. Then began a noise in the paternal house—father, mother and sister from that time enjoyed no more quiet hours.

"I was then a stout boy of fourteen years, who was not to be trifled with in any way and knew how to carry his point. So I now petitioned for an instructor on the piano, and my mother was actually compelled to procure one for me." A relation, who played a little on the piano, was intrusted with the instruction of the young aspirant, and one need only recall his own experience, in order to obtain an idea of the manner in which the ground was prepared for the budding sapling. The teacher did not know much more than the scholar—soon came saucy questions, and consequently serious collisions, and it may be imagined that the "stout youngster" did not sweeten the task to his preceptor. The final result of these proceedings was a change of teacher, though without any especial gain for the pupil, as the new master was worth no more than the old; the little drama was repeated in the shortest space of time, and so it happened, that I went from one teacher to another, without having enjoyed anything which deserved the name of instruction. I found myself thrown upon my own resources, and wavered about first in one direction and then in another, in the most bewildered manner. Two circulating libraries in Halle supplied the varied materials for musical studies, and all were blindly taken out and heaped one upon another; Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Herz, Kalkbrenner and Hummel; you may imagine what a confused state my head was in. At least these mad doings found by chance a wiser limitation." A teacher at the Gymnasium named Abela, held once a week a chorus practising for the more gifted pupils. Our friend joined the class, and the master's attention was soon attracted to him. He himself played but little on the piano, and was delighted to discover in the boy a "remarkable reader by note," to whom he could without anxiety trust the accompaniments. "These chorus rehearsals certainly exercised an important influence upon my later development; the cantatas of Mozart and Haydn, the oratorios and psalms of Handel concentrated my rambling attention and formed a lasting foundation for future growth. It is true I remained as before self-taught, but now in a way which must preserve me from a ridiculous end."

As his devotion to music took exclusive possession of the mental faculties of the youth,—"wherever I was, it was unceasingly running in my head"—so it could not but follow that his studies at college should be seriously interfered with. The unclassical pursuits of the youth were at first treated with ridicule and then with harshness—so much the more intense did his longing become to devote himself unrestrainedly to artistic pursuits. While in this distress he entered a higher class at the college—and his parents found themselves finally compelled most reluctantly to yield to their lost son and to place no further obstacles in the way of his devotion to the art. His mother was in despair, because she saw no end to the thing, his father scolded, their interest in him only made his situation more insupportable through taunts and reproaches—"only my simple but unshaken belief in my destiny enabled me to stand from amid all this misery and to induce them to bring this painful situation to an end, by taking me from college, and allowing me to try my fate under the auspices of Fr. Schneider. My attempts at composition had all the faults of foolish self-teaching, and betrayed neither talent for form, nor any intrinsic worth. If at this day a young man should present himself to me who had accomplished the same as I had done at that time, desiring me to decide upon his future course, I should advise him to do anything else rather than to enter upon the profession of an artist. I was only an interior performer on the piano, and on the organ, which I had taught myself, I was equally unskilful. With regard to Schneider's requirements of young art-students, he was easily satisfied; we were expected to be present at the hours of instruction, and at the orchestra and singing-rehearsals, otherwise we were left to ourselves. Here also it ended in my being again thrown upon my own resources. Not a long time elapsed before I belonged to those "personis ingratis" who thought they knew many things better than the master. When I reflect now impartially upon my connexion with Schneider, I do not wonder for an instant that we separated from each other; two more uncongenial natures than were ours could scarcely be found. Among my remaining fellow-students, I chose only the congenial ones, and we pursued our artistic studies privately on our own responsibility."

After remaining two years at Dessau he returned home, but at once encountered again the same bitterness. It was required of him to give undeniable proofs of his ability under the most difficult circumstances in the world. His compositions thus far were good for nothing, they had the doubtful worth of pedantic studies. Not being far advanced as a performer either upon the piano or upon the organ, our friend was wanting in those qualifications which were needed to awaken the interest of the public in him. The paternal house possessed no connexions, but on the contrary was rather a hindrance to their being formed. For that purpose all the relations desired to see substantial results of his studies, and as these could not be brought forward, there was naturally no lack of reproaches of the severest and most inconsiderate kind. In order to escape these he endeavored to obtain a vacant place as music teacher and director of a small singing society in Schönebeck. Some good spirit, however, counselled him to take a survey of things in the place itself before entering upon the engagement. "But what I saw and heard there, was not at all attractive! Without hesitation I shook the dust from my feet and returned to Halle, never more to leave it. Naturally this attempt also aided in rendering my stay in my father's house still more uncomfortable; I was deserted by all except my mother. Had I not possessed her, had she not remained true to me and stood bravely by my side—I should have sunk under this dreadful wretchedness."

After nearly a year of such suffering, Franz was admitted into the musical circle of Schröner, "Landgerichts director" at Halle, and this event exercised an important influence upon his future development. Principally compositions of the old Italian masters and works of Bach and Handel were practised in this circle. Franz, at first one of the chorus, soon became the accompanist, and thus the direction of the whole fell into his hands. "Puffed up with self-sufficiency, the sad inheritance of the high school at Dessau, I looked at first with contempt upon the efforts of these dilettanti; they knew neither simple nor double counterpoint, they knew not how to fabricate canons or to manufacture fugues. Quickly enough must I have made myself ridiculous from my arrogance—they saw in my knowledge only means to an end and with regard to this end their views were different from mine. They judged of the intrinsic worth of a work of art, not of its form, the latter was a matter of course in a true work of art. That I continually got the worst in these contests was plainly visible to me, and I began to reflect more deeply upon these fundamental principles. From this time things appeared to me in a new light. The old Italian masters did not move me much, but Bach on the contrary made the greatest impression upon me. Until now I had really known him only by name. Wholly astonished I entered suddenly upon a world of which my soul had never dreamed. At this time also, began my first acquaintance with Schubert; and it may easily be imagined what a strong impression this soul of fire must have produced upon me. The results of this newly acquired knowledge were not slow to manifest themselves, and I drew a dash over my past life and so to speak began a new existence. The compositions of Bach and Schubert served as models for me; first of all I entirely gave up composing: what I wished to express, was in the most violent opposition to my now circumscribed interests. These raged entirely unchecked within me and finally took possession of me so wholly, that my devotion to them was fast becoming morbid. Schubert especially wrought so fearfully upon my brain, and made my nervous system so irritable that it unfortunately made me subject to a deafness, which to this day still torments me." Gradually his acquaintance in Halle became extended beyond that little circle. Intercourse with young academicians furthered his culture; Ruge's periodical review, which at that period was exerting a great influence in Halle, aided his strivings; the philosophical, æsthetic and critical knowledge also that he had acquired, found application in his artistic studies, and aided him in an important manner to understand the principles of art. He had a large circle of friends and acquaintances, "a continual coming and going, with a constant ebbing and flowing of ideas, refreshed me infinitely, and taught me to look at things and to judge of them from different points of view. After my passion for Bach and Handel had somewhat cooled, or rather after I had appropriated to myself what in them was congenial to my nature, a period followed, which drew me strongly towards my eminent cotemporaries. Pre-eminent did Schumann bring to maturity, much that until then slowly fermenting had been working within me." A long journey to Salzburg and the Tyrol which Franz undertook for the sake of trying to restore his hearing, must have exercised a healing and strengthening influence upon his whole being, for after his return, signs suddenly appeared of self-dependent creative powers: "I must compose, because I cannot help it. The longer my powers had been pent up, the more stormily did they now burst forth. From that time I date my true studies; I taught myself art-expression. With every new song my power increased, and I gained variety in form, which until then had been wanting to me. The necessity of acquiring clearness in my ideas was exceedingly useful to me; I never succeeded in composing until I knew exactly what I meant to express. Ambition had until then been a stranger to me—that also had been an advantage to me; for I composed not for others, but first of all for myself, pouring forth my little sorrows and joys in true artistic genius. This egotism did not allow me to think of bringing my compositions into publicity—that seemed to me like a profanation of my holiest feelings." Many friends of our artist, and among them especially his present brother-in-law "Hinrichs," urged him strongly to publish some of his sets of songs. He sent them to Schumann who interested himself most earnestly about them, and almost immediately obtained a publisher for them. Of his method of occupying himself with art, he says himself, that in spite of his constant musical pursuits, he could yet speak of no really musical studies in which he had been engaged at any one time. "I threw myself over head and ears into everything which interested me, and can only truly think of myself as enjoying. By nature I possessed great powers of observation, I never enjoyed blindly, but ever sought to understand clearly the reasons of my satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the objects. To this harmonious balance between reason and feeling do I owe principally what I have become; it has helped me easily to surmount all difficulties. A sound instinct also impelled me to occupy myself only with those things which corresponded to my taste and feeling, and to have absolutely nothing to do with whatever was in opposition to my own individuality. In enjoying I have always learned, and that has been my experience until the present day. That I almost exclusively employed the song-form, and but seldom wrote in any other manner, was at first the result of irresistible necessity: later I was convinced that in this form my meaning received its truest expression. In the main I have not swerved from this rule, and could with difficulty resolve to make a trial of any other mode." Franz lives at present honored in Halle his native place, which could not refuse to recognize his genius, although his fame first extended itself abroad, before he was justly appreciated by his fellow-townsmen. Thus gradually the direction of the "Sing-Akademie" and the Halle "Gesellschafts Concerte" fell into his hands, he had been for a long time already their organist. At the University he had lately been elected music director. He had given, as before mentioned, a direction and important artistic meaning to the musical life at Halle, especially through numberless classical performances, more particularly of the works of Bach and Handel; the firm yet modest character of our artist cannot fail to exercise an important moral influence over his whole circle of friends and acquaintances, the performances of the Halle "Akademie" are a reflection of himself; musically solid, upon the ground work of perfection full of freedom, without vain show or regard to momentary consequences. Franz at present enjoys the universal esteem of his fellow-townsmen, and the exalted appreciation of his fellow-artists.

Music in France.

We have long felt the need of an epitome of French musical history, some sketch book of the annals of the art, which might serve as the thread upon which to string the facts in history and biography, which we are continually picking up in the course of our reading, but which we know not exactly how to place in proper historical and chronological order. There are plenty of old books, some of them are of great extent—none of them to our purpose. M. Charles Poisot, of Paris, has just published the book needed. Originally essays in the Univers Musical, it is now a carefully revised but rapid survey of the music of his country down to the year 1860. The whole forms but a small duodecimo volume of some 300 pages. The first seven chapters are devoted to the origin and progress of sacred or liturgic music, of course that of the Roman Catholic church, of which confession the author is a devoted member, as a hundred passages in his work prove. This fact, however, is one which rather adds to than diminishes the interest of his book, as it gives us an insight into that religious feeling, from which has sprung so much of the most glorious music of the greatest composers—that of the mass, the highest form of music in the opinion of such men as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini.

Then follow sketches of the history of the Grand Opera, of the Chanson and Vaudeville, of the Opera Comique, Instrumental Music, the Conservatoire, &c.

It seems to us that we can do our readers no greater favor than to give them, from time to time, portions of this work of M. Poisot, and beginning with a translation of the first few chapters of the book, not perhaps the most interesting, but we hope of no small value, especially to that portion of our readers who sympathize with the author in their religious faith.

We add here some passages from M. Poisot's introduction, from which the reader will see that he is as devoted a Frenchman as he is a devout Roman Catholic. Whether the reader will be disposed to admit the author's claims of credit to France and Frenchmen, is perhaps a question. What he says of the Bards may not perhaps be new, but as they form his starting point, it seems proper that it should find a place here.

"No one, to my knowledge," says M. Poisot, "has treated the subject which I have here undertaken. Yet, in fact, precious documents are scattered through great numbers of books; but they needed to be brought together, made complete and arranged in chronologic and historic order.

"This seems to me the right time to bring out to the light our French school, formerly so brilliant, still so remarkable and yet so little known by artists, amateurs and the public generally.

"Opera, it is true, originated in Italy; Germany is the fatherland of instrumental music and the symphony; but France had also its national music in the chanson, the vaudeville and the comic opera.*

"Through the good sense, taste and wise eclecticism which characterize it, the French school at the present time tends to become universal in Europe and to rule the entire musical world. [Bravo, M. Poisot!] Why does every illustrious stranger seek with such ardor success in Paris? Because Paris is, in fact, the head of the civilized world, the modern Athens, the city which makes reputations; and as our language, so clear, so perspicuous, so precise, tends by its use in European diplomacy to conquer the place held by the Latin in the middle ages, so our school of music is substituting itself for all others through its faculty of absorbing the various merits of the schools of the most diverse countries. * * * * *

"Before speaking of the divisions which we have adopted in this work, let us cast a glance backward upon the music of the ancient races, which fixed themselves successively upon the soil which we inhabit."

We omit what the author now says upon Enoch and Jubal and Tubal Cain, and other worthies, doubtless better known to our readers than to the public which M. Poisot addresses. Nor will we follow him in following the dispersions of the races which sprang from Shem, Ham and Japhet, but take him up again at the point where he speaks of Bardism.

"According to J. C. Walker, in his Memoirs of the Irish Bards, (4to. Dublin, 1786), Ambergin, brother of Heber, first Monarch of Ireland, had the rank of Chief of the Bards. This dignity imposed on him the triple duty of poet, historian and legislator. The Colleges of the Bards were held in the depths of oaken forests. There, the Druids taught their disciples the elements of history, the art of oratory, the Laws, by means of poetry, in which was contained all the science of those distant ages. Music was always connected with this multiple course of instruction and was regarded as the most exquisite division of human knowledge. Their teachings were oral, and were continued from twelve to twenty years.

"The word Bard comes from Bâr or Barydd which signifies the "fine frenzy" or exaltation of the poet. Famous singers celebrated to the sound of the lyre or harp the acts and deeds of heroes and preserved the genealogies of all their princes which they carried back in a direct line to Adam!

"In Ireland, when the student had finished his course, a bonnet called barred and the degree Ollamh (or doctor) were conferred upon him. Every profession being hereditary the candidates for Bardism were necessarily of certain families.

"As soon as the young Bard had received his degree of Ollamh, the choice of his profession was determined by that of the family to which he belonged. He became Fílea, Breitheamh or Seanacha according to his birth; these offices, long united in the same person, had become separated, their duties being thought too numerous for a single individual.

"The Ollamhain-re-dan or Fílidhe were poets; they preserved in verse the traditions of religion; they animated, both before and during the combat, the soldiery with martial odes and songs of war; they celebrated valorous deeds, and composed verses upon the births, marriages and deaths of the chiefs and princes, who held them in their service. The Fílidhe were also the heralds and faithful followers of their princes; they marched at the head of the armies, clad in long white flowing robes, holding magnificent harps in their hands and surrounded by the Orfidigh or musicians of the orchestra.

"During battle, they held themselves aloof and from a safe place—their persons being held sacred—watched the deeds of their chieftain. The muse animated them and aided their watchfulness: some even pretended to the gift of prophecy, and the better instructed among them were admitted into the order of the Druids.

"The Breitheamhain or Brehons promulgated their laws in a sort of recitative, sitting upon an eminence in the open air. They united the double functions of judges and legislators.

"The Seanachaidhe were antiquaries, genealogists and historians; each province, chief, prince had their own.

"Besides these three orders of Bards, there was another of inferior grade comprehending all players upon instruments. To all classes of these, their profession was also hereditary.

"In Gaul, as in Ireland, the Bards immortalized in their verses the actions of heroes; moreover they often interposed in combat and through their influence the sword was often returned to its scabbard. They even censured their chiefs, when their actions were not exempt from reproach.

"Thus viewed, the part which music played becomes really sacerdotal. It added to the majesty of religious rites, by giving more of force and harmony to public prayer, appeased the fury of the warriors, taught history and preserved the memory of grand deeds, reprehended those who did wrong; truly grand and important functions, whose benefits might in our day be felt, if those who rule in art would will it seriously and perseveringly.

"Under the Roman dominion Gaul received the influence of Greek civilization, but the Roman emperors were often cruel and sanguinary. A law of Claudius abolished the Druidical rites and ordained the extermination of the priests. The noble profession of the Bards degenerated by degrees under the corrupting influence of strange and pagan manners. According to Athenaeus, they became mere courtiers and parasites.

"The principal string instruments in use in Roman Gaul were the barbiton or lute; the psaltery of ten strings, which were played with a plectrum; the cythary of two, four or eight flaxen strings, under powerful tension. Among the wind instruments were the horn of the Urochs; the marine trumpet [?]; Pan's pipes; trumpets, straight and curved; the simple flute, straight or curved, long or short; and the double flute of wood or silver. The bag pipes and shepherd's pipes are curious relics of our ancient instruments. The instruments of percussion in use in those times were, cymbals, crotales, cithern, (of Egyptian origin), and the Basque drum. But, soon the invasion by barbarous nations began to pull down the structure of the Roman empire; the Burgundians and Franks successively overran Gaul, and Clovis founded the first united French monarchy.

"A grander cause of civilization had risen in the East. In time of Augustus Christianity was born in the stable at Bethlehem. The apostles soon spread the Good News in all lands. The church at Lyons was founded by Pothin and Iranacus, coming thither from Smyrna. Christians were multiplied through the influence of eloquent preaching but more through martyrdom. Clotilde converted Clovis. Martin, Hilaire and Denis had planted the faith among the Gauls. When the light of the Gospel had caused the dark mysteries of Druidism to vanish, the Bards no longer sang the praises of false gods, but made their harps to sound in honor of the Trinity. The Christians also spread their doctrines with the aid of hymns and sacred canticles. Thus we see that in all times, under all forms of civilization and religion, music was added to prose and poetry to augment their force and add to their effects."

Moravian Christmas Festivities.

In no church upon earth are the festivities which characterize Christmas better calculated to arouse and impress a just conception of the holy subject of commemoration, than among that devoted band of Christ's followers—the Moravians. Truthful specimens of art, illustrating a variety of incidents connected with the nativity, decorate the houses of the village congregations, while the services in the churches themselves are conducted with appropriate forms, heightened by impressive and beautiful music. To the children, especially, are these annual religious demonstrations fraught with the highest temporal and spiritual pleasure—scenes and services these which cling as the ivy itself to their hearts, through all the shifting phases of after life. On Christmas Eve, a prominent place is assigned the little ones of the flock, immediately in front of the minister, who discourses upon the gospel narrative of the Saviour's birth in language adapted to the understanding of the simplest intellect. The children unite enthusiastically in the hymns of joy and praise; and, to quote an able writer, "when, near the close, Christ is being sung as the 'Light of the World and Sun of Righteousness,' the doors of the hall are thrown open, and hundreds of burning wax tapers illuminate the uncertain light of the declining day, words cannot express the delight beaming in the countenances of the happy gathering of little ones." Festivities, thus peculiar and impressive, annually congregate into the Moravian towns immense herds of country farmers with their sons and daughters. These latter are attracted by the twofold object of witnessing the religious exercises, and of gadding through various houses in which there may be found ingenious and tasteful "Putzes," or Christmas decorations; many of which it may be remarked, would suffer but little, when subjected to severe art criticism. Amid boughs of spruce, hung in graceful and thickly netted wreaths and festoons, forming verdant alcoves, may be discovered fanciful imitations of landscape features; mills in active operation; ponds alive with ducks and geese, steadily sailing with the motion of unseen magnets; flocks of sheep and squadrons of grazing cattle; and perchance, suspended over all this idyllic scene in miniature, a large, illuminated transparency, portraying with vivid effect the infant Saviour in his rude manger, surrounded by the brute denizens of the stable. Angels pendant, swing gracefully through the scene, lighted into effect by multitudinous wax candles.

The music in the church services is admirable and appropriately chosen. Rich, gushing tones of the organ, moulded into devotional harmonies by well-skilled students of the solid German choral style, peal solemnly through the sacred edifice; and from the key-note at the close of the voluntary proceeds a classic symphony, in which a full orchestra combines with the instrument, thus doubly enhancing the effect. And after the symphonic prelude, the choir, numbering many well-trained voices, vocalizes anthems replete with love and gratitude—glorifying the incarnation of a world's Saviour in strains of joyous and heavenly harmony. These anthems are culled from the works of Haydn, Graun, Beethoven, Beckler, and others; nor can any person who has ever heard the Rev. Francis Hagen's beautiful composition—Morgenstern auf fuenfte Nacht—sung in alternate melodic movements by the choir and the band of little children below, forget its almost heavenly effect. Many of our patrons, who have been educated in the celebrated Moravian schools, will recall vividly the scenes herein described. May each succeeding Christmas find them as happy as they must have been while seated in the unostentatious churches of the villages wherein passed their school days. And, in conclusion, a merry Christmas and a prosperous New Year to every reader whose eyes may chance to light upon this article!—Amateur's Guide, Phil.

Women and Music.

Dr. Holmes, in the "Professor's Story" in the Atlantic Monthly, speaks thus of the women without music in their souls.

"Beware of the woman who cannot find free utterance for all her stormy inner life either in words or song! So long as a woman can talk, there is nothing she cannot bear. If she cannot have a companion to listen to her woes, and has no musical utterance, vocal or instrumental, then—if she is of the real woman sort, and has a few heartfuls of wild blood in her, and you have done her a wrong—double bolt the door which she may enter on noiseless slipper at midnight; look twice before you taste of any cup whose draught the shadow of her hand may have darkened!

"But let her talk, and, above all, cry, or if she is one of the coarser-grained tribe, give her the run of all the red-hot expletives in the language, and let her blister her lips with them until she is tired, she will sleep like a lamb after it, and you may take a cup of coffee from her without stirring it up to look for its sediment.

"So, if she can sing, or play on any musical instrument, all her wickedness will run off through her throat or the tips of her fingers. How many tragedies find their peaceful catastrophe in fierce roudades and strenuous bravuras! How many murders are executed in double-quick time upon the keys which stab the air with their dagger-strokes of sound! What would our civilization be without the piano?

Are not Erard and Broadwood and Chickering the true humanizers of our time. Therefore do I love to hear the all-pervading tum tum jarring the walls of little parlors in houses with double door-plates on their portals, looking out on streets, and courts which to know is to be unknown, and where to exist is not to live, according to any true definition of living. Therefore I complain I not of modern degeneracy, when, even from the open window of the small unlovely farm house, tenanted by the hard-handed man of bovine flavors and the flat patterned woman of broken down countenance, issue the same familiar sounds. For who knows that Almira, but for these keys, which throb away her wild impulses in harmless discords, would not have been floating, dead, in the brown stream which runs through the meadows by her father's door,—or living, with that other current which runs beneath the gas lights over the slimy pavement, choking with wretched weeds that were once in spotless flavor.

NEW SERIES.

No. 2.

BERLIN, Dec. 6, 1860.

After the week described in Leipzig came a yet richer week in Dresden, most beautiful of German cities. Golden October days, most rich and solemn, and nights as lustrous as the crystal air and harvest moon at its full could make them. But no—before going on with our slow record of the past, what if we gratify, or perhaps tantalize, the impatient reader by a moment's leap over into the present. Let us anticipate an instant and take just a glimpse of what is doing here and now. It is a bare inventory that I have to offer, simply the musical programme of this week in Berlin; which shall serve as a sample, hardly above the average, of the whole winter. See then what may be heard in Berlin in a single week. If the list is unusually rich in some particulars, as, for instance, in concerts of the great choral societies, it is below the average in others, say in the German department of the opera and in violin quartets. As it is, I can name only what is publicly announced, making no mention of much that is going on continually in smaller theatres and saloons, as well as occasional private or semi-private soirées of a selecter sort, which are not advertised. On the other hand, let me include in the account one or two choice private opportunities, which enrich the week for your reporter personally, since the object here is to show how much good music one may hear in Berlin in a week, as well as how much he must also lose from the impossibility of being present in two or more places at the same time. Let us begin with

Sunday, Dec. 2.

10 A.M. Services in the Dom or Court Church (Lutheran). The choir of boys and men, the most perfect in all Germany, sing a Te Deum, unaccompanied, in perfect tune, with silvery purity of voices, and some chorales.

4 P.M. LIEBIG'S KAPELLE (Orchestra), of forty-five, at Mäder's Salon, one of those splendid halls, where men, women and children spend their social afternoon, chatting, knitting, sipping coffee, and listening devoutly to the music, especially if it be Beethoven. Programme:

Overture: "Lear and Cordelia"..... Marie Moody
Fantasia and Sonata, arranged for orchestra by Ritter Seyfried..... Mozart
Overture to "Leonore," (No. 1)..... Beethoven
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Mendelssohn

Overture to "Leonore," (No. 2)..... Beethoven
Symphony (No. 12), in D major..... Haydn

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA HOUSE. German night. Macbeth, in 5 acts, after Shakspeare; music by Taubert, kapellmeister and conductor of the opera. Lady Macbeth by Frau Jachmann (JOHANNA WAGNER).

VICTORIA THEATRE. Italian Opera, with Mme. ANNA DE LA GRANGE, Mlle. DESIRÉE ARTOT, M. Carrión, &c. Probably Norma or Lucia, or some such old story. Possibly, Il Barbiere, a story (i. e. in music) that does not grow old.

FRIEDRICH-WILHELM-STÄDTISCHES THEATRE—terrible name to pronounce or write!—Light French Vaudeville or Comic Opera. Offenbach's Orpheus in Der Hölle, and Maillard's Glücklein des Eremiten (Hermit's Bell), appear to divide nearly all the evenings between them.

Monday, Dec. 3.

ROYAL OPERA. Merelli's Italian Company. Il Trovatore (!), by Sig. Verdi. This troupe possesses one rare magnet for the public, in a fresh contralto of the very rarest, purest quality, Mlle. TREBELLI (née Gilbert, at Paris). No contralto that we ever heard—not excepting even Alboni—has a voice of such clear, metallic, fascinating quality, or sings the music of Rossini in a style so finished, chaste and noble; and there is the charm of unaffectedness in all she does. One longs to hear her in an opera of Gluck. She is a musician, too, it is said. From her earliest childhood her teachers were German, and at the age of 10 or 11 she could play Sonatas of Beethoven or fugues of Bach on the piano. Afterwards, when the rare treasure of her voice claimed especial culture, she was initiated into the songs of Schubert and other noble tone-poets. I have heard her only in Tancredi and a poorer opera of Rossini, and found report completely justified. The only soprano prima donna of this Italian (!) company is the Signora Lorini (our American Virginia Whiting), who has attained to a marvellous degree of facile florid execution, or what they call here coloratur. The men are quite indifferent.

The other two opera houses as above.

Tuesday, Dec. 4.

4 P.M. LIEBIG, at the Tonhalle (café, &c.). Gentlemen most politely requested not to smoke; with which request they comply for the most part, with a degree of self-sacrifice only appreciable by Germans; let the rest of us be thankful, and indulge them all the more on the first fit occasion. A few sneaking whiffs of rebellion there will be, naturally, in obscure corners on the outskirts of the crowd and up in the galleries; but, on the whole, pretty well for Germans. Verily Liebig is an institution. The man who, through the spell of Beethoven and Mozart, and even duller emulators of their fame, can keep tongues quiet in their heads and cigars reduced to secret restlessness in pockets, through three or four whole hours of German life, is certainly a benefactor to Art and the world. And his is no false, merely negative, Temperance Society principle.

He does good positively. He does not simply take away, he gives you something; pours you out generous, foaming, overflowing measures of pure soul champagne, the glorious inspirations of the masters who have sung best from the heart to the heart of universal harmony. And think how cheap we get it! It is almost "Come ye to the waters, without money and without price."

The admission to each concert is five silbergroschen or ten tickets (to be used when you will) for one thaler, that is, 7 1-2 cents for each concert! For which you get, this afternoon, this bill of fare:

Overture to "Zampa".....Herold.
Symphony, in E flat.....A. Romberg.
Overture, (by a new aspirant).....H. Urban.
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber.
Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.
Symphony, in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven.

5 P.M. SING-AKADEMIE. Rehearsal at their beautiful. Three hundred voices; ladies and gentlemen who feel it a privilege to pay something for the pleasure and instruction of practising the best kind of choral music under the direction of such masters as the venerable GRELL, (now esteemed the first composer of sacred music in Germany), and BLUMNER, his colleague, author of a successful oratorio, "Abraham." The pieces under rehearsal (the most rigid and the most cheerful that we ever witnessed), for the approaching concert, are two: A Mass for sixteen voice-parts, containing really sublime effects, and a Te Deum, both by Grell. This will be the second concert of their series; at the first they gave the Paulus of Mendelssohn.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA. Mozart's Così fan tutte, with a new German text, in place of the coarse and silly one to which he wrote it. Frau Köster, Fr. Bötticher, Fr. Herrenburg-Tuczek, Herren Krüger, Salomon and Bost. Conductor, Herr Kapellmeister Dorn.

Other Opera houses as above.

Wednesday, Dec. 5.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA. Semiramide, with Lorini and Trebelli.

VICTORIA THEATRE. Mme. Lagrange in Rigoletto.

FRIEDR. WILHELMSTADT. DO. Offenbach's Orpheus, &c.

7 P.M. LIEBIG, at Sommers' Salon. Enormously crowded and hot. Discomfort seeks relief (for self alone) in noise and bad tobacco smoke. Exceptional this. What perhaps aggravated the restlessness was the long time devoted in the first section of the programme to the airing of new composers' aspirations and the gratifying of curiosity to hear what is written now-a-days in the way of overture and symphony. The first two pieces, especially the Symphony, proved exceedingly langweilig—tedious.

Overture to "Don Carlos".....L. Deppe
Symphony in A.....A. Fischer

Overture: "Nachklänge von Ossian".....N. Gade
"Spring-Song," arranged for Orchestra.....Mendelssohn
Romanza, for Violoncello.....Franchomme
Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven

Symphony (No. 13), G minor (not the G minor).....Mozart

7 1-2 P.M. Herr G. WEISS gives a Soirée, chiefly for the production, it would seem, of his own sacred vocal compositions. This is a great week for new productions. He has a delegation of voices from the Sing-Akademie to aid him.

This is his programme:

1. Sacred Chorus: "Lasst uns, &c.".....G. Weiss
2. Recit. and Air from "Passions music".....J. S. Bach
3. Geistliche Gesänge, from the "Imitatio Christi" of Thomas à Kempis.....G. Weiss
4. Sonata in C, op. 53.....Beethoven
5. Song: Bell' Raggio, from "Semiramide".....Rossini
6. Songs and Morning Hymn.....G. Weiss

Thursday, Dec. 6.

10—12 A.M. Two hours at the organ with old BACH, in the Kloster-kirche. This was a special, private boon, enjoyed by only three listeners. The organist was a young countryman of ours, of whom our readers have heard, and will hear more, Mr. John K. Paine, of Portland, Maine. Unwarmed and cheerless as the great church was, all brick within and brick without, it soon sent a thrill of inward warmth through one to hear the noble themes enunciated and so wonderfully developed through the interwoven voices in such works as these:

1. Toccata and Fugue, in D minor.....Bach
2. Sonata, in G major, (in form of Trio for two Manuals and Pedal)....."
3. Prelude and Fugue, in G....."
4. Toccata, in F, (very brilliant)....."
5. Variations on "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser," by the performer.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA. Mathilda di Sabran (or Corradino), comic opera, by Rossini, Mmes Lorini and Trebelli.

Other Opera houses as usual.

7 P.M. SECOND SINFONIE SOIREE of the Royal Orchestra, in the Concert-Saal of the Opera House. Eighty musicians, conducted by Taubert. These are the great Symphony concerts of Berlin; the proceeds to go to charitable objects. The instruments are all in the hands of the very first artists. The programme always consists of just two Symphonies, two Overtures, and nothing else. This time it is less interesting than usual to a veteran concert-goer, since the pieces must be mostly quite familiar to him.

Symphony, in B flat major.....Haydn.
Overture, to "Les Abencerrages".....Cherubini.
Overture, to "Euryanthe".....Weber.
Symphony (No. 2) in D.....Beethoven.

7 P.M. Concert of the "MOHR'SCHEN GESANGVEREIN," for charity, and also for the airing of young composers' ideas. The pieces announced were:

1. Overture, C minor, comp. by.....H. Mohr
2. String Quartet, F major....."
3. "Der Wassernack," a Lyrical Cantata, for Chorus, Solo and Orchestra.....R. Wüerst

Friday, Dec. 7.

4 P.M. LIEBIG, at the Walhalla, to accompany the chocolate and coffee, and keep the knitting needles up to concert pitch.

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven.
Symphony in E flat major.....A. Romberg.

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven.
Andante, from a Symphony.....Abt Vogler.
Overture to "Leonore" (No. 3).....Beethoven.

Symphony (No. 13) in C major.....Haydn.

A rare chance in this and the next named concert to study Beethoven's working processes, and trace the growth of his thought, how it worked itself out by successive trials to full and complete expression. And all for three grochen! Surely here is a good seven and a half cents' worth of Beethoven, to say nothing of Father Haydn, Romberg, &c.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA HOUSE. German night. The fairy opera, Oberon, by C. M. von Weber. Here is temptation; but we are committed to the next, viz:

7 P.M. ROBERT RADECKE's second subscription concert, in the hall of the Sing-Akademie. These are the fresher, livelier series of orchestral concerts, representing progress, presenting greater variety of matter than the Royal Orchestra, arranged and conducted by a fresh and energetic young man. They correspond more nearly perhaps than anything else in Berlin to the Gewandhaus concerts of Leipzig. But the orchestra is less large and perfect, namely Liebig's, which is quickened, however, into new life under Radecke's control. Numbers 2 and 4 in the following programme, are new compositions by artists living in Berlin.

1. Overture (No. 1) to "Leonore".....Beethoven
2. Psalm 137: "By the waters of Babylon," &c., for chorus, solo and orchestra. (Conducted by the composer).....George Vierling
3. Concerto in E minor, piano with orchestra, entire, (played by Herr Gustav Schumann).....Chopin
4. "Ein Märchen," overture, (the composer conducting).....Richard Wüerst

5. Symphony (No. 3), in E flat.....R. Schumann
In the first of his four concerts Radecke gave us the entire music of Beethoven to the "Ruins of Athens," and Schumann's overture to "Genoveva."

Saturday, Dec. 8.

7 P.M. ROYAL DOMCHOR. First Soirée in the hall of the Sing-Akademie. Boy's and men's voices, unaccompanied. Nothing finer of its kind in Europe, so they say.

PART I.

1. "Lamentabatur Jacob," by Cristoforo Morales (born at Seville, 1520, died at Rome, 1574).
2. Chorus (for men's voices,) by Giovanni Croce (1594).
3. "Agnus Dei," by Bernabei (1720).
4. Fugue for piano, in A minor, by Bach.
5. "Adoramus," by Benelli.

PART II.

6. Motet, by C. S. Schröter (1740).
7. Chorale: "Wenn wir in höchsten Nöthen sein," by J. S. Bach.
8. Andante and Allegro from piano-forte Sonata in F minor (op. 57), by Beethoven.
9. Motet, by Johann Cristoph Bach.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA. Italian. Semiramide.

VICTORIA THEATRE. Lagrange in parts of Norma, Don Pasquale, Il Barbiere and Lucia.

Sunday, Dec. 9.

4 P.M. LIEBIG'S ORCHESTRA, at Maeder's Salon, again.

Overture to the Wasserträger.....Cherubini.
Symphony in A major ("Italian").....Mendelssohn.

Overture to "Don Carlos".....Deppe.
"Aufforderung zum Tanze".....Weber.
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini.

Symphony, in C minor.....Beethoven.

6 1-2 P.M. ROYAL OPERA HOUSE. German opera: Armida, by Gluck.

At the Victoria, Norma; at the Friedr. Wilhelmst., "the Hermit's Bell."

7 P.M. The BACH-VEREIN, conducted by G. Vierling, give the first of three concerts. The principal features of the programme are: Cantata, by Bach: "Bleib bei uns, denn es will Abend werden."

Passions-music, by Schütz (17th century).
Cantata, by Bach: "Ich halte viel Bekümmerniss."

—But I had best draw the curtain, ere the reader cry: "What! will the line stretch out to the crack of doom." Truly here is full as much as any mortal ears could crave to hear in eight days. And now, if one were disposed to be ugly, he might call on his friend, the editor at home, for a like statement of what Boston has to show for any given week; but coupled with the taunt should be the benevolent wish that that friend might never be drawn asunder by announcements of Bach on one side of the Lindens, and Gluck on the other, the same evening. Boston shall arrange her attractions better, and take care that Bach cantatas fall upon the Verdi nights.

—And now let us recall the harvest moon and Dresden. D.

Handel and Haydn Society.

An immense audience filled the Music Hall on Sunday evening last to hear "The Messiah." One would think that such a large attendance would warrant a series of concerts for the winter; but the Society, we learn, are doubtful as to the result, and have abandoned their project. The concert was in many respects a successful one, though there were few marked features in the performances. The body of tone was large and full, as it seemed to us; although being compelled to sit next to the stage, we lost much of the sound that was wafted over to the balconies. The choruses were generally well sung, though with scarcely the precision and steadiness in time that could be desired. The altos and sopranos occasionally indulged in cross purposes, giving the effect of a slight see-saw movement. However, it is not worth while to be too critical when the general result is satisfactory. Of the solos it may be said that they were carefully rendered, but without the spirit that rouses the enthusiasm of an audience. The debutante, Miss GILSON, a high, pure soprano, seemed to receive the largest share of applause, even more than was given to Miss PHILLIPPS for her grand and artistic performance. However, the public, not unnaturally, likes a new face and a sweet voice; and Miss Gilson's notes are all pearls. The excessive use of portamento in "Come unto Him" gave it a sickish sweetness to our ears. A singer ought to show some nerve even in a legato strain. When the timidity incident to a first appearance has worn off, this lady may take a good position among our oratorio singers.

Mrs. HARWOOD was heard with most pleasure in "I know that my Redeemer liveth." She gave this sublime song a fullness and significance that one rarely hears even from more celebrated artists. In the recitatives, while we have no special fault to find, we miss a certain dramatic vigor necessary for their highest effect. Mr. ADAMS has, as our readers all know, a sweet toned voice, inclining to a tender expression, so that his singing is more impressive in a smaller hall and in music of a different character. He was technically correct and gave his best endeavors to render the airs effectively; but his powers do not seem to be suited to the severe and rugged style of Handel. The new bass, Mr. THOMAS, has a light and flexible voice and a correct method, but he lacks the ponderous tone which these sombre strains seem to demand.

Of Miss Phillipps we can say but little, for her voice and style are so admirable, and her genius so widely known and recognized, that it is scarcely necessary to do more than to mention her name. Her singing of "He was despised," was enough to establish her as an artist of the highest rank.

On the whole, the Society is to be congratulated; and if nothing more can be done in these troublous times, we must wait till next winter for another Sunday evening concert. We hope, though, they will think better of it.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

FOURTH CONCERT, JAN. 1, 1861.

1. Quartette in B flat, No. 6, op. 18. . . . . Beethoven Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo—Finale, La Malinconia Adagio and Allegro.
2. Aria. "Ah s'estinto ancor mi vuol." from Donna Caritea, Mercadante . . . . . Mrs. J. H. Long.
3. Andante and Scherzo, from the Quartette in E, op. 81, (Posthumous work.) . . . . . Mendelssohn
4. Songs, { "My dream of love is over," . . . . . Spohr
"Recitative and Air, "Deh vieni," from Le nozze de Figaro. . . . . Mozart Mrs. Long.
5. Quintette in B flat, (first time,) . . . . . Julius Eichberg Morro—"Sehnen, Trachten, und Sterben."
(To aspire, to strive, to die.)
Allegro—Scherzando and Adagio—Finale, Allegro.

We have scarcely ever heard the strings of the Club sound fresher and purer than during the first two movements of the Beethoven quartet. The hall, not being quite as crowded as at the last concert, had just the right temperature. The quartet went very well; the gentlemen seemed to play with a will, and brought out finely all the youthful mirth of the composer. One of his earliest works, it is as pleasant as Mozart's; much of its form, the short melodies, the cadences, the trills, tells of the period when he yet wrote within the accustomed limits of traditional forms. The whole of it is delicious. If "la Malinconia" is not as deep as he felt and wrote in after life, we do not find fault with him. It is a real, though a very slight melancholy, and is set off finely by the two movements between which it is placed. These two seem of the same material, the same motive and feeling running through both of them. Unfortunately the first violin was somewhat out of tune during part of the third movement, and seemed to be at loggerheads with some of the highest notes. We noticed this in Mr. EICHBERG's quintet too a few times.

Mrs. LONG's part was rendered in her splendid way, with her fine voice and careful school. The aria from Mercadante, she sang most to our liking; the song of Spohr and the Deh vieni were rendered rather colder than they should have been.

It is a matter of some delicacy to speak of a new work, if we cannot afford it full praise. Such is our case. We think Mr. Eichberg ought not to have put the motto on the programme. Raising expectations that are not fulfilled, stating a programme that is not carried out, leaves unpleasant impressions. Better leave free play to imagination—it is not well to tie it down. Of the four movements the fourth seemed to be the best. Through the whole work however we could not find the connecting link, the idea. The first motive of the first movement is grand and good. But though the form is faultless, often ingenious, though the motives are worked up skillfully, though several of the melodies are very good (so the second theme of the last movement, with a Mendelssohnian grace and flavor about it,)—we yet could not see the connection of many of the musical phrases. The last movement with its strong first motive, its half melancholy second theme, and a third melody coming in afterwards of quite a pleasing character, has nothing in it of death. The first movement might be aspiration and striving, but neither the Adagio, which begins with quite a noble strain nor the last movement, can possibly be construed into dying. To be short: the work has many fine passages as to melody and harmony and working up of motives, but it is in our opinion not a work of inspiration and genius, rather one of industry and talent. While we applaud the ambition of Mr. Eichberg to write in a noble, elevated form we regret not to be able to say more to encourage him.

Of the intentions of the Club, very praiseworthy and welcome, to give Saturday evening concerts, our readers will find some notice in our advertising columns.

On Saturday last Mr. B. C. BLODGETT a young musical student recently returned from Germany, gave a musical soirée at the rooms of Messrs. Hallet, Davis & Co., with the assistance of Mrs. J. H. LONG, Miss D. P. PEARSON, Mr. W. H. SCHULTZE, Mr. WULF FRIES and Mr. F. H. HOWARD to about two hundred invited guests. Mr. B. will no doubt become an ornament to the circle of musician-artists in Boston. His style does not show as yet any individual character or poetic inspiration; it is all learned, but learned well. The selection of pieces was judicious. The novelty presented—a Trio by Jadasohn—proved to be highly interesting.

Musical Correspondence.

ST. LOUIS, DEC. 22.—We have had considerable music lately, Mrs. C. VARIAN JAMES gave six "grand concerts" and our Philharmonic Society its third. I enclose programme:

PART I.

1. Overture, "Preciosa" . . . . . C. M. v. Weber
2. Chorus, "Gloria in Excelsis," from Mass in G.C. M. v. Weber
3. Cavatina, "Pensa alla Patria," from "l'Italiana in Algieri" . . . . . Rossini
4. Allegretto from "Third Symphony" . . . . . L. van Beethoven
5. Recitative, Aria and Chorus, "Guerrero, a voi," from "Norma" . . . . . Bellini

PART II.

1. Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . . . Mendelssohn
2. Chorus, "Gloria Patri" . . . . . Palestrina
3. Duo, "Sul Aria," from "Figaro" . . . . . Mozart
4. Violin Solo, "Souvenir de Bellini" . . . . . Artot
5. { a.) Air and Chorus, "Oh May" b.) Quartet and Chorus, "Grand Finale" } from "Euriantes" . . . . . C. M. v. Weber

We liked Mrs. James very much indeed. I had prepared an elaborate article on our third concert, but for a wonderful and unusual thing every paper in the city prepared and published long articles, something never done before here, and have appropriated every fine sentence I had ready, so I can only say that there were 2000 present of our best citizens, and that everything was a complete success.

The violin solo was the surprise of the evening, DR. KELLERER proving himself really to be an artist. We were disappointed in not hearing a flute solo by Mr. CARR. If you have a better professional player than Dabney Carr, why—I never heard him. The solos of this and the last concert sung by Mrs. ALLEN, Mr. CATHERWOOD, &c., and the parts sung by Miss VON PHUL and Miss MCGUNNIGLE, were the best ever sung here, excepting the first prima donna. Mr. Catherwood's voice is four or five notes lower than CARL FORMES, and no wise behind in power. In the last Miss Von Phul in the sextet from Lucia, and Mrs. Allen in, "In tears I pine," surprised their best friends.

The Society has many efficient members who contribute very materially to its advancement. CHARLES BALMER is one of the most active, and to him in no little degree does this Society owe its sound footing. PATTI did not come; is in New Orleans, I believe. A. C.

ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, DEC. 31.—If Charles Wesley were living to-day he certainly could not complain that the devil has all the best music. "The school of the prophets" at Andover has an organization (without an organ) under the name and style of the Lockhart Society, which gives us better music than "the Dorian mood of flutes and soft recorders" to which the Satanic legions march in the first Book of the Paradise Lost.

Last Thursday (Dec. 27) the Lockharts gave a concert in the Town Hall, which is universally acknowledged to be the finest ever heard in Andover. Classic gems of Mendelssohn and Beethoven, fairy fantasies of Chopin, solemn wailings of Van Bree—one could well imagine that one was listening to Otto Dresel and the Orpheus. (Let these artists be void of fear—the Lockharts will soon be scattered among the Turks and cannibals as young missionaries.)

The Society is peculiarly fortunate at this time in possessing a leader (formerly of the Harvard Glee Club) who has not only musical skill but what is quite as needful, great enthusiasm, and a rare faculty for inspiring it in others.

It has good reason also to be proud of its pianist—a gentleman who inherits the name and genius of all the Masons. If any association would license him he could doubtless preach sermons without words

"Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute."

(Of course he would have a right to use notes.) These artists are the two great lights. Then there were sixteen stars who ruled the night. I append their programme for your edification.

PART I.

1. Tirolerlied. . . . . Kummer.
Flute and Piano.
2. Chorus, "Sanctus." Arranged by. . . . . Tufts.
3. { Quartette, "Serenade" . . . . . Eisenhofer.
Chorus, "Wo Solch ein Feuer" . . . . . Mendelssohn.
4. { Marche Funebre. . . . . Chopin.
Charakterstück. . . . . Heller.
Piano.
5. Chorus, "Integer Vitae" . . . . . Flemming.
6. Solo, "Die Reue" . . . . . Fuchs.
7. Chorus, "Setze mir nicht" . . . . . Mendelssohn.

PART II.

1. Caprice de Concert, (La Traviata). . . . . Ascher.
Piano.
2. Duo, "Qual Mare Quel Terra" . . . . . Verdi.
3. Solo and Chorus, "Agnus Dei." Mass in C. Van Bree.
4. Adelaide. . . . . Beethoven.
Flute and Piano.
5. Quartette, "Love" . . . . . Cherubini.
6. Chorus, "Huntsman's Farewell" . . . . . Mendelssohn.
7. Eight Voices, "Wanderer's Night Song." . . . . Lenz.
8. Chorus, "Farewell" . . . . . Mendelssohn.

If we take into consideration that this classic programme was the work of gentlemen who sang together for the first time at the beginning of the present term and pilfered their half hours of practice from Hebrew and Edwards on the Will, it is no slight praise to say that they were successful, that half the pieces were enthusiastically encored and that the other half deserved the same praise.

It was a good thing both for the Society and for the Seminary. People see that Theologians can do something besides put folks to sleep. The announcement of a concert by Old School Theologians would twenty-five years ago, have attracted as much attention as a chorus of mummies with the accompaniment of the Bones. But it is fit that the oldest and holiest of the fine arts should number its votaries in this chosen seat of Orthodoxy just as in the Theological School at Bethel young prophets went down from the hill of God to greet King Saul with psaltery and tabret and pipe and harp. DA CAPO.

BALTIMORE, JAN. 1, 1861.—We have had but little music in this monumental city during the present season. A pleasing Concert by FORMES, FABRETTI, and STIGELLI,—a poor performance of Haydn's "Seven Last Words of the Redeemer," given by the Choir of the Cathedral and "other amateur vocalists"—a week of very bad and poorly paid opera—another operatic concert. This is the whole catalogue of the vocal entertainment which Baltimore has treated itself to thus far this winter. Haydn's Oratorio of the "Seven Last Words" I had never heard before and parts of it seemed to me very grand and effective. But it was given without expression, without time, without animation, without everything, in short, which was needed to give a fit interpretation of such a work. Add to this that the performance took place in a hall nearly twice as long as your Music Hall with but half its breadth (erected over a market, and dignified by the name of the Maryland Institute Hall), and that the noise of shuffling feet and clattering tongues was almost incessantly heard mingling with the feeble tones from the distant platform, and you can easily imagine the sensations which tingled the ears of one accustomed to the full choruses of the "Handel and Haydn," and the decorum of a Boston Concert Room. As the concert was "for charity," I tried to be religiously reconciled to the very un-devotional nature of the performance, and so, closing my eyes, I fancied myself to be in some vast cathedral, and tried to imagine that the strains of music which came so indistinctly from the distance proceeded from the lofty choir, and that the noise of treading feet was but the sound of passing worshippers who had knelt and prayed and were giving place to other devotees. The illusion, however, was only temporary, for I had never associated with solemn worship and pealing anthems beneath "fretted vaults" and in "long-drawn aisles" such harsh confusion of feet and tongues and voices as greeted my ear from every side. Next time such a charity concert is given, I shall leave my "quarter" at the ticket-office, out of regard for the poor, and then, out of regard to myself, shall—go home.

For instrumental music we have had four concerts thus far, given by the "Beethoven Society," and to all lovers of good music, these performances have given great delight and satisfaction. I believe this is only the second season of the "Beethoven," and the Society is already one of which Baltimore may well be proud. The following gentlemen make up the company: MAHR, 1st violin; GIBSON, 2nd violin; LENSCHOU, 1st viola; THEIDE, 2nd viola; SCHMIDLER, Piano; JUNGNIKKEL, Violoncello.

Like your "Mendelssohn Quintette Club," the Beethoven is made up of artists in the best sense of the term. All of them are finished performers, and thorough musicians, and all are alike animated by a strong love for their art. Nothing but their devotion to the highest order of musical compositions and their determination to aid in cultivating a knowledge of these works among the musical public here, could sustain such a society in Baltimore, for the pecuniary support which is given them is very much less than is awarded to similar societies in Boston and New York. The 3d Concert of the "Beethoven" was given a fortnight ago last evening. The following is the programme:

PART I.

1. Overture, from the Opera, "Don Giovanni," for Piano, Violins, Viola and Violoncello, by. . . . . Mozart
2. Solo Quartette, for 2 Violins, Viola and Violoncello, by. . . . . Grand
3. Quintette, for 2 Violins, 2 Violas and Violoncello, by. . . . . Beethoven

PART II.

1. Quartette, for 2 Violins, Viola and Violoncello, by. . . . . Haydn
2. Grand Duo, from the opera "Martha," for Violoncello and Piano, by. . . . . Gregor and Servais
3. Grand Potpourri, from Preciosa, for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, by. . . . . C. M. V. Weber

The Quintette by Beethoven was the one in E flat, but to my surprise, only the first movement was played. I was still more astonished when, upon remonstrating with a member of the Society for thus preparing me for a feast and then withholding the feast itself, I was told that the audience wouldn't endure the performance of an entire Quintette or Quartette of Beethoven! "Endure," indeed, when we had just listened to the whole of the Solo Quartette by Grand, a very pleasing thing to be sure, but as a whole wearisome and unsatisfactory! Such treatment of an audience made up of music-lovers, all of whom seemed fully to appreciate the fragment of Beethoven to which we were served, seemed to me no less absurd than would be the conduct of a teacher who should think his pupils advanced enough to be wearied by Ben Jonson's prolixities, but not yet capable of appreciating a play of Shakspeare. I shall look for better things from the "Beethoven" hereafter. The 4th concert was given last evening with the following programme:

PART I.

1. Sinfonie, in C major, (by particular request.) for Piano, 2 Violins, Viola and Violoncello. . . . . Beethoven
2. Quartetto, for 2 Violins, Viola and Violoncello. . . . . Haydn
3. Grand Solo, for the Violin, performed by F. G. . . . . De Beriot

PART II.

1. Quintetto, for 2 Violins, 2 Violas and Violoncello, Beethoven
2. Grand Trio, from "Magtana," for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello. . . . . Wallace
3. Overture, from the opera "Guillaume Tell," for Piano, 2 Violins, Viola, and Violoncello. . . . . Rossini

The Quintette of Beethoven this time was the ever beautiful "Septuor," three movements of which were admirably rendered. Then we had the whole of the sparkling symphony in C major, which was much more effective than I had expected from only four stringed instruments and the piano. As the pathetic

Andante of the "Septuor" seemed a most fit expression of the sadness of the "dying year" whose last moments were thus speaking on through "music's golden tongue," so the symphony was the embodiment of all the joys and pleasures which the old year had brought us. The Quartette of Haydn was well performed, but why is it that all other Quartettes seem so to lack the soul which we feel in all of Beethoven's works? The form seems to me to be the same, but will some of your critics tell me what is this grand difference which I am sure has been felt by many others besides your correspondent?

I must notice in closing this hurried epistle, a marked improvement in the diminution of the opera element in the programme. I am sure the "Beethoven" as it grows older will adhere still more steadily to its highest purposes, and give their pupils (for such are all of their audience), healthy discipline in the "classics" in place of all the nursery rhymes and picture books to which, in music, we are all so apt to cling with more than childish fondness. ## New Publications.

We have received from A. WILLIAMS & Co., "The Knickerbocker" for January, 1861, in a new dress and new cover, which we cannot like so well as the time honored old one. Mr. Clarke is still at its head, and many of the best American writers are contributors to its well printed pages.

CHRISTMAS CAROLS.—Singing carols is something rather unusual in New England, and when we read of the mediæval carols, and the "yule log" at a time when "A Christmas gambol oft would cheer,

A poor man's heart through half the year."

it delights us to imitate the goodly German or English holiday customs with all their domestic festivities. Our Christmas Eve was gladdened by a serenade in front of the Advertiser office last evening, a genuine carolling, which, according to the ancient custom of singing canticles at Christmas, was intended to recall the songs of the shepherds. The following are the two carols with which we were favored:—

Silent night! Holy night!
All is calm, all is bright,
Round yon Virgin Mother and Child;
Holy Infant, so tender and mild,
Sleep in heavenly peace!

Silent night! Holy night!
Shepherds quake at the sight!
Glories stream from Heaven afar,
Heavenly Hosts sing Alleluia!
Christ, the Saviour is born!

Silent night! Holy night!
Son of God, love's pure light
Radiant beams from Thy Holy Face
With the dawn of redeeming grace,
Jesus, Lord, at Thy Birth!

Earthly friends will change and falter,
Earthly hearts will vary;
He is born that cannot alter,
Of the Virgin Mary.
Born to-day,—Raise the Lay;
Born to-day,—Twine the Bay;
Jesus Christ is born to suffer.
Born for you: Born for you,—Holly strew:
Jesus Christ was born to conquer.
Born to save: Born to save,—Laurel wave:
Jesus Christ was born to govern.
Born a King: Born a King,—Bay wreaths bring,
Jesus Christ was born of Mary,
Born for all: Well befall, Hearth and Hall,
Jesus Christ was born at Christmas,
Born for all.

These carols were sung by a choir of boys from the Advent Church, Green street, who performed their parts finely. We wish them all a "Merry Christmas" and many happy returns of their annual carollings.—Daily Advertiser.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—Another glorious triumph for English opera—another hope for national music. Mr. Balfe's new opera, Bianca, the Bravo's Bride, produced on Thursday evening, was one of the most legitimate successes ever witnessed within the walls of any theatre. The excitement commenced with the overture, which was encored, and was rampant at the end of the first act, when a vociferous call was made for Mr. Balfe, who, after some delay—doubtless not being prepared for so early a summons—made his appearance, and was received with deafening acclamations. Four long acts, enduring four hours and a half, would have cooled any ordinary enthusiasm, and have tired any ordinary patience; but the applause, far from abating, went on increasing, and was most vehement in the last two acts, the audience unanimously encoring a gallop in the last scene, which was indeed inevitable, since the music is exciting in the extreme, and the pas is most admirably arranged by M. Petit, the maitre de ballet, and was capitally danced by the young ladies.

The libretto of the Bravo's Bride is from the pen of Mr. Palgrave Simpson, who has founded his plot on Monk Lewis's melodrama, Rugantino, the Bravo of Venice, and has pretty closely adhered to the original. Rugantino is not only buried in oblivion, as far as regards production on the stage, but is excluded from most editions of English dramatic works, even from those, like the London Stage, which pretend to comprise every work that achieved popularity in its day. It is, however, included in "Cumberland's Plays," but does not appear to have obtained much favor at any time. The story, as adapted in the libretto, may be thus briefly detailed:—

A certain romantic young Prince of Ferrara falls in love with Bianca, daughter of the Duke of Milan, but, though betrothed to her in some mysterious way, which does not appear, wishes to be loved for himself, and not for his princedom. He takes upon him the guise of a young soldier of fortune, and wins the heart of the tender Bianca, but withholds confession of his affection. He departs to the wars—to test the young lady's love by absence, we may suppose—and "crushes the bravo band." How this is effected we are not informed; but the "bravo band" is headed by a terrible chief, Fortespada, whose very name strikes terror to all the country round. Our prince is "led by fate" to the brigand's den, and finds him dying, and so penitent, that he confesses "a foul conspiracy of death" on the part of certain nobles against the Duke of Milan, in which he is implicated. The brigand gives the prince a list of the traitors, and dies. Upon this, the better to prosecute his plans to discover the head of the conspiracy, the prince disguises himself as the brigand, gains access to the conspirators, and induces them to elect him as their chief. He has them thus entirely in his power, but why he does not denounce them at once is not told. The prince is a great adept at disguises. Two of the conspirators having determined to kill Bianca in the grand cathedral of Milan, where she goes alone to pray, our prince, who knows everything, is ready behind a pillar, caparisoned as a mendicant, and stabs the highborn gentleman who was about to stab her. Bianca faints, and on coming to herself she sees the beggar transformed into the brigand, and is terrified when she hears him claim her, in life or death, as the "Bravo's Bride." The young lady—who must have been singularly obtuse as to vision not to detect her lover through one of his disguises—naturally screams, and brings her father and friends to her assistance. The Prince, however, is not so easily caught. Directly he hears the approach of footsteps he assumes the garb of a monk, and makes his escape. We need not dwell upon the incident of the Prince appearing to the Duke as the bravo, since nothing comes from it, but may go at once to state the dénouement, which happens thus:—Changing his tactics, the Prince appears to Bianca as Odoardo, when a confession of love takes place on both sides. The lovers are detected in their transports by the Duke, who, at first enraged with Odoardo, at last consents to grant him his daughter's hand, provided he would place Fortespada in his power that night, at twelve, in the great ducal hall. Nothing can be easier for the Prince to comply with, as we know. Accordingly at night, when the ball goes forward, and the midnight hour has tolled, Odoardo appears and announces that he has captured Fortespada alive. "Bring him before us," cries the Duke, whereupon the Prince retires, and returns as the Bravo. He is unanimously voted to destruction, when the royal troops appear, and, at a sign from the Prince, carry off all the conspirators in custody. Lastly, his Royal Highness declares that Fortespada and Odoardo are the same, and, being pressed for further disclosures, confesses that the Prince of Ferrara is identical with the bravo and the young officer.

Of the music generally we are inclined to think that the composer has expended more thought and care upon it than on any previous occasion. But on this point we must defer entering into details until our next. The first performances of our impressions shall be published with our criticism of the music.—London Musical World, Dec. 8.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The weather has not been very favorable for the winter concerts, four of which have been now given; nevertheless, the attendance on each occasion has been larger than might have been expected. The programmes continue to preserve their distinctive instrumental features, which Mr. Augustus Manns finds he has been wise in adopting. A symphony and one or two overtures invariably constitute items in the selection, for the most part executed with efficiency and vigor. The new vocal favorite has been Mad. Palmieri, who made her début last Saturday, and sang airs from the Bohemian Girl, and the Italian repertory with marked effect. Also the lady's corymbos, Signor Palmieri, presented himself as a tenor singer, with no remarkable results. M. Joseph Heine, a violinist, made his first appearance, and executed Ernst's Pirata fantasia with much applause. The symphony was Mendelssohn's A major, alias The Italian.—Ibid.

LEAMINGTON, (England).—A famous young violinist, J. Becker, who has met with much success in England, has met with a singular accident. One of the strings of his violin breaking while he was examining it, struck him in the right eye, probably depriving it of sight. The unfortunate young artist is thus stopped at the beginning of a brilliant career. The accident occurred at Leamington.

Paris.

THE SISTERS MARCHISIO.—A Paris journal, La Presse, in noticing a musical performance which recently took place at the house of Madame Orpila, one of the most distinguished amateurs in the French metropolis, thus speaks of the two fair artists, Mlles. Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, who have already won for themselves so much renown at the Grand Opera and in private salons by their ensemble singing: "But the principal attraction of the evening was the first appearance in this artistic salon of the sisters Marchisio; they sang the duos from Matilda di Shabran and Norma in the midst of a transport of enthusiastic applause; the perfection of their method, the richness of their organ, but, above all, that admirable combination of the two voices, the quality of which harmonizes so perfectly, that marvellous blending together even of the most difficult nuances; those oppositions of light and shade so wonderfully managed, so exquisitely graduated, in short, all those qualities of ensemble, twins, as it were, which characterize and individualize the talents of the sisters Marchisio, astonished, no less than enchanted, the brilliant auditory. We doubt whether the sisters Marchisio ever obtained a success more real and more flattering at the same time. Among the company who were most liberal of their applause were Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, M. Duprez, and the "brothers Braga."—London Musical World, Dec. 8.

FLORENCE.—A new musical journal L'Italia Artistica has appeared here, and has reached its eighth number.

ROME.—Another new opera has been brought out at the Apollo theatre, called Stefanias, revealing the artistic talent of the young maestro Raffaele Gentili.

AMSTERDAM.—The Society for the promotion of the Science of Music at Amsterdam had invited about eighteen months ago, the learned in music of all countries to join in a competition, for which the works might be written in any language. The prize task was an historical treatise on the musical condition of the Netherlands during the sixteenth century. At the meeting of the 23d of last October, the dispensation of the prizes took place; they were all won by German competitors. The first prize was gained by Herr D. Arnold, of Albersfeld, for an historical critical essay on the rhythm and melody of the old Netherland national popular songs. Herr Kade, at Dresden, won a second prize, for a monography on Matthaus le Maistre; and Herr E. Pasque, at Darmstadt, received a prize for a monography on Adrian Petit. Moreover, the Society has undertaken to support the publication of the works of Herren Arnold and Kade.

HAVANA.—The opera season commenced in the city of Havana on the 2d of Dec. with the "Trovatore." The Diario de la Marina says:—"Senora Lotti possesses many natural recommendations. She is of a beautiful figure, has a fresh and musical voice, which she manages with much skill, taste and elegance. Senora Natali (Fanny) is already well known to the public. Senor Pancani economized his voice on his debut, but in many of the fine passages he gave evidence of great ability. Senor Cresci, was also disposed to reserve his voice for a greater occasion, but he shows that he knows how to sing and to use his excellent talent to advantage. Altogether the 'Trovatore' was well represented. Senor Gottschalk directed the orchestra with his usual ability."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Instrumental Music.

Le Pluie de l'été. (Summer Showers.)

R. F. Harvey. 50

A piece which has of late been as popular in England as Osborne's Shower of Pearls. It is of about the same difficulty.

Chorus from "Antigone," arr. by Otto Dresel. 25

A beautiful piece of moderate difficulty. Can be used as a teaching piece with much advantage.

Titania Polka H. Benson. 25

Telegraph Galop. " 25

Pretty trifles.

Modern Juvenile Pianist. A collection of beautiful operatic melodies, easily arranged for four hands. No. 1. Masaniello. F. Beyer. 15

Intended to be used in the second quarter of Piano Instruction.

Beloved Star. Valse chantante. Henri Laurent. 50

A new and popular English Waltz, introducing the air of Balchard's famous Song, "Thou art so near and yet so far."

Romance from "Robert le Diable," transcribed by Otto Dresel. 25

An arrangement of the beautiful song of Alice in the first act, in which she repeats the last message of Robert's mother to her banished son, beginning in the original text "Va dit-elle."

La Rosa Bianca Mazurka. Signor G. George. 25

Hyacinth Waltz. Miss C. M. Tibbets. 25

Two pretty trifles.

Romanza, op. 28, no. 2, (in F sharp major). Robert Schumann. 25

A most beautiful composition. The visitors of Mr. Dresel's cycles of Concerts will remember it as one of the gems of the second concert.

Soldier's adieu March. G. W. Stratton. 25

Written very effectively. It makes a fine piece for the Piano.

Books.

THE PIANIST'S BEST COMPANION. (SCHMIDT'S FIVE FINGER EXERCISES.) A collection of two hundred and thirteen Five-finger Exercises for the Pianoforte, intended to impart an independent and equal action of the Fingers on that instrument. Composed by Aloise Schmidt, with an introduction by J. A. Hamilton. 50

The practice of five-finger exercises, or, in other words, of passages in one fixed position of the hands, has been found so eminently useful, not only to beginners, but even to advanced pupils, as a means of forming a true and graceful position of the hands and arms, and equality in the action of the fingers, that such exercises are now placed before pupils by all respectable masters throughout Europe. This collection will be found more ingenious, diversified and complete than any other yet published.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

SACRED MUSIC.

I.

It may be considered as established, that the germs of the various forms of the music of our epoch are to be sought in the chant of the ancient bards—in Bardism. By sharing in the rites of the Druids, they added to the solemnity of their religious ceremonies; in celebrating the noble acts of heroes, they gave birth to a form of narrative, which at a later period was transformed into the romance, the ballad, nay, even into works of history; and finally while censuring private immorality, they indicated the true way in which Art and the theatre might become teachers of good morals—their end being to instruct as well as to amuse. Castigat ridendo mores, as the old motto of the Opéra Comique justly had it.

In our opinion many a beautiful operatic subject might be drawn from the ancient Druidic and Gallic periods of history. We have never seen the Ossian of Leseur, but the Bards' chorus of Rossini in La Donna del Lago, which was afterwards introduced into the opera, Robert Bruce, is powerful and majestic. The mass of men's voices in unison, sonorous and vibrating, relieved by the most splendid orchestration; those grave personages in flowing white tunics, holding golden harps, and crowned with oak wreaths, and arranged in curved lines rising like the seats of an amphitheatre, formed a picture of magic splendor, well exhibiting the lofty poesy of that grand form of imperfect civilization.

With the Roman conquests, Bardism degenerated and gradually disappeared. No longer exerting a salutary influence upon society, the bards sold their songs for gold and encouraged vice instead of virtue. Moral depravity drew after it the fall of the Roman Empire, and the invasion of the barbarians almost annihilated, for the time at least, the culture of the fine arts and especially of music. Meantime everything began very soon to wear a new aspect; Christianity, by its divine, supernatural power, civilized the most barbarous races and after the battle of Talsiac, Clovis, the fierce Sicambrian, peacefully bowed his head under the powerful hand of the Bishop, St. Remigius.*

Music, that universal language, reflecting alike the passions, ideas and sentiments of each epoch, was religious in its origin; so it follows, that, after the changes in the patriarchal traditions, which gave birth to the various pagan and idolatrous rites spread through the greater part of Earth's surface, the celestial muse was marvellously regenerated after baptism in the pure and living waters of nascent Christianity.

The Church from the beginning had a liturgy; whether in its origin it was Jewish, Egyptian, Greek, or, perhaps, derived from all three, is now difficult to decide. Be that as it may, the Apostles established successively the reading of the Evangelists, the benediction of the people, the preface and the canon: in a word all those several parts which by degrees have come to form the holy sacrifice of the Mass.†

*The baptism of Clovis by this saint is the subject of the altar piece in the church of St. Remigius, at Bonn.

From the year 104 A. D., hymns to Christ were sung, and the 42d Canon of the Apostles ordains that the Cantor, as in case of the subdeacon and the reader, should cease from his functions and be thrust out of the communion if addicted to gambling and other forms of intemperance.

In the third century, St. Denis of Alexandria, St. Cyprian and the canons of the council of Elvire, in the fourth, Popes Sylvester and Damasus, St. Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil of Cæsarea, Prudence, &c., occupied themselves with the liturgy. Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, and Flavian of Antioch introduced into the church the alternate (Antiphonal) chanting of the psalms, a practice soon afterwards brought by Ambrose to Milan. Saints Hilaire of Poitiers, Loup, Bishop of Troyes, Salvien of Marseilles, Mamert of Vienne, Apollinaris, bishop of Clermont, laid the foundations of the ancient Gallic liturgy.

In the sixth century, St. Cæsar d'Ales, Elpa, the wife of Boethius,‡ St. Benoit, patriarch of the Western Monks, and St. Germain, Bishop of Paris, composed a great number of hymns. At last in the seventh century, Pope Gregory the great compiled the Antiphony, founded the college of singers (in our day the Pope's choir.) and established the practice of singing entirely without orchestral or organ accompaniment. Schools of Roman singing were successively established in France in the churches at Soissons, Metz, Tours, Strasburg, Lyons and Dijon. Why was the single, universal liturgy proclaimed at the council of Vannes, (about A. D. 465) so soon abandoned? Because, alas! however difficult it be to organize and place upon a solid foundation any establishment, it is still more difficult to maintain it, by reason of the force of human passions before which too often the most sacred things are not safe. Egotism, self-love, the spirit of revolt, insubordination and disobedience have unhappily left their marks deeply impressed upon all the crises and revolutions of our poor humanity.

According to M. Castil-Blaze, Clovis was not insensible to the charms of music. Desirous of having in his service a famous virtuoso and skilful professor, he sent to Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, for the singer Acorede, recommended by the wise Boethius, who came to the French Court to delight the most aristocratic ears.

Gregory of Tours reports that at the burial of St. Clotilde, the ceremony was accompanied by

†The writer is Roman Catholic, and perhaps a Protestant historian would not here agree with him.

‡The Nouvelle Biographie Universelle, says (Art. Boëce) "Son mariage avec Elpa paraît être une fable."—"his marriage with Elpa appears to be a fable."

a numerous choir of psalmodists. (Cum magno psallentio.)

Towards the year 556, Quintianus, Bishop of Claremont, discovered in a monastery a youth named Gall, endowed with a voice so charming that people came from all quarters to admire him. The prelate desirous of cultivating talents so promising, presented him to Theodoric son of Clovis, and to the queen his wife. They, charmed, retained him at Court. The king conceived a strong affection for him, took him with him upon his journeys, and after the death of Quintianus gave him the See of Clermont. Gall was after his death canonized for his virtues, and tenor singers might well claim him as one of their patron saints, at the present day.

Chilperic, king of Soissons, youngest son of Clotaire I. composed hymns, which however are not praised by Gregory de Tours; Gontran, king of Bourgoyne et Orleans—by some authors classed among the blessed—was so passionately fond of music could not take his meals without hearing the psalms and responses of divine service executed with much perfection. We shall not affirm that the virtuous monarch did not often himself give the pitch, and direct the performances of the choral society of Soissons, even then ancient.

Dagobert (whose name signifies heroic singer) was also a famous dilettant. Assisting one day at vespers in the abbey of Romilly, good Christian as he was, his ear was suddenly struck by the tones of an admirable voice. He divined at once that such a voice could only belong to a beautiful woman. Falling desperately in love with the songstress, the beautiful Nantechilde or Nantilde, he divorced his queen Gomatrude and espoused the charming recluse. This story in such skilful hands as those of Scribe might furnish a companion piece to the Domino Noir.

In the Vie de Saint Eloi mention is made of a singer in service of Clotaire II., named Maurin, whom the applause of the Court had rendered vain and presumptuous—a proof that twelve hundred years ago the fault of singers were the same as now. Thierry III. it is said, had players upon all sorts of instruments, who accompanied the fine voices of singers, the whole combining to produce delicious concerts. Saint Ausbert at that time the prince's chancellor, was so transported as to write: "Pray God! if thou hast given to mortals the power of thus elevating our souls, even to thee, what will it be to hear in heaven the eternal song of angels and the saints?"

The musical chapel of the King of France was just established in the Cathedral at Paris by St. Germain, bishop of that city and almoner of King Childebert.

It thus appears that the Merovingian dynasty had in its service both singers and performers upon instruments; but they were only heard at public ceremonies or during the repasts of the sovereigns. Occasionally, however, there was a concert or ball at Court, and then the musicians were required to preside at the esbattement joyeux—pleasures of the highborn dames and their lords. Under those slothful kings, music necessarily degenerated and became the handmaid of sloth and feebleness, but the mayors of the palace had already seized the power, which was soon to place them upon the throne and gave France in Charles Martel a worthy predecessor of the immortal Charlemagne.

In short we may call the Merovingian era the liturgic epoch, though we would not affirm that the chanson had not already been heard.

But we must consider humanity as a whole and take it as it is, with its varied tendencies, as they appear more or less developed, according to the moral complexion of each era. Literature, art, music, reflect exactly the grand mean, or average of the manners of any historic period. By turns religious, warlike, dramatic, the musical expression of each century breathes the form, I might almost say the costume, of the dominant social life; it is the result of the true mean of that which produces it. The man of genius receives this general impulse, this grasps it as a whole and impresses his own zeal upon it. The man of talent confines himself to imitating the man of genius, but can never reach his original and creative power. From the fourth to the seventh century we may name among the mortal melodies which saw the light at that ancient period and which time has selected because their beauty is unchangeable: 1st., the Te Deum, a hymn grand, sublime as the heavens, broad as the earth, this hymn of incomparable solemnity is considered the joint production of two fathers, m n of sublime and universal genius at that period of the primitive church, Saints Ambrose and Augustine: 2d., the hymns for Christmas and Epiphany; they are full of character and are attributed to Sedulius, preacher and poet, who, according to Trithemius, wrote A. D., 630; 3d., the hymn, "Vexilla regis prodeunt," composed by Fortunat Bishop of Poitiers. This piece, inspired by the history of the Passion in the New Testament, possessed a melancholy charm, which could only have been borrowed from Christianity.

On Rudimental Instruction on the Piano.

BY F. PETERSILEA.

No. II. TOUCH (Anschlag).

A right beginning saves a vast amount of time and labor in the progress of any undertaking, and yet it appears to me, that more judgment has been used in any other department of study, than in that of the Piano.

A correct position of the arms, hands and fingers is generally understood and thoroughly explained in some Instruction books; the object—to produce a good touch—and the means chosen (the little pieces, amusements, ay, even studies,) are such as to produce, nay force the opposite effect.

About thirty years ago Kalkbrenner invented and recommended a Handrest; I found it exceedingly useful, but nobody else ever uses it, as far as I know. Correct time is considered indispensable; then why not use the Metronome Hummel has recommended it in the strongest terms. My regard for it is such, that for twenty-five years or more I never taught a pupil without it. It does not merely assist in keeping time; but by means of the bell points out the Rhythm—the accents, and without a due regard for these, there is not the slightest chance that a good touch ever can be obtained.

The Touch is two fold: Mechanical and Melodious or Expressive.

Some pieces and passages admit only the former; others, only the latter; still others, and by far the greater part of good Music, both. Every fine player knows this. Unconsciously a good player will use the one or the other, as circumstances require. But this seeming unconsciousness is the result of a perfect Mechanism first acquired, and superior taste and judgment added in later studies. The causes for a bad touch are vastly more numerous now than they were twenty or forty years ago. In a former period the music of Mozart, Haydn, Clementi, Cramer and Hummel was the object of the highest ambition. Now it is Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Liszt! The passage from the former school to the latter is now-a-days traveled in a rail-road fashion; some think, also, that the old stuff of former ages might better be let alone altogether.

The beginner must only use the mechanical touch, for at least a couple of years. The music chosen for lessons and studies must be free from features, which require or admit expression. No crescendo, diminuendo, accelerando, ritardando, irregular accentuation, ff. pp. sfz. is admissible. The student of painting has to learn to use the pencil before the brush, drawing before coloring!

The difference between mechanical and melodious touch may be stated thus: "The former consists in a STROKE, (the literal meaning of the German word, Anschlag), the latter is produced by PRESSURE. The former produces only heavy and light or accented and unaccented notes, never admits of the slightest stiffness, pressure or strain; may be given by the Finger (Finger action), Hand (Wrist action), or Arm (Elbow action), according as the notes to be played, are legato, marcato, staccato, heavy or light. FINGER ACTION only is to be employed in legato movements. (The Slur is at present not to be thought of, its use and abuse shall be noticed in a future article). The accent is produced by lifting the Finger as high as possible before its FALL; the light note is the result, if the finger is but slightly raised. N. B. Remember: in either case the finger falls like a hammer on a loose hinge.

The WRIST ACTION is used only in playing detached notes. The hand is kept expanded, level, the fingers bent but motionless, the arm in its steady level position, the hand uplifted, more or less, in consideration of heavy or light notes, and let fall. (Excellent drawings for Finger and Wrist action are found in Richardson's New Method, but for pure Elbow action there is no plate. The Figure in which Elbow and Wrist action combined is shown, is applicable only to the melodious touch. A true representation of ELBOW ACTION for mechanical touch, would show the arm in the figure V; the wrist elevated, the hand entirely loose, the Fingers straight, pointing perpendicularly upon the keys. The rise and fall of the arm must correspond with the distance of the intervals and the power desired; but the Fingers must not attack the key from a greater distance than is absolutely necessary, for superfluous motion is worse than useless. The melodious touch may proceed either from the Finger, Wrist or Elbow—from the finger and wrist action combined—and lastly from Elbow and Wrist action joined. For perfect drawings see the plates of Richardson's new Method. But in every movement of the Finger, hand or arm, there is a certain restraint, control, regulation (of course I do not mean stiffness). Therefore in short: THE MECHANICAL TOUCH IS SIMPLE, THE MELODIOUS TOUCH COMPLICATED, and consequently unsuitable for the beginner.

The proper cultivation of the mechanical Finger action or touch shall be the subject of my next letter.

Ludwig von Beethoven's Life and Works.

BY ADOLF BERNHARD MARX.

Reviewed by Franz Brendel, Editor of the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik."

I.

Since Mr. Stourdza, the Russian privy-councillor condemned the German universities and gave his verdict against all German culture, no greater insult has been offered to German nature and German art from the neighboring eastern empire than OULIBICHEFF's book on BEETHOVEN. True, we have been accustomed for centuries to receive from those plains, Huns, Mongols and the cholera; but those are dispensations of heaven which we have to submit to. But the book of Oulibicheff, the work of a "sinful man," which he was swinging as a scourge over the sins of the musical representative men of the nineteenth century, has deserved a reproof at the hands of a German for some time. Not because it is of any importance, whether a Russian dilettante in Nischney-Nowgorod finds in Beethoven's F major symphony the sublime production of an Olympic humor or the effects of a "Chimera"—a creation of his own brain! That might trouble us Germans little. But Oulibicheff, having become the favorite of all musical dilettanti by his Mozart-Biography, has been proclaimed all-powerful "hetman" by the whole horde of Cossack critics, from the Volga to the Seine, in consequence of his predatory invasion into the sacred realm of German Art. He sets up the wail of woe, repeated for ever and ever, over the fallen angel, the apostate from the church of Haydn and Mozart, in which the only safety is found; over the man worthy of our pity, who bore the cross of deafness and succumbed to that cross. But if, in his case, deafness and bad example are considered mitigating circumstances, what fate do those wicked persons, who are not willing to make the brook run up hill, who in the time of round hats and natural hair think another kind of music possible, yea, even necessary, than in the time of perukes, queues, and three-cornered hats! To kill these Herostatuses critically, it is necessary to insist on the axiom: "principiis obsta" (resist principles) with all possible energy. After one-half of Beethoven is killed, his sinful part given to the flames, then the heretics, anabaptists and musical Hussites will perish by their own folly.

Under these circumstances it is important in the highest degree, and pleasant to see a savant of excellence, Mr. MARX, rise to vindicate in warm, eloquent language, in a manner truly scientific, the whole of BEETHOVEN to Germany and poor mankind. Yea, the whole BEETHOVEN. For this purpose, he attacks from the outset the idea of a musical apostasy, Beethoven's, and the error of a gradual development, Beethoven's, in three or four styles.

Beethoven's gigantic genius would have signalized an epoch in any century. If an unfavorable fate had thrown him into the 16th century, he would perhaps have overtopped PALESTRINA and ORLANDO LASSO. A mild and kind Providence ordained him to be the successor of MOZART and HAYDN. Both are the most glorious productions of the 18th century on the musical soil of all the world. BACH and HANDEL were the most decisive representatives of the self-conscious, GERMAN Protestant mind, which finds its world within itself or builds it up within itself in cheerful battle for thought, secure against all inimical powers. HAYDN and MOZART, on the contrary, were Catholics, sons of the more universal religion; but their catholicism was at the same time the mild and humane one of the age of Joseph II. They did not do away with the terrors of hell and purgatory; but their pure souls had the blissful consciousness that the fire of hell and purgatory was not going to burn them. Haydn, in his well-balanced, harmonious frame of mind, wrote hymn after hymn of joy and happiness of life. Thus he created God's world anew, not as the vale of sorrows of the theologians, but as an emanation of the free spirit of God. Irresistible enchantment pervades the works of his younger pupil and master, MOZART. At Salzburg stood his cradle. In that delightful valley, whose magnificent mountain forms are yet far from the sublime ruggedness of the stock of the Alps, half-Italian breezes float around us. Here the heart swells with longing for the gardens of the Hesperides to the south of the Brenner mountain. Such a longing for unknown isles of happiness, the striving after the sunny world of eternal love and youth is the golden tenor of almost all of Mozart's works. Therefore all the sweet yearnings of youthful happiness in love tremble through his symphonies and operas; he is for this reason able to picture the terrors threatening this happiness of love. And therefore nature denies to him sorrow and the strife with those powers that night have destroyed his empire of youth. He died young, very likely to the advantage of his glory.

If love and longing of youth were the exclusive contents of art, Mozart would be the master absolute, and passing beyond him treason against art. But when Mozart died European mankind underwent, for the second time, the fall of man—the French revolution was beginning to send up its fiery rays.

Ludwig Uhland.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

Of all living German poets, Uhland is perhaps the best known beyond the limits of his native country. He is not, therefore, necessarily the greatest; for in the higher qualities of passion and imagination he is surpassed by Rückert, while in vigor Freiligrath is his superior. Neither of these poets, however, approaches Uhland in those qualities of simplicity, sweetness, and quaint tender fancy, which have made him so popular, even with those who know him only through translations. Few English poems have had a wider circulation among us than his "Crossing the Ferry," commencing:

"Many a year is in its grave, Since I crossed this restless wave."

—or, "The Castle by the Sea," in Longfellow's version. In Germany no poet has written such a number of songs and ballads, which have been taken at once to the heart of the people, and have become the commonest household words of Song. Uhland is a popular poet, in the best sense of the word. Tender, true, loyal to his fatherland, full of all noble and generous inspirations, he has written no line which can possibly be perverted to exercise other than a good influence. In this respect, as well as in the consistency and integrity of his life, he strongly resembles our own Bryant.

Uhland was born in 1787, in the little town of Tübingen, in Würtemberg, where he now resides.

He studied jurisprudence, and resided for a while in Stuttgart, where he was several times elected a member of the Constitutional Assembly, always heartily cooperating with the liberal and progressive party. Many of his political lyrics breathe a bold and ardent spirit of freedom. I scarcely know a bolder or more manly utterance than that song of his, which every German student sings:

"If now a soul from heaven descended,
At once a hero and a bard."

He soon withdrew from active life, and burying himself in his beloved Tübingen, devoted his days to poetry. In 1848, only, his repose was broken. He was chosen to the German Parliament at Frankfort, where he resumed his old place, on the extreme Left, and spoke good words for German Unity and German Freedom. He has amply proved his political kinship to the poets of Suabia—to Schiller, and Schubert, and Hauff.

The first German book which I ever attempted to read was Uhland's Poems. Before I had been a week in Heidelberg, and while I was still unable to ask for a clean towel, I had read "The Blind King," and "Little Roland." The delight which these poems gave me, lightened the study of the language, and I did not stop until I had mastered the book from beginning to end. I was anxious to know something about the poet whom I had thus learned to love, but those who had seen him described him to me as a dry, silent, ungenial old man, in whom no trace of the poetic character could be discerned.

Nevertheless, I determined that I would visit him in the course of my three months' walk through Germany; but when I reached Stuttgart, toward the close of the trip, with twenty cents in my pocket, and fifty miles yet to be traversed, and the bottles of the clouds emptied upon my head, I set my teeth together, looked at the statue of Schiller, and started for Heidelberg through the rain.

Seven years afterward, on my way from Constantinople to England, I found myself again in Würtemberg. I had not much time to spare, but the reflection came: I may never be so near to Uhland again; he is an old man, and if I fail to visit him now, I may repent it all my life. So I stopped for the night at Stuttgart, and booked myself for the diligence which started at dawn for Tübingen.

It was a tiresome, dreary ride over the windy uplands. In the gloomy autumn day, the cold fields and dark woods of pine exercised a depressing influence upon me, and I began to wish myself back again. The only other passenger was a young man, who was completely absorbed in his own thoughts, which he wrote from time to time in a note-book, as well as the shaking diligence allowed. I was curious enough to steal a glance now and then, and discovered that he was composing a poem, "right out of his head," as the country people say. During the ride of six hours he produced three stanzas, of eight lines each, and alighted in Tübingen with an air of great exhaustion. I wish I knew who he was; I even wish (I am ashamed to say) that I had spied out the title of the poem, that I might have the pleasure of ransacking modern German literature to find it!

Tübingen is a quaint little old place, on the side of a hill, overlooking the valley of the Neckar. But I had not come to see the town. My first business was to write a note to Uhland, stating who and what I was, and why I wanted to see him. Having dispatched this by a servant of the hotel, (who, I thought, seemed a little surprised, and spoke of Uhland as coolly as if he had been a shoemaker,) I lay down on my bed to await the result. In half an hour the man came back, stating that Herr Uhland would receive me immediately; and he thereupon accompanied me to the poet's residence.

I was ushered into a bare little library, lighted by a single window. It resembled, in fact, a lawyer's office much more than a poet's sanctum. A side-door opened and Uhland entered. He shook hands with a manner which was benevolent rather than cordial, and invited me to a seat on the sofa. After the usual commonplaces, he conversed very pleasantly. I found at once that he was thoroughly simple and unobtrusive, yet cheerful and kindly—anything but dry and cynical, as he had been represented.

His stature is small, and his figure slight. The shoulders stoop a little, which makes him appear older than he really is. His face is thin, and much wrinkled about the mouth and eyes—but the eyes themselves are soft, clear, and blue, with the same fresh, youthful character which I found in those of Humboldt. His nose is prominent and full of character, his forehead high, and finely modeled, and his scanty hair, once blond, is now silver-white. The form of his head has much resemblance to that of Bryant, but he lacks the splendid Homeric beard of the latter.

I asked him whether he had written any poems recently—whether we might not expect something more from him. "I would not swear," he said, "that I will never write any more; but I have never yet written except from the necessity of expression. Whether that necessity will come again, is a thing which I cannot foresee, but it is certainly less active now than in my younger years." He then went on to speak, with great frankness, of his own works, not concealing his satisfaction at their popularity, yet not elated thereby, for they were evidently written for himself, and the effect which they might produce on others was but a secondary consideration.

After an hour spent in pleasant talk, I rose to take leave, and then ventured to ask for his name, as a souvenir of my visit. He wrote upon a slip of paper: "An inhabitant of the Suabian Land to the wanderer from the Orient," signed, and gave it to me, with a friendly invitation to visit him again. As I returned to the hotel the rain began to fall, so I kept within doors all evening, and at midnight took a return diligence to Stuttgart. So that all I saw in Tübingen was the poet Uhland.

Here is a tender little song of his, which has not been translated:

TO THE NAMELESS ONE.

Oh, would that I were standing
Upon a mountain's crown,
With thee on vales and forests,
With thee, love, looking down:
There all around I'd shew thee
The world, in morning's shine,
And say: if it were mine, love,
So were it mine and thine.

And in my heart's deep valleys
Couldst thou but thus look down,
Where all the songs are sleeping
God sent, my life to crown,
The truth I cannot utter
There might thy dear eyes see:
Each hope and each achievement
Received its life from thee.

History of the Oxford Singing-School.

BY REV. E. H. SEARS.

The singing-school I understand to be one of the essentials of a New England ecclesiastical organization, and I do not think we can come to a full understanding of New England life, education, character, and manners, unless we know something of this, not the least important of its institutions. I am a graduate of this institution,—not, I am sorry to say, with the first honors, but I have been through all its drill, been initiated into all its mysteries, and feel myself tolerably competent to write its history. The history ought to be written by some one. Our school was marked by curious and interesting incidents, some of them highly illustrative of Yankee tastes and proclivities. I have waited now thirty years, and I am afraid if I wait any longer all the actors in the drama will have passed off the stage, and the history will never be given to the world. I shall be obliged, however, to alter a few names, and make some new combinations of incident, so as not to hurt the feelings of some people who are yet alive; otherwise the reader may rely upon my accuracy. I enter upon the subject con amore, since it is one with which poetry and music are blended with such endless shades and variations.

The village of Oxford is situated on one of the hills in the interior of Massachusetts. It contains a meeting-house, a store, a post-office, what used to be a tavern, and half a dozen houses in which the first of the village aristocracy reside. The village, I am told, did not take its name from the English seat of learning, but rather from its bovine and agricultural interests. Large herds of cows and oxen graze in its pastures; and it is delightful, on a summer's evening, to see the flocks of the dairy vending along into the barn-yards, and the milkmaids and milk-women heing thither with their pails; for the women in Oxford have never been deprived of their right to labor. Great cheese-rooms are filled with long rows of cheeses, of most beautiful yellow, all the work of the women and the girls. Somehow the blushes of the "evening red" pass into the cheeks of the Oxford maidens; they are pictures of health and womanly strength; the sunset skies of purple and crimson, whose lights play over their features, scarcely give them a deeper tinge than Nature had done before, and the business of the dairy is enlivened with the psalm-tunes learned at the singing-school.

I must give an account of the state of things before the memorable singing-school of 1830 revolutionized the affairs of the village of Oxford. The meeting-house had square pews, both on the floor and in the galleries, and a sounding-board over the pulpit, which was always just going to fall on the preacher's head. The minister was a venerable preacher, of the old-school orthodoxy. He wore a white neckcloth, without any collar; his thin, white hair always lay sleek on the top of his head. He always came in at the north door, and, as he took off his hat on entering, he stroked the top of his head three times (I always wondered why, as nothing was never out of place there), and ascended the pulpit stairs, the very picture of piety and meekness.

Once in two or three years the parish went through the process of "seating the meeting-house." You must understand that the pews were not owned individually, but by the parish, and the parish as yet was the whole town. Consequently there was a committee appointed to "seat the meeting-house." It was well understood that some pews were more aristocratic than others; these were assigned to the doctors, the lawyer, the justices of the peace, and now and then to some rich Farmer Scrapewell, whose wife and children fared out in finer silks and broad-cloth than his neighbors, and who would "sign off" if left out among the Snookses and Smiths. There were two pews, one under each flight of stairs, which always caught the fag-end of the parish. In one "Old Dick" and his family were always seated, who were colored people; in the other a half-wit, named "Cornelius," with a few of his peers. There were two pews below, one at each of the opposite entrances, to which no one was assigned by name, one being reserved for single men, and the other for single women, and which got the name of the "old bachelor's and old maid's pews." It is a curious fact, which always puzzled me when a boy, that, while the former was generally occupied, not a person was ever seen in the latter within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, though the meeting-house had stood for half a century. The gallery pews were never "seated," but left free to the young people in general, the boys at the right of the minister and the girls at the left; and they were always full. Indeed, in the good old times the house was generally filled in all its parts, except the pew for single women, which was a blank spot in the gathered and packed humanity of the village of Oxford.

But we are more specially concerned with the singers' seats, and it lies upon me to describe them. They occupied three sides of a quadrangle, the pulpit being at the middle of the fourth. Consequently, the singers sat in single rows running across three sides of the meeting-house, the treble fronting the bass, and the leading chorister fronting the pulpit. The leading chorister was a tall, bilious, wiry looking person, by the name of Peter Bettis. You should have seen him in his glory, especially in the full tide of one of the "fuguing tunes." His forces marshalled on each side of him, he would bend his lithe figure, now this way, now that way, throwing his voice into the bass and into the treble alternately, as if rolling a volume of song on each side out of his own inexhaustible nature. It really seemed, sometimes, as if all other voices were touched off by his, like a row of gas-lights breaking out in long lines of splendor by the touch of a single flambeau. Especially when they sang, as they very often did, the 122d Psalm, proper metre,

"How pleased and blest was I,
To hear the people cry,"

you should have witnessed the strophes and the antistrophes, sometimes in jets and jerks, sometimes in billows, which the bass rolled forth and the treble rolled back again, and which then the three living sides of the quadrangle would all take up anew, and bring down in one tremendous crash of harmony.—Peter Bettis, as the central figure, swaying with the inspiration, riding on the whirlwind and directing the storm.

"I were worth ten years of peaceful life,
One glance at their array."

On the left of the chorister were the picked young men, the flower of the Oxford farms; on his right the girls, in neat white dresses, and in long continuous rows, beginning away at the south side of the church and extending to the north, and then making a right angle and coming up snug to the right shoulder of Peter Bettis,—all ruddy and smiling as the roses of June. Without much abuse of metaphor, you might call these two quadrangular sides the two wings on which Peter Bettis soared into the empyrean of the celestial symphonies.

The choir was a unit, and the Oxford parish was in its palmiest prosperity. I am compelled, however, as an impartial historian, to record the fact that even now there was a small speck in the horizon. There were two other choristers—Timothy Case and Jesse O. Whitney—who sat with the bass. Timothy Case never liked Peter Bettis, notwithstanding Peter's popularity in Oxford and vicinity. Though Peter Bettis would carry by storm the whole congregation, Timothy Case always stood out and muttered some sulky criticism upon the singing. It fell to him as the second chorister to take the lead in Peter's absence, when he would try to outdo his rival, especially in singing treble, by which means he got the name of "Squeaking Tim." But he was not without his influence in the parish, for he married a cousin of Farmer Scrapewell's wife, and some thought him the better singer of the two. I cannot pretend to balance the claims of the two gentlemen.

Such was the state of affairs when the singing-school opened. A Mr. Solomon Huntington, who had taught singing with immense success in the neighboring and fashionable town of Grandville, came to Oxford. "What do we want a singing-school for," asked several, "when the singing is as perfect now as it can be?" Not so, however, thought the Cases and the Scrapewells. Not so thought the young people who attended the Grandville concert. Not so thought several others who met at the Oxford Mansion-house to hear Mr. Solomon Huntington sing, and play on his bass-viol. He was a portly, sociable gentleman, who had seen the world. He had great compass of voice, and when he played on his violin, and represented a thunder storm, a conflagration, the judgment day, the battle of Trafalgar, and several other catastrophes, they were constrained to acknowledge that music had not reached its grand diapason in Peter Bettis.

The school opened in the centre school-house. It was crammed. Peter Bettis was there, with the three vocal sides of his quadrangle. Timothy Case was there. The Scrapewells were there. The élite of the village was there in reserved seats. All the singers in town came thither, bells jingling, boys and girls laughing and frolicking. After the school got fairly launched and organized, Mr. Solomon Huntington had a good many criticisms to make. He told them that half of them swallowed the music down their throats without letting it come out at all. "Fill your chests and open your mouths, not squeeze your mouths up as if you were going to whistle Yankee Doodle instead of singing praises to the Lord, thus—" And he would fill his lungs, and open wide his mouth, and pour out a thunderous volume of sound, and roll it and quaver it and shake it into sparkling scintillations, and throw them all over the school-room like sparks from a smithy's anvil. Then he would show off the opposite method by way of contrast and ridicule. He would compress his lips and chest, and grunt out some guttural sounds, or whine through his nose, "That's the way you sing here." Curious developments followed. It was soon evident that there were two opinions about opening the mouth. Some kept their mouths shut closer than ever; these were mostly the older singers. Others expanded their jaws to a most astonishing capacity. I had never noticed but what Peter Bettis opened his mouth sufficiently during his flourishing administration; but now you could hardly see the motion of his lips. On the other hand, the more Peter Bettis shut his mouth the more Timothy Case and Jesse O. Whitney opened theirs. The question was discussed at parties and sleigh-rides. Mercy Bettis said that when she saw the Scrapewell girls sing she could think of nothing but a trap-door. She would not open her mouth as if she was going to swallow the universe,—not she. At the next party Emily Scrapewell, in one of the "awful pauses" in conversation, accosted Mercy Bettis on the opposite side of the room, inquired for her health, and said she understood she had been threatened with the lockjaw. It was an injudicious remark, though it raised a general titter at Mercy's expense. There was a division among the singers, however, and it could not be helped. Mercy rejoined that "She would rather die of lockjaw than have her jaws dislocated in yelping Watts's hymns." After the two parties had got thoroughly formed, I often amused myself with looking over the school-room during the singing, and among the odd fancies that came into my head, I represented to myself the Oxford singing-school overtaken by some sudden judgment and turned into petrifications, or, like Lot's wife, into salifications, some with their mouths wide open, some with their lips screwed together, and I wondered what the geologist would make of it as he dug them up or quarried them out at some future age, and whether from this single fact he could thread back the history of our singing-school and of its division into the trap-door and the lockjaw party. What would he make of the preserved fact? Would he not say that one part was gasping for breath? or would he not say they were trying to eat the others? Would he ever suspect the truth? and hence may we not infer the uncertainty of most of these antideluvian speculations? This, however, by the way.

The singing-school had not proceeded far before it was deemed necessary to affect a complete reorganization of the choir in the church. Mr. Solomon Huntington said it was impossible to sing with the singers strung from one end of the meeting-house to the other. They must "sit together." The whole plan of the galleries must be changed. That row of pews opposite the pulpit must be torn away and an orchestra must be formed there. Now came a worse crisis in the affairs of Oxford. The quadrangle must be broken up, and with it the two central wings on which the congregation for half a century had soared to the stars. I cannot record all the speeches and debates. Mr. Huntington carried all his points from beginning to end, for the young men and women were always with him. Indeed, I am candid to say that he was an intelligent and worthy gentleman, and I presume he was right in this matter, though I always mourned the mutilation of that old church. There the two wings of Peter Bettis had caught me up into the heavens, and made me feel the truth of an old gentleman's saying, that "the singing was the best part of the sermon." There I had come up to hear the sermon, sometimes rather to look at the minister while my thoughts were running along the other side of that quadrangle where the roses from all the farm-houses were ranged a-row. The astronomers say that the best way to see a star is to look one side of it. So I have no doubt a great many of us youngsters looked at the minister for the purpose of seeing particular flowers on the right wing of Peter Bettis's quadrangle. I suppose it was wrong; but I am writing history, and feel obliged to be candid.

Then there was all the reverence and affection bound up in the arrangements of an old church, the same as in an old Bible or hymn-book. Every board that was torn from its place tore into the very heart of Deacon Webster and old Uncle Eliakim Jones, and several other patriarchs, who would gather at noon in one of the great square pews, lean their gray heads upon their staves, and talk over the old times and the degeneracy of the age. But the reformers had their way. The quadrangle was broken up. The pews in the north gallery were ripped out and piled away as old lumber, and seats were arranged one behind another, the singers seated anew, beginning with the graver men and matrons, and ascending and tapering off with the boys and girls, whose heads nearly touched the ceiling above. The next Sunday, hark and behold! the musical wings were clipped forever and the singing rained down from what they called an orchestra perched away up in the north gallery. The people below, however, call it by different names, and by names which were anything but complimentary. "Pigeon-loft," "hay-mow," "hen-roost," and divers other terms suggestive of rural tastes and occupations, expressed the disgust of the Oxford conservatives at the desecration of their meeting-house. The controversy between the trap-doors and lockjaws, conveniently abbreviated as the "traps" and the "locks," paled away, though it was not forgotten, in the new controversy between the quadrangles and the orchestra men, which extended beyond the choir and involved the whole congregation.

Carissimi, a famous composer of music, being praised for the ease and grace of his melodies, exclaimed: "Ah! with what difficulty is this ease acquired."

Prospects of Operatic Music in America.

It is a common maxim that we have no means to judge of the future, save through the experience of the past. Like many other common maxims, however, which are acknowledged to be sound in theory, and are systematically eschewed in practice, it is seldom adopted by individuals or classes, as a rule of action. The projectors and conductors of Opera houses, for instance, invariably regard it as a "glittering generality." No consideration of past failure deters either class from renewed experiment. Huge theatres for operatic purposes, have gone or are going up all over the country, which will favorably compare in splendor and dimension with those of the European capitals. New York, Boston, and Philadelphia have their Academies; Brooklyn, regardless of expense, points exultingly to her $200,000 edifice. Turning to the West, we find the ambitious Pike investing his magnollian profits in a sumptuous pile, which he gracefully christens with his poetic name. There seems to be an abiding faith in the musical proclivities of the American people. One impressario after another gets into difficulties, and finally disappears in the Slough of Despond; yet the new temples continually arise, as if to multiply chances for the unlucky speculator to tempt financial ruin. The very name "Academy of Music," has been such an unfortunate one, that we wonder ingenuously has not been taxed to invent a title which should be a harbinger of hope rather than an omen of disaster. In fact, the first regular theatre for the performance of Italian Opera in England was styled the Royal Academy of Music, and was as ill-fated as most of its god children have been. Established in 1720, largely aided by Royal and aristocratic patronage, supported by the talents of Handel, Bononcini, and Ariosti, whose works were interpreted by the best living singers, this establishment closed its doors in 1728, after sinking £50,000,—a much larger sum than now,—over and above the regular receipts from public patronage.

These considerations, however, by no means prevented the speedy inauguration of similar enterprises, whose histories bear the common family resemblance. Thus men refuse to be guided by the experience of others. Each imagines his case is to be the exceptional one. Each has his favorite schemes, hobbies and pets whose judicious juxtaposition and distribution shall disarm criticism and forestall failure. Each falls into the delusive snare of trusting that the enthusiasm with which the Hydra-headed monster always welcomes a new undertaking, is an earnest and reliable indication of permanent and substantial support. Each finds out his blunder when there is no longer anything in his pockets to buoy up the weight of his aces of wisdom. We are well aware that it is easier to speak of the causes of failure, than to point out the means for effectual remedy. It is very certain that there is a very strong taste for Italian music among our people collectively. The problem is, so to direct that taste into steady channels, as to induce its gratification to pay for the cost of the article it requires. That no solution has yet been arrived at is sufficiently obvious. The late Manager of our Opera house has unquestionably labored hard to please the public and to maintain his position. There have been drawbacks. He has mounted most expensively and unprofitably, the least melodious and popular operas of his repertoire—the Sicilian Vespers and the Jewess. Good works, on the contrary, have been carelessly presented. It is an unfortunate illustration of the doctrine of compensations, that bad operas have been so finely equipped, and fine operas so illy. He has been drawn into the blunder of risking the reputation of his house on the untried efforts of novices who have displeased the public by "stepping on the top round of the ladder at once, an experience which precludes the possibility of ascension and includes the probability of a fall." Finally, he has "enjoyed the disadvantage" of too marked and blatant a support from a press which too regularly swamps its candidates, to permit the rational hope of even a musical exception. The minor detriments, such as undisciplined employees, an army of impecunious lobbyites, half claque and half clique, and the succumbing to the caprices of conceited artists, are, we presume, to be classed more or less among the inevitables when so delicate an exotic as the Opera in its embryo state. But we believe New York is now getting sufficiently cosmopolitan to admit of an Opera enjoying that precision of discipline, fertility of resources for the mise en scene, and judicious advantages of every means for increasing receipts, common to Old World establishments. We venture to suggest among the latter, that the upper part of the house in the Academy of Music has never yet been made to pay what it should. Let comfortable stalls and small boxes be arranged in the upper tiers, and let for the season, at a fixed moderate price. People who are now ashamed to go to any but the most expensive part of the house—which they can often ill afford—would soon be induced, by comfort and permanency, to avail of the new convenience. The Stockholders would best subserve their own interests by consenting to forego their existing monopoly of the (nearly) three hundred choicest seats in the house, reserving, simply, their right of admission. These reforms being achieved, a strong effort should be made, by offering liberal inducements for wholesale purchase, to lease the boxes in family (or grand) tier, also by the season. The patronage of the general public is too unreliable, too much affected by weather and caprice, to be regarded as a substantial basis for the treasury; such a basis must come as in London and Paris, from subscription. Let now a well balanced company of competent artists, whose selection shall be placed in hands of unmistakable experience and taste, and whose engagements shall be strict enough to prevent public disappointments, be brought forward, and there will be, with the suggested improvements, greater reason to anticipate successful and permanent establishment of Italian Opera in America, than we have yet had the right or the means to count upon. It is a pity that so elegant and refined an amusement should not obtain something better than its present precarious foothold here, and without being uncharitable enough to wish any one any harm, we shall be glad to see in the future, a management with sufficient spirit, dignity and capacity, to compass the necessary reforms, and to realize an Opera House as a solvent and abiding institution.—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING IN RICHMOND, VA.—The slave population and their employment are objects of interest to the visitors to all Southern cities. Go into a tobacco manufactory here and you will see from fifty to one hundred blacks of both sexes and all ages, busily engaged in picking and rolling the weed, and preparing it for boxing; while at the same time a flow of delightful harmony is kept up as their united voices join in some of their peculiar hymns, many of which are the same as are heard in the churches of Boston. The slaves work and sing as a matter of course; they could not well do the one without the other; and to a question of mine, after visiting some twenty or more factories where the same habit was observable,—I was told that their song was never interrupted by any one, though in several instances conversation with the proprietor was almost impossible, in consequence of the "congregational singing" among the operatives.

I visited one of the churches for blacks yesterday afternoon, and found there the same disposition to sing as prevails in the factories. No sooner had the last words of one hymn left the lips, than some little whining voice, or oftener, a gruff bass one, would lead off on something else; and I began to think that the congregation did not intend their preacher should have an opportunity to commence his portion of the service at all. There are no churches for free blacks in Richmond, but free and bond all worship together, and not a few whites are found among them, also; who are always treated with the greatest respect.—Corr. of Boston Evening Transcript.

THE FIRST PERFORMANCE OF HANDEL'S "MESSIAH."—When Handel's "Messiah" was first performed, the audience was exceedingly struck and affected by the music in general; but when the chorus struck up, "For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," they were so transported that they all, together with the king, (who happened to be present,) started up and remained standing till the chorus ended; and hence it became the fashion in England for the audience to stand while that part of the music is performing. Some days after the first exhibition of the same divine oratorio, Mr. Handel came to pay his respects to Lord Kinnoul, with whom he was particularly acquainted. His lordship, as was natural, paid him some compliments on the noble entertainment which he had lately given the town. "My lord," said Handel, "I should be sorry if I only entertained them, I wish to make them better."

ANECDOTE OF ZEUNER.—Our notice of Zeuner's "Feast of Tabernacles," reminds us of an incident in his life, illustrative of his extreme sensitiveness. At one time organist of a prominent Episcopal church in this city, Zeuner, allowing his fancies to assume the shape of a masterly impromptu fugue upon a certain Sunday, astounded the few appreciative and knowing members of the congregation with his wonderful performance—while he simultaneously shocked the many-headed with what seemed to them totally incomprehensible and devoid of beauty. At the conclusion of the service, one of the prominent members, meeting the great organist in the vestibule, put the following query to him: "Mr. Zeuner, pray, is our organ out of order? There was such an unaccountable jolting and rumbling in the pedals this morning, and altogether it sounded very strangely indeed." This lamentable display of musical ignorance entirely overcame the testy and sensitive harmonist. With a contemptuous hiss between his teeth, he strode from his interrogator, nor ever went near the stately church again, professionally or otherwise.—Amateur's Guide.

Here is a bit of pleasantry which goes to show what sort of a life is led by a Parisian theatrical manager. M. Beaumont, who has recently assumed the direction of the Opera Comique, and is supposed to be an exemplification of the proverb, that a "new broom sweeps clean," or that, in other words, his profession is paramount to every other consideration, is already in his office at nine o'clock in the morning, walking up and down the room, with an air of importance justified by his responsible position. A liveried servant enters and obsequiously asks if M. Beaumont "desires breakfast to be served?"

"Breakfast, indeed!" ejaculates the great man. "Either I am director of the Opera Comique, or I am not. If I am the director, it is my imperative duty to receive petition—I mean pieces. It is now between nine and ten o'clock, and not a single act have I yet accepted. Business before pleasure! Introduce the petitioners!"

The servant throws open the doors of the ante-chamber, and a throng of authors and composers rushes into the cabinet. After patiently listening, during two mortal hours, to the demands of his courtiers, the King of the Opera Comique is once more alone, and can at least breakfast in tranquillity. M. Beaumont has done a good morning's work; and six new operas are added to the repertoire of the establishment. The servant sits in the ante-chamber, awaiting the termination of his august master's repost. All at once, a gray-haired stranger enters, carrying under his arm a voluminous roll of music.

"Is the director in?" asks the stranger, in persuasive accents, at the same time slipping a Napoleon into the chamberlain's hand.

"The director is at this moment particularly engaged. He is breakfasting, and cannot be interrupted."

"Would you have the kindness to announce me?" entreats the stranger. "I am convinced he will receive me."

"I am quite sure it would be useless. You come on business, I suppose."

"Yes. Say that it is M. Auber, with a new opera."

"Let me advise you, M. Auber, to come some other day. We have already received a sufficient assortment in your line, this morning!"—N. O. Delta.

JULLIEN'S EXTRAORDINARY DUEL.—M. Jullien was first noticed by the public as leader of the concerts at the Jardin Turc, at Paris, since built over. A five story house now stands where he once stood, as we have also so often seen him here, with primrose gloves, and shirt cuffs turned up to the elbow, wielding the sceptre of the king of the orchestra. It was during his reign at the Jardin Turc that, according to M. Lecomte, the following accident happened to him: "He had an extraordinary duel, unprecedented save amongst Ariosto's fabulous heroes. One of the musicians, who had been a fencing-master in a regiment, had a dispute with him, and sent him a challenge. Jullien asked a week to prepare for the duel, and his request was granted. At the end of that time the encounter took place with swords, and he received a furious thrust, which ran him right through the body, the hilt of the weapon actually resting upon the wound, and his antagonist having naturally let go his hold, Jullien rushed upon him, and in his turn dealt him a desperate blow; after which, having thus revenged himself, he remained erect, with a sword sticking out of his back! Nobody daring to withdraw it, he himself had the energy to pluck it from the wound. It had made itself a passage which, wonderful to relate, interfered with none of the organs essential to life. A month afterwards, Jullien had resumed his baton and his primrose gloves, and, pallid and in elegiac attitudes, he once more presided over those concerts to which the fame of his adventure now attracted all Paris. The circumstances which decided him to quit Paris, were, like everything in his life, singular and out of the way. Having some cause of complaint against the authorities, he revenged himself by the composition of an odd posting-bill, in which a combination of letters, put in larger type than the others, formed, when seen at a distance, words offensive to the police. He had to run for it, and then it was he went to England."

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha," Piano Solo.

Orpheus Quartette Club.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 5th, the gentlemen composing this Club, Messrs. W. and C. SCHRAUBSTADTER, LANGERFELDT and JANSEN, the solo singers of the Orpheus Musical Society, gave a concert at the hall of Messrs. Chickering, assisted by Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG. The programme was excellent, and the execution for the most part also. The singing of these gentlemen in the Orpheus concerts made them deservedly favorites, and the ensemble-pieces they sang that evening, were done with that nicety of shading, that strict and careful entering in the intentions of the composer, which is a characteristic of the Orpheus, and a proof of Mr. KREISSMANN'S careful training.

PART I.

1. Quartette, "Ich grüße dich," .....Hartel
2. Aria, "O Isis und Osiris," from the Magic Flute. ....Mozart
Mr. R. Jansen.
3. Tartini's Dream, Sonata for Violin, (1690,) by request, .....Tartini
Mr. J. Eichberg.
4. Duetto from Don Giovanni. ....Mozart
Messrs. C. Schraubstädter and R. Langerfeldt.
5. Quartette, Walzer. ....Vogl

PART II.

6. Quartette, "Drauss ist alles so prächtig," .....Spohr
7. Aria from Don Giovanni. ....Mozart
Mr. C. Schraubstädter.
8. a. Elegie. ....Eichberg
b. Fabiana. ....
Mr. J. Eichberg.
9. Songs. a. Ungeduld. ....F. Schubert
b. Er ist gekommen. ....R. Franz
10. Quartette, Abendlied. ....C. Kreutzer

The four quartets are good pieces. The tender "Ich grüße dich" and the similar "Abendlied," the May-song, "Drauss ist alles so prächtig" with its simple melody like a people's song and the favorite sparkling "Walzer" each one good in its way, have all of them their peculiar charm. The fine harmonic effects of No. 1 were accurately rendered, and the whole piece sung with truthful expression. The same is true of the "Abendlied;" the "Walzer" went as well as usual; in the quartet by Spohr, a greater degree of simplicity would have improved the rendering. The solos were well done, though not as well as the ensemble-pieces. We think we have heard Mr. Jansen's voice to greater advantage before in the same air than on Saturday. There was hardly life enough in his performance. This want of life was noticeable to some extent in the Duetto and the Aria from "Don Giovanni." The two songs by Schubert and Franz were better rendered than the other solo-pieces, though in some places they were overdone, especially the second.

Mr. LEONHARD who was expected to accompany the solos, and Mr. Eichberg's pieces being prevented from so doing by news of an unexpected sad event, the gentlemen were fortunate in having Mr. MEYER'S assistance, who without any rehearsal played well. It would be unfair, therefore, to reflect on the fact that the accompaniments were too loud for the most part. Undoubtedly, had Mr. Meyer been able to rehearse with the gentlemen, he would have found the proportionate harmonious degree of strength.

Mr. Eichberg's part of the programme was performed with rare mastery and taste. The famous sonata, "Il trillo del diavolo" was rendered excellently. The trills with their accompaniments had a perfect finish and a drastic strength about them; in hearing them, one might imagine the savage scowl or the sardonic grin of the unutterable personage whose name the sonata bears. The tenderer, elegiac portion of it were played with fine taste and warmth of expression. The legend of this sonata as Tartini is said to have related it himself, is as follows: "One night I dreamed, his Satanic Majesty was addressing me in the following words: 'you are after all a cold composer, poor in invention, and but a common fiddler. I do these things better.' Then he played me a sonata such as I had never heard before, full of trills, which I like so well. I awoke, jumped up, tried to write down the sonata, which I still imagined I heard. I wrote a curious, very difficult sonata, full of the most artful trills. But I felt that my composition was far below the excellence of the original. Yet a d—lish sonata it is nevertheless." It is historical, that he preferred it to all his other compositions and had it constantly hanging on the wall of his room, opposite the door. The date 1690 as stated on the programme is an error, however, as Tartini was born only in 1692. With the same excellence in expression, breadth, strength and sweetness of tone, the two pieces of Mr. Eichberg's composition were played, of which the second seemed to us the most original. It is a pleasure to hear so difficult an instrument as the violin handled so well and masterly. It was a rare treat. A praiseworthy feature in Mr. E.'s two pieces, was the absence of all the routine clap-trap, we are accustomed to in the majority of violin-pieces. They are noble in treatment, and leave a pleasurable satisfaction in the mind of the hearer.

The concert was a very pleasant one, and was so received. The audience was a good one; from the absence of many persons whom we know to be great admirers of the singing of the Orpheus, we conclude, however, that the enterprise did not have publicity enough. Everything here depends on advertisements—no, fortunately not everything but a good deal concerning the business arrangements of concerts. We wish the concert might have been as profitable to the gentlemen as it was agreeable to the audience.

The Messiah.

I have been considerably amused during the last few days, at reading the various newspaper criticisms on the performance of the Messiah, by the Handel and Haydn Society, on the 30th ult., but still more so by the opinions expressed by those same writers, that the Messiah is, after all—much of it—unfit for cultivated ears to listen to, in this advanced period of musical knowledge and experience.

While some of our best informed, and most judicious critics have given the old Society credit for having given to the public a very good performance of this Christmas Oratorio; others have indulged in a strain of remark quite the opposite; and, in answer to the latter, I will only say that in common with many others—who perhaps are as competent judges as those who exhibit such wonderful capacity for faultfinding—I listened attentively through the performance with a high degree of satisfaction, and without discovering those blemishes so freely spoken of.

To an unprejudiced listener such expressions as "tame and spiritless"—"see-saw style of singing the choruses"—"catch-penny form" of presenting it to the public with a meagre chorus, orchestra, &c. &c., are very ridiculous, and can have no other possible effect than to convince the reader that something more than a desire to chronicle faithfully the doings on that occasion was the prime object.

But when one glances his eye over the criticisms of the work—the Messiah of Handel—he is lost in amazement at the exceeding knowledge (acquired in so short a space of time) and critical judgment of some of these newspaper writers. For instance, one who but a year ago,—or possibly two years ago—indulged in columns of praise of the Cantata called the "Haymakers," (a very clever thing in its way,) and who made use of this expression in relation to it, "we consider this composition as one of the greatest works of the age," now says that "the grandeur of this oratorio (the Messiah) cannot be felt by us with our progressive ideas, our present knowledge of the works of other great masters," having, undoubtedly, the "Haymakers" firmly fixed in his mind.

Another writer likens the magnificent runs and roulades of Handel's songs and choruses to a "festoon of onions to the rhythm of a hornpipe."

Surely we are progressive, and very soon we may expect to find the Elijah or St. Paul of Mendelssohn superseded (in the minds of many of these learned modern critics) by some composition of wondrous beauty, particularly adapted to Negro Minstrelsy.

The same writer says, "Let any other man write such stuff and the world will be shocked." Probably those magnificent fugues of connected notes in Mozart's Requiem were entirely forgotten when he penned that paragraph.

The assertion that the Messiah was never performed so well here as it was by the Mendelssohn Choral Society, a few years ago, and that it was then "faultless," is simply absurd. The Handel and Haydn Society, at the Festival of 1857, with a chorus of six hundred and an orchestra of eighty, gave this grandest of Handel's works in a manner to leave comparison with any other performance of it quite out of the question.

A highly respectable and popular Weekly, in a notice of the performance, written apparently in a very decidedly foggy atmosphere, speaks of the "imperfect organization of band and chorus, so evident on the start," &c., but neglects entirely to give an opinion of the merits of the composition. It would have been pleasant to have heard from him on that important point; but in the absence of such a decision as he is capable of giving, the musical world are obliged to withhold judgment until further developments. B.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB will give the first concert of their new series this evening, the programme for which is an inviting one; as it offers to us the celebrated Septet of Beethoven, (op. 20.) which has never been played in public before in Boston. Messrs. HAMANN, HOHNSTOCK and STREINE will assist in the performance. The remainder of the programme is more calculated to attract a popular audience than the ordinary ones of the Club at their regular concerts. Mrs. LONG is to sing several songs, Mr. SCHULTZE gives a violin solo and Mr. ZONIER a flute solo.

We hope that a crowded house may reward this new undertaking, which is designed to attract two very different classes of hearers.

The next regular concert of the Club will take place on Tuesday next, when we shall hear Franz Schubert's Octette, by way of novelty. Mr. H. Draper will sing.

BOSTON MOZART CLUB.—We have received a copy of the Rules and Regulations of the club of amateurs recently organized under this name, for the purpose of rehearsing and performing orchestral music, to which we made mention some weeks ago. It surely augurs well for Art here that such an organization should exist among us, and we are glad to learn of the success of the undertaking. The following are the officers for the present year: Wm. M. Byrnes, President; Augustus Flagg, Vice President; George Papendick, Secretary; James Swan, Treasurer; George D. Russell, Assistant Manager; Edward Kendall, Librarian.

In addition to the performing members, the Club includes associate members, both gentlemen and ladies, who, by the payment of a small annual assessment, have the privilege of attending all the rehearsals and musical entertainments of the Club during the winter. We learn also that members of both sorts, active and associate, will be gladly welcomed by the Club, and that the officers whose names are well known in the community will give all information in the matter to those who are interested. The Club meets every Monday evening at the Piano Warerooms of Messrs. Hallett & Cumston, 339 Washington Street.

The National Airs and Songs.

Differ as people, here and there, may, in these times, the NATIONAL SONGS seem everywhere to strike a vein of patriotism, and to touch a chord that never fails to respond. No one is willing to abandon them, poor as they may be intrinsically. A correspondent of a new Orleans paper warms into a positive enthusiasm, he protests against giving them up. He says:

I sincerely believe I never could learn to get entirely over a certain moisture of the eyelids that always comes to me when listening to the sweet and stately melody of the Star Spangled Banner, whether issuing from a company of mimic soldiers in the broad glare of day, or whether at nightfall, gently swelling over moonlit waves from a far-off line-of-battle-ship. Nor do I think I could easily conquer a certain tingling of the finger-ends, and a peculiar combative tendency which will creep over my usually quiet nature, when the soul-stirring notes of Hail Columbia, marching onward like an army to the field, suddenly breaks upon my ear. Much less, in view of the fact that even Yankee Doodle, played on a two-stringed fiddle by a negro boy, seated upon a cotton bale, will cause emotions patriotic in character, would I guarantee to nerve my heart to utter forgetfulness of any other of our national melodies, endeared to us by so many recollections of bravely-fought fields and hard-earned victories.

The New Orleans Crescent also protests against giving up Hail Columbia or the Star Spangled Banner, and even claims a special property in them for the South. None the less do we claim them here as ours, and long may they be a part of the common birthright of all AMERICANS. The Crescent very properly says:

"These tunes and anthems of right belong to the South; and as they are glorious tunes and anthems, we should cherish and perpetuate them, instead of throwing them back into the possession of those who have causelessly and wantonly become our enemies. These magnificent compositions first burst upon the world when the whole country was a slaveholding country; and like nearly everything great in war, peace, intellect and science, which made our forefathers illustrious, sprung from one general source. Instead of abandoning, let us claim them as our own legitimate property. They are a proud portion of our birthright. Our whole people have listened to their swelling strains with unalloyed delight; and tens of thousands would almost as soon fight for their retention as they would for the protection of their section—so strong is their reverence for, and powerful their attachment to, the grand old tunes they have admired and loved from earliest boyhood to the present moment.

For these reasons, leaving out of the account numerous others which could be brought forward, we sincerely trust these truly Southern National Airs, wherever performed in public hereafter, will be greeted with that hearty approbation which has been bestowed upon them from the time when the memory of the oldest citizens runneth not to the opposite."

Musical Chit-Chat.

MASON AND HAMLIN'S MELODEONS.—The manufacture of melodeons and other instruments of that nature has grown within a few years into a large and important business. This class of instruments often fills a place that no other can supply, and various reasons, (beside an absolute preference for the tone) lead to their adoption and use.

The instruments made by the firm mentioned at the head of this article are distinguished as among the best, if not the very best made in this country, for tone, power, external finish and variety of style. At the late Fair of the Mechanic's Association in this city, Messrs. Mason and Hamlin were awarded the first premium, a SILVER MEDAL, for their Melodeons and Harmoniums. From the report of the judges accompanying this award, we make the following extracts:

"The instruments exhibited by the firm of Mason and Hamlin were of remarkably fine workmanship, and the care exercised in voicing the reeds has made them better than those of any other makers, with whose instruments your Committee are familiar. The enterprise and ingenuity which has been bestowed on them, and elevated them from the low level which in their first inception these instruments held, cannot be too highly commended and encouraged. Without discussing the question whether one kind of mechanism is more legitimate than another for producing tone in instruments of the organ class, there can be but one opinion of the advance already made in the manufacture of reed organs, and their present superiority over the specimens of former years; and your Committee would most cheerfully award to Mason and Hamlin the principal merit in promoting such a desirable result." The judges were: Messrs. William Read, Charles J. Capen, J. Baxter Upham, Carl Zerrahn, George Derby, James C. D. Parker and Samuel Jamison.

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Dec. 28.—The Cantata of "Paradise" and the Peri was performed by the pupils and music teachers of Maplewood. The correspondent informs us that the occasion passed off finely. The music was by Mr J. L. Ensign, who is one of the teachers of music in the institution, Messrs. K. Treuer and Otto Feder, being the others.

A MUSICAL ENTHUSIAST.—Dr. Ford, the rector of Melton, was an enthusiast in music, very singular in his manner, and a great humorist. His passion for sacred music was publicly known, from his constant attendance at most of the musical festivals in the kingdom. I have frequently met him, and always found him in ecstasies with Handel's music, especially the Messiah. His admiration of this work was carried to such an excess, that he told me he never made a journey from Melton to Leicester that he did not sing it quite through. His performance served as a pedometer by which he could ascertain his progress on the road. As soon as he had crossed Melton-bridge, he began the overture, and always found himself in the chorus, "Lift up your heads," when he arrived at Brooksby-gate; and "Thanks be to God," the moment he got through Thurmaston toll-gate. As the pace of his old horse was pretty regular, he contrived to conclude the Amen chorus always at the cross in the Belgrave-gate. Though a very pious person, his eccentricity was, at times, not restrained even in the pulpit. It need not be stated that he had a pretty good opinion of his own vocal powers. Once, when the clerk was giving out the tune, he stopped him, saying, "John, you have pitched too low—follow me." Then, clearing up his voice, he lustily began the tune. When the psalmody went to his mind, he enjoyed it; and, in his paroxysms of delight would dandle one or both of his legs over the sides of the pulpit during the singing. The doctor was himself a performer, had a good library of music, and always took the Messiah with him on his musical journeys. I think it was at Birmingham festival that he was sitting with his book upon his knee, humming the music with the performers, to the great annoyance of an attentive listener, who said, "I did not pay to hear you sing." "Then," said the doctor, "you have that into the bargain." — Gardiner's Music and Friends.

NEW ACOUSTIC APPARATUS.—The paraboloid sounding apparatus proposed several weeks since for the City Hall, has been secured and tested, and with the most satisfactory results. The contrivance is simple, and consists chiefly of a large oval apparatus after the style of a shell, erected ten or twelve feet above the platform, and supported by a couple of pillars, a few feet above the speaker's head. A very low sound of the voice is distinctly heard at the opposite end of the hall, and no echo is produced, however loud it may be. The whole thing cost but about $200, and the benefit derived is worth that much during a single lecture season. It will be used during Mr. Youman's lecture, at the City Hall, this evening. — Springfield Republican.

GOTTSCALK.—Private advices inform us of the illness of the great American pianist, who still remains in Havana. At one time the attack proved so dangerous as to require the constant attendance of three eminent physicians. His friends, however, will be pleased to hear of his gradual convalescence since then. The character of the disease is not stated. — Amateur's Guide.

Musical Correspondence.

TRAPPE, PA., Jan. 2.—The Creation was given in this village on Christmas Eve, by the Phi Kappa Tau Society, of Washington Hall. There was a goodly number of singers, accompanied by piano and several other instruments. The performance was characteristic of those given by the same society on former occasions good. The audience was larger than at any previous performance, and evidently appreciative; for The Creation entire was not sufficient. A gem from Moses in Egypt was given. C. H. JARVIS, of Philadelphia, presided at the piano, and closed with a masterly performance of an exceeding difficult piece. The solo singers were Miss TILLIE A. GROSS, C. D. HARTRAUFF, A. RAMBO, H. R. WEAND and H. W. SNYDER. The whole was under the conductorship of A. Rambo. This is a noble cause, and we say persevere. Q.

NEW YORK, JAN. 7.—In regard to opera there is very little to say. The Formes company gave one performance on New Year's night, which was well attended by Germans at theatre prices, but the panic, "hard times" and secession excitement have all been too strong to give poor Apollo a chance to twang his lyre again in Gotham. It is rumored that the Colson troupe will open the Brooklyn Academy of Music before long. It is probable that they will also give a few performances at our Academy of Music. Rumor hints the possibility of a new opera house being built in this city, further up town than that on Fourteenth Street. We need it about as much as a dog needs two tails.

Concerts announced this week are Miss HAWLEY's on Tuesday evening. The lady is a contralto vocalist of considerable ability, and a singer I believe in St. George's Church choir, where KING the best organist in the city (of his style) is engaged, and plays excepting on Christmas days and such like occasions, when he don't find time to attend. If Miss Hawley don't sing at St. George's, she sings somewhere else, it don't matter where. Her annual concert this year takes place at a new concert saloon, Irving Hall, a room highly spoken of. I give you the programme:

PART I.

1. Solo, Violin—(Fantasia,) "Anna Bolena".....Allard Henri Appy.
  2. Song, "The Anchor's Weighed".....Mr. Simpson.
  3. Sacred Song, "Ruth and Naomi".....Topliffe Miss Hawley.
  4. Solo, Piano, Fantasia, (F sharp, minor).....Mendelssohn Mr. Beale.
  5. Duo, "The Sailor Sighs".....Balfé Miss Hawley and Mr. Simpson.
  6. Finale to the Second Act of "Lurline".....Wallace Mendelssohn Union.

7. Chorus, (Lurline).....Wallace Mendelssohn Union.—Solo, Miss Breunen.

The Mendelssohn Union assisting at this concert, the Harmonic Society will assist by way of balancing attractions, at a concert to be given at the same place on Thursday evening, by Mr. BRISTOW, for a charitable object. Felicien David's Desert will be produced on this occasion.

A new singer has arrived here, but has not yet appeared. He is a tenor, SIMON LEVIDAN by name, an Italian, and formerly one of the Garibaldians. He has a powerful tenore robusto voice, and would take well in the Verdi Operas. His voice would easily fill the largest theatre, and I think that in case the lyric drama ever revives in this section, Simon Levidan's name will become better known. There is a new prima donna here also, a Mlle. ELENA who comes from Rio. In the present operatic stagnation she had better have stayed there.

Some little gossip and perturbation has been created in church choir circles by the communications of one "TIMOTHY TRILL" to the Despatch of this city. Timothy is an organist who possesses some brains, a facile pen and a great many absurd notions. He composes music, and too much of it for his own good; but he is a clever writer and "cuts up" the follies and whims of church choir members admirably. He has exposed some curious instances of musical charlatanism, and his communications are worthy the attention of Dwight's Journal.

I don't know how it is in Boston, but as far as New York is concerned, church choirs and their occupants form a most amusing study. It is incredible how many stupid, incompetent, yet self-conceited people belong to choirs—how much twaddling, cackling, gossiping, slandering, backbiting, reviling and all uncharitableness is going on in them. Changes are constantly occurring. If a man or a woman gets a station in a church worth having, he or she is thenceforward the target for aspersions and envy. He or she is the object of official assassination; and he or she has the pleasant knowledge that a band of least fifty individuals are panting to turn him or her out of the position and fill it themselves. Under handed means is familiar to the majority of our choir musicians. Germans who can live on three cents a day, and save two of them, are ever ready to underbid an American musician, and I could give instances in connection with some of our choirs which would amaze everybody but a New York musician. Efforts have been made to unite our church choirs into a sort of mutual benefit Society; but the personal piques and jealousies were too strong for the successful accomplishment of the plan. TROVATOR.
